Questions of Fact Regarding Ambiguous Contract and Damages — Summary Judgment Inappropriate: Upon remand of a breach of contract action in Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2003 MT 82, 315 M 75, 67 P3d 306 (2003), the District Court granted Bradley's motion for summary judgment a second time without considering the merits of defendant's defense to the breach of contract. However, because questions of fact still existed regarding ambiguous language in the contract and potential damages, summary judgment was inappropriate, so the case was again reversed and remanded for further consideration. Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2005 MT 309, 329 M 448, 124 P3d 1143 (2005).

Bodily Injury Not Inclusive of Emotional or Psychological Injury Within Terms of Uninsured Motorist Policy: Jacobsen was driving a car insured by defendant when he stopped to assist another motorist who was unconscious with a bleeding head wound. Despite Jacobsen's ministrations, the motorist died a few days later, and the cause was determined to be suicide. The next year, Jacobsen began seeking treatment for emotional distress suffered as a result of the incident and filed a claim with defendant to recover uninsured motorist benefits and medical pay benefits. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendant, and Jacobsen appealed on grounds that his policy for uninsured motorist coverage included damages for bodily injury sustained by the insured caused by an accident. The Supreme Court held that the term "bodily injury" was not ambiguous and was limited to physical injury caused by an accident but did not include emotional or psychological injuries. Thus, Jacobsen's emotional injury, including resulting physical manifestations, did not constitute bodily injury as defined in the insurance contract and was not compensable. Jacobsen v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 72, 320 M 375, 87 P3d 995 (2004), following Bain v. Gleason, 223 M 442, 726 P2d 1153 (1986), and Aetna Life & Cas. Co. v. First Sec. Bank of Bozeman, 662 F. Supp. 1126 (D.C. Mont. 1987). Jacobsen was overruled in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wagner-Ellsworth, 2008 MT 240, 344 M 445, 188 P3d 1042 (2008), to the extent that bodily injuries include mental or psychological injuries that are accompanied by physical manifestations.

Ambiguous Settlement Agreement Language Regarding Maintenance Calculation — Gross Disposable Income Interpreted as Pretax Income: A settlement agreement provided that monthly maintenance payments be 15% of the husband's gross disposable income. In direct opposition to the husband's interpretation, the wife and her expert contended that the amount should be based on pretax rather than after-tax income, and the District Court agreed. The court found that the term gross disposable income was ambiguous because "gross" and "disposable" had mutually exclusive meanings in this context, so the court looked beyond the agreement language to the parties' intent. Because the term was ambiguous, the parties' proposed interpretations were equally proper, so under this section, the ambiguity was construed in the wife's favor because the maintenance provision was for her benefit. The court's allowance of testimony from the wife's expert was also within the court's discretion. In re Marriage of Mease, 2004 MT 59, 320 M 229, 92 P3d 1148 (2004).

Wendell Test Applied to Determination of Whether Bodily Injury Caused by Accident "Resulting From the Use" of Insured Vehicle: Defendant's son was injured in a hunting accident after riding to the hunt in a vehicle owned by Wajahuski and insured by plaintiff. The insurance policy provided for coverage resulting from the use of a vehicle. The District Court applied the test in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), and held that the automobile insurance policy did not provide liability coverage with respect to defendant's claims for bodily injury. Defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Even though the Wendell test was originally applied in an uninsured motorist case, the expansive, fact-intensive test also applied here. The phrase "resulting from the use" was ambiguous, so the contract terms were construed in a light most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary. The accident could have occurred in any location, regardless of how the hunters reached their destination. The fact that that particular vehicle was used to transport the hunters and assist in the hunt provided no connection between the use of the vehicle and the hunting accident. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that the personal injuries were not caused by an accident resulting from the use of the insured motor vehicle. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Ferrin, 2002 MT 196, 311 M 155, 54 P3d 21 (2002).

Ambiguity Regarding Whether Settlement Contingent on Alternate Financing — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff sought to foreclose on a loan made to defendant, alleging that defendant's liabilities exceeded the value of the collateral, resulting in default pursuant to the terms of the note. The parties made several attempts to settle the issue, resulting in defendant's payoff to plaintiff, but in an amount that the plaintiff claimed was insufficient. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff and ordered enforcement of the settlement agreement. However, a letter memorializing the settlement agreement, when considered with the parties' other correspondence, created an ambiguity regarding whether the settlement was contingent on alternate financing. Because there was more than one reasonable interpretation regarding the parties' intention, the parties' affidavits and testimony were admissible to determine intention and raised an issue of fact that precluded summary judgment. The case was remanded for further proceedings. Stockman Bank v. Potts, 2002 MT 178, 311 M 12, 52 P3d 920 (2002).

Ambiguity of Term "Purchaser's Profit" in Real Estate Sales Contract — Special Meaning Not Ascribed to Ambiguous Term: The District Court determined that the language in a contract for deed was ambiguous because it failed to define the term "purchaser's profit", a term that was material to a promise to share profits on resale of the property. The court then went on to find that the term had a special meaning that did not allow for deduction of the buyers' sales costs and the costs of improvements. On appeal, defendants argued that the term referred to the net profit from the sale, meaning the selling price minus the purchase price as well as the sales costs and improvement costs. Plaintiffs contended that the term referred to the gross profit from the sale, meaning the selling price minus only the purchase price. The Supreme Court found that the term could reasonably be subject to either interpretation and was thus ambiguous. Further, the District Court's finding that the term had a special meaning completely contradicted its holding that the phrase was ambiguous. Construing the ambiguity against plaintiffs, who drafted the language, the Supreme Court construed the term in its ordinary rather than special meaning and allowed defendants to deduct the ordinary costs directly associated with the sale of the property, but not the costs of the improvements because no mention was made of any additional sums to be paid to acquire improvements. The Supreme Court also agreed with both parties that the District Court erred in determining the sum that defendants should be allowed to deduct as their purchase price in calculating the purchaser's profit because the sum did not reflect what was actually paid for the property. The Supreme Court arrived at its own calculation of the purchaser's profit and remanded for proceedings consistent with its calculations. Ophus v. Fritz, 2000 MT 251, 301 M 447, 11 P3d 1192, 57 St. Rep. 1037 (2000).

"Arising Out of" Ambiguous — Coverage for Liability Not Excluded: Pablos were injured in a vehicle accident involving Moore, who was transporting a landscaping tractor for his employer. The employer was covered by a commercial general liability insurance policy that provided liability insurance for negligent acts of the corporation and its employees. Pablos contended that the employer was negligent in the hiring, training, and supervision of Moore. The employer conceded that the claim arose during the policy period and fell within the definitions of "bodily injury" and "occurrence" and that the policy would provide coverage unless coverage was denied by an exclusion but contended that coverage was excluded under both the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the use of an automobile and the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the transportation of mobile equipment. The District Court held that the term "arising out of" was ambiguous and, construing the instrument against the drafter-insurer, ruled that coverage for Pablos' accident was not excluded under the policy language. Noting that the phrase "arising out of" has been declared ambiguous in another insurance context in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), the Supreme Court applied a similar rationale to the phrase in both exclusionary clauses at issue in the present case. The phrase was reasonably subject to more than one interpretation and thus ambiguous. Pursuant to Head v. Cent. Reserve Life of N. America Ins. Co., 256 M 188, 845 P2d 735, 50 St. Rep. 20 (1993), if the terms of an insurance policy are ambiguous, obscure, or open to different constructions, the construction most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary must prevail, particularly if an ambiguous provision attempts to exclude the liability of the insurer. Here, the policy did not clearly and unambiguously exclude coverage for the theories of liability pleaded by Pablos, and the District Court's summary judgment that coverage was owed on Pablos' claims for negligent hiring, training, and supervision of Moore was affirmed. Pablo v. Moore, 2000 MT 48, 298 M 393, 995 P2d 460, 57 St. Rep. 231 (2000), following Marquis v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 961 P2d 1213 (Kans. 1998).

Ambiguous Language Regarding Conduct of Mineral Development Operations: An agreement implementing development of a mineral interest indicated that the parties would operate the venture as joint operators, but it was ambiguous as to who would conduct the day-to-day operations of the property, seemingly implying that daily operations would be conducted by the oil company. Evidence indicated that lessor worked as an employee in the operations, so the District Court properly granted the company authority to conduct daily operations subject to a right of inspection by the lessor. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Parol Evidence Necessary to Determine Intention When Latent Ambiguity Exists: A party transferred property back to sellers in lieu of foreclosure. The transfer arguably constituted a technical conveyance. "Conveyance" had different meanings for the parties and therefore was to be interpreted in accord with the manifest intent of the parties. Parol evidence was necessarily admissible to demonstrate and explain this latent ambiguity, and summary judgment on the issue was improper. Ellingson Agency, Inc. v. Baltrusch, 228 M 360, 742 P2d 1009, 44 St. Rep. 1598 (1987), followed in Fox Grain & Cattle Co. v. Maxwell, 267 M 528, 885 P2d 432, 51 St. Rep. 1136 (1994).

Ambiguous Insurance Policy Provision — Summary Judgment Reversed: An insurance policy that did not clearly state whether it provided uninsured motor vehicle coverage when the driver was insured but the ownership of the vehicle was not was held to be ambiguous; therefore, under the rationale that an ambiguous provision is construed against the insurance company, the policy was interpreted to provide coverage. The District Court grant of summary judgment holding that the policy did not provide uninsured motor vehicle coverage was reversed. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 223 M 215, 725 P2d 821, 43 St. Rep. 1667 (1986), distinguished in Meyer v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co, 2000 MT 323, 303 M 1, 15 P3d 899, 57 St. Rep. 1363 (2000).

Annexation Agreement — Issue of Intent One of Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: The term "residential purposes" in a "Waiver of Right to Protest Annexation and Agreement on Non-Conforming Use" was not so clear on its face as to preclude multifamily residential purposes. Supreme Court held that District Court erred in granting summary judgment for city based on the District Court's determination of the intention of the parties and remanded the case for trial on the issue of intent. Issue of intent is one of fact and cannot be decided on summary judgment. Derrenger v. Billings, 213 M 469, 691 P2d 1379, 41 St. Rep. 2276 (1984).

Exception for Jointly Drawn Document: Shortly after entering into a land purchase agreement, the parties changed the agreement into a tax-free land exchange agreement. The new agreement gave buyer 3 ½ years to acquire like-kind property to be exchanged for seller's ranch. The like-kind property was to be purchased with funds placed periodically by buyer in an escrow account. Several years later a dispute arose concerning the nature and timing of the payments. Buyer submitted the questions to the District Court in a declaratory judgment action. The District Court interpreted the contract in a manner generally favorable to seller, and buyer appealed, claiming that the District Court's decision was unreasonable, contrary to the parties' intentions, and improper under the rules of construction of contracts. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the District Court's interpretation had not been unreasonable since: (1) its decision on the timing of the rental payments was reflective of the parties' intentions as shown by their past performance; (2) its decision on the timing of the amortization payments was consistent with the rule of construction requiring that a contract be construed in such a way as to give effect to all of its provisions; and (3) its ruling on the intention of the parties was supported by the evidence. Finally, 28-3-206 did not entitle buyer to have ambiguities construed in his favor; even though buyer claimed that the nature of the agreement was changed solely for seller's benefit, the agreement was prepared by an attorney for both parties, not by one party alone. Lewis v. Murphy, 199 M 368, 649 P2d 740, 39 St. Rep. 1459 (1982).

Construction of Agricultural Lease: Where provision in agricultural lease regarding removal of improvements to the land or payment therefor at end of the lease was unclear, the court applied extrinsic evidence to determine that the parties did not intend payment for nonremovable improvements to be required. The fact of lessee's careless documentation of his expenses and his attempt to claim as improvements items that were included in a required maintenance clause were held to support the finding. Overcast v. Akra, 197 M 276, 642 P2d 1058, 39 St. Rep. 558 (1982).

Term "Mineral" as Applied to Sand and Gravel — Inherently Ambiguous: There is a split of authority whether the term "mineral" includes or excludes sand and gravel. The court declined to announce an applicable rule in Montana but found that the use of the term "mineral", as applied to sand and gravel, is inherently ambiguous. Where an ambiguous term is used, the intent of the parties will govern its construction and extrinsic evidence can be used to discover that intent.

The court concluded that there was sufficient evidence upon which to conclude that the parties intended the term to include sand and gravel. Adams v. Chilcott, 182 M 511, 597 P2d 1140 (1979).

Reservation of Mineral Interest: In action for specific performance arising over interpretation of contract for conveyance of land reserving mineral interest, where cross-complaint of defendants alleged that the contract was ambiguous and uncertain and prayed for a declaratory judgment to adjudicate the rights of the parties, it was the duty of the trial court to determine the intent of the parties and the exclusion of parol evidence of intent was error. Stokes v. Tutvet, 134 M 250, 328 P2d 1096 (1958).

Oil and Gas Leases:

Where the defendant agreed to assign a specific oil lease and then described land held by him covered by other leases, received the consideration therefor but never completed the assignment, the court was warranted in finding that it called for a transfer of interest of all the lands described in it, since the evidence disclosed that is what the plaintiff thought was being transferred. Bull Creek Oil & Gas Dev. v. Bethel, 127 M 222, 258 P2d 960 (1953).

Where a written contract appears on its face to be uncertain and ambiguous, resort to parol testimony may be had in aid of its interpretation; and under that rule, in an action for breach of a contract of lease of oil and gas lands, providing, inter alia, for drilling of exploratory wells "to such number and extent as the premises will admit of", thus rendering the contract ambiguous as to the number of wells to be drilled, parol testimony was admissible to show the parties' understanding of the clause when the contract was entered into. Brown v. Homestake Exploration Co., 98 M 305, 39 P2d 168 (1934).

Farm Lease: Under 28-3-202 farm lease contracts are to be read as a whole and not by particular paragraphs or sentences, and under this section and 28-3-206 any ambiguities in such a lease should be construed against the lessor. A tenant was entitled to compensation for the summer-fallowing he did during the last year of his holding, where he did not renew and the lease was given to another, and where lease required 80 acres to be summer-fallowed, but tenant found only 74.5 acres of tillable land, he substantially complied (1-3-222). Letz v. Lampen, 110 M 477, 104 P2d 4 (1940).

Burden of Proof: Where the attendant facts and circumstances in the making of an agreement are resorted to as an aid to an understanding of it, no greater burden rests upon the promisor than to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the promisee understood it as the promisor believed he understood it. Blankenship v. Decker, 34 M 292, 85 P 1035 (1906).

Case Notes

Arbitration Clause Unenforceable: Mueske's contract with a securities firm contained an arbitration clause that was to be governed by the rules of either the New York Stock Exchange, Inc. (NYSE), or the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc. (NASD). The Supreme Court held that the securities firm had failed to comply with other rules of the NYSE or NASD and therefore was not entitled to enforcement of the arbitration provision. Mueske v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, Inc., 260 M 207, 859 P2d 444, 50 St. Rep. 1009 (1993), followed in Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26, 50 St. Rep. 1234 (1993).

Cost of Asbestos Removal Covered in Policy — Narrow Construction of Policy Exclusions: A "code exclusion" clause in a policy issued on a commercial building relieved insurer of any obligation to pay additional costs for the removal of debris from a fire-damaged building when the cost of removal was increased because of regulatory restrictions. Insurer claimed exemption when the cost of removal was increased because the debris contained asbestos, a substance subject to legal regulation. However, coverage exclusions are contrary to the fundamental protective purpose of an insurance policy and are therefore subject to a rule of narrow construction. Noting that the policy as drafted affirmatively extended coverage for debris removal and that the asbestos in question was considered debris as a result of fire damage, the Supreme Court held that insurer was liable contractually and that the exclusion was inapplicable. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Oakland, 251 M 352, 825 P2d 554, 49 St. Rep. 72 (1992), following Garnett v. Transamerica Ins. Serv., 800 P2d 656 (Idaho 1990).

Purpose of Land Exchange Agreement Effected in Interpretation of Its Provisions: Shortly after entering into a land purchase agreement, the parties changed the agreement into a tax-free land exchange agreement. The new agreement gave buyer 3 ½ years to acquire like-kind property to be exchanged for seller's ranch. The like-kind property was to be purchased with funds placed periodically by buyer in an escrow account. Several years later a dispute arose concerning the nature and timing of the payments. Buyer submitted the questions to the District Court in a declaratory judgment action. The District Court interpreted the contract in a manner generally favorable to seller, and buyer appealed, claiming that the District Court's decision was unreasonable, contrary to the parties' intentions, and improper under the rules of construction of contracts. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the District Court's interpretation had not been unreasonable since: (1) its decision on the timing of the rental payments was reflective of the parties' intentions as shown by their past performance; (2) its decision on the timing of the amortization payments was consistent both with the rule of construction requiring that a contract be construed in such a way as to give effect to all of its provisions and with this section; and (3) its decision on the intention of the parties was supported by the evidence. Finally, 28-3-206 did not entitle buyer to have ambiguities construed in his favor; even though buyer claimed that the nature of the agreement was changed solely for seller's benefit, the agreement was prepared by an attorney for both parties, not by one party alone. Lewis v. Murphy, 199 M 368, 649 P2d 740, 39 St. Rep. 1459 (1982).

Ambiguous Insurance Policy: Summary judgment on a claim for loss by theft of a commercial carpet cleaner was improperly granted defendant insurer when the policy of insurance was ambiguous as to exclusions from coverage. The particular exclusionary clause was subordinate to the general intent of the contract. Alpha Real Estate Dev., Inc. v. Aetna Life & Cas. Co., 174 M 301, 570 P2d 585 (1977).

Determining Intent — Subject Matter and Circumstances Considered: It is a fundamental rule that in the construction of contracts the courts may look not only to the language employed but to the subject matter and the surrounding circumstances and may avail themselves of the same light which the parties possessed when the contract was made. Kintner v. Harr, 146 M 461, 408 P2d 487 (1965).

Entire Contract to Determine Intent: In the construction of a contract the intention of the parties at the time of contracting must be pursued if possible, which intention must be gathered from the entire instrument and not from particular words or phrases or disjointed parts of it, and in the ascertainment of such intention the subject matter of the contract and the purposes of its execution are material. St. v. Rosman, 84 M 207, 274 P 850 (1929).

Mutuality as to Each Covenant Not Required: Generally it is not essential that each covenant of agreement of the lessor in an oil lease shall be supported by specific reciprocal covenant or agreement by the lessee, it being sufficient if the contract contains mutual obligations binding upon both parties, and provision that the lessee could surrender it "upon payment of *_____" was not void for want of mutuality in this respect, the other provisions of the contracts being wholly independent of it and enforceable. Hinerman v. Baldwin, 67 M 417, 215 P 1103 (1923).

Factors Considered in Determining Intention

Part Case Notes

Failure to Comply With Provisions of Federal Act Incorporated by Reference Into Contract — Affirmative Defense: The Farm Credit Bank instituted suit to foreclose on a loan agreement with the Graveleys and filed for summary judgment. The Graveleys argued that the bank was estopped from foreclosing because it had not complied with the restructuring provisions of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1987, which had been incorporated by reference into the parties' agreement. The Supreme Court held that the Graveleys were entitled to assert as an affirmative defense the failure of the bank to follow the provisions of the Act and that allowing the defense was not synonymous with allowing a foreclosure court to substitute its judgment for that of the bank's loan officers. The Supreme Court also held that the lower court had correctly denied the motion for summary judgment on the basis that factual issues existed with respect to the merits of the Graveleys' affirmative defense. State ex rel. Farm Credit Bank of Spokane v. District Court, 267 M 1, 881 P2d 594, 51 St. Rep. 709 (1994), following Farm Credit Bank of Spokane v. Parsons, 758 F. Supp. 1368 (D.C. Mont. 1990), and followed in AgAmerica, FCB v. Robson, 272 M 413, 901 P2d 100, 52 St. Rep. 800 (1995).

Interpretation of Contract — Time of Performance: On appeal, the seller of a log cabin urged that the agreement required the buyer to remove the logs from the seller's property as soon as possible. The Supreme Court found that the negotiations were quick and informal and that nothing specific was said about the time in which the cabin was to be removed. Noting the seller's testimony that he was in the process of refurbishing his motel and wanted the cabin removed as soon as possible so that he could take advantage of the good building weather to expand the motel and that the cabin was old and had not been used for years and contributed nothing to the value or appearance of the property and little value to the motel, the Supreme Court held that there was substantial evidence to support the trial court's finding that a condition of the sale was that the logs were to be removed as soon as possible. Jeffery v. Neville, 190 M 300, 620 P2d 1218, 37 St. Rep. 1983 (1980).

28-3-401. Extent to which language governs interpretation.

Case Notes

Settlement of Legal Actions Against Estate — Settlement Agreement Properly Construed: Evalyn Burrell owned an interest in 200 acres at the time of her death, 80 acres in one parcel and 120 in the other, her grandchildren also having an undivided interest in 40 acres of the 120-acre parcel. In settlement of an action concerning her will and a second action to partition the 120-acre parcel, the grandchildren took 40 acres from both the 80-acre and 120-acre parcels. However, when Evalyn's estate sought to enforce the settlement agreement, the grandchildren claimed that the agreement did not settle their interests in all of Evalyn's property and raised other issues as well. The Supreme Court held that it was inconceivable that the parties did not intend to settle years of litigation over the 200 acres of land and concluded that the language of the agreement, when viewed as a whole, could therefore be interpreted only as applying to the grandchildren's interests in all of the Burrell property. In re Estate of Burrell, 2010 MT 280, 358 Mont. 460, 245 P.3d 1106.

No Duty of Insurer to Cover City's Conversion of Pension Funds: The city of Dillon failed to properly pay pension benefits, even though the city received the money from the state. When a beneficiary sued the city to recover unpaid benefits, the city tendered defense of its claim to its insurer, but the insurer declined to provide coverage or defend the claim based on a financial gain exclusion in the insurance policy. The beneficiary was granted summary judgment, so the city paid the judgment and filed an action to recover against the insurer. The District Court held that the insurer was liable and breached its duty to defend, so the insurer appealed. The Supreme Court held that the insurer had no duty to provide coverage to the city because the city's claim arose in whole or in part from the city's unlawful retention and conversion of the pension funds, so the city had no coverage for the claims for return of principal and interest. The District Court was reversed. Dillon v. Mont. Municipal Ins. Authority, 2009 MT 393, 353 M 370, 220 P3d 623 (2009).

Covenants Intended to Remain in Effect Until Rejected by Property Owners — Failure of Sufficient Tract Owners to Vote to Amend Covenants: Subdivision property owners entered covenants that would automatically extend for "successive period" of 10 years. The covenants could also be amended by a two-thirds vote of the owners of the original tracts. Some of the owners contended that the covenant extension language was ambiguous because it was not clear if the covenants would be renewed only for a single 10-year period or for successive 10-year periods. The District Court held that the language was not ambiguous, but rather contained a typographical error, and that successive 10-year periods applied. Plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Taken as a whole the covenant language intended that the covenants remain in effect until affirmatively rejected by the property owners. In this case, five of the eight original tract owners voted to amend the covenants, so without the required two-thirds vote, the covenants remained unamended. Brewer v. Hawkinson, 2009 MT 346, 353 M 154, 221 P3d 643 (2009). See also Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Whether Dam Operation Damaged Lakeshore Properties — Summary Judgment Improper — Class Action Vacated: Flathead Lake landowners brought a class action suit against defendant operators of Kerr Dam for operating outside the scope of their easements in a manner that continuously eroded and damaged plaintiffs' lakeshore properties. The District Court rejected plaintiffs' argument that the dam operator was not allowed to affect plaintiffs' properties above an elevation of 2,893 feet, concluding instead that defendants' easements covered entire parcels. The court concluded that erosion, including wave action erosion, was within the scope of the easements and held that any duty defendants had to not cause unreasonable damage to plaintiffs' properties applied only to damage unrelated to use of the easement. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court first agreed that the District Court's contour line theory was correct. The "2,893 feet" clause did not establish the vertical limit argued by plaintiffs because although the dam operators' right to flood, subirrigate, drain, or otherwise affect the shoreline was not unlimited, it was not restricted to a maximum elevation of 2,893 feet at each parcel, but rather extended to whatever part of each parcel was affected when the lake was held at 2,893 feet above mean sea level as measured at the dam. The court also agreed that the right to cause some erosion was necessary to the enjoyment of the right to perpetually flood, subirrigate, and drain and was thus included by implication in the easements. However, further factual development and trial were necessary to address the question of whether the erosion was reasonable, necessary, and within the scope of the easements, which could not be resolved by summary judgment. Additionally, the question of whether defendants breached their obligation to not cause unreasonable damage to the shoreline properties and to not unreasonably interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment also required further factual development and possibly trial. Therefore, the order certifying the case as a class action was vacated and the case was remanded for further consideration. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2009 MT 286, 352 M 212, 215 P3d 675 (2009).

No Ambiguity in Complete, Final Sales Agreement — Parol Evidence Inadmissible: The parties entered a sale agreement for a ready-mix concrete plant. Plaintiff subsequently filed an action alleging that defendant violated the agreement by breaching the covenant to not compete and the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which constituted malice resulting in lost profits, sales, and goodwill. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly concluded that the sales agreement constituted a complete, final agreement and unambiguously did not include a noncompetition provision, but in fact provided that plaintiff would sell concrete to defendant for use in the area. The intention of the parties was ascertainable from the writing alone, and the agreement was presumed to represent all transactions regarding elements extrinsic to the agreement and was thus considered complete and final, so parol evidence was inadmissible. Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009). See also Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920 (1990), and Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest States, Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Ambiguity of Contract Raising Genuine Issues of Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties, granted summary judgment for plaintiff on claims of breach of contract and express warranty, and denied defendant's summary judgment counterclaim of breach of contract and express warranty. The Supreme Court examined the contract and found ambiguities regarding whether defendant accepted the aircraft "as is" at signing or maintained the right to inspect and reject the aircraft prior to closing, as well as the parties' extension of the closing date. The ambiguities raised genuine issues of material fact regarding breach of contract and express warranty that were not appropriate for summary judgment, and the Supreme Court reversed for trial on the issues. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Tort Claims Not Precluded by Contract Claims Arising From Same Event: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties and granted defendant summary judgment on plaintiff's tort claims on grounds that plaintiff had relied on a contract theory of relief and thus elected to be made whole under the contract. Plaintiff appealed on grounds that tort liability can exist with contract liability and that recovery on a contract theory does not necessarily preclude recovery on tort theories such as fraud. Defendant responded that summary dismissal of the tort claims was proper because plaintiff should not be allowed to make a double recovery and that because plaintiff's claims were commercial, tort damages are not available except in rare cases when a separate tort claim arises from the contractual relationship. Without ruling on the validity of the tort claims, the Supreme Court held that consideration of plaintiff's fraud-based claims was not precluded by the fact that plaintiff also made separate contract claims arising out of the same event. The tort claims were required to be considered individually and could not be dismissed under a blanket rationale that the tort claims and contract claims were mutually exclusive. The District Court's summary judgment was reversed, and the issue was remanded for further consideration. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Ambiguous Employment Contract — Question of Parties' Intent Properly Submitted to Jury: West's employment contract contained two different provisions regarding how West would be compensated in the event of termination of employment. The District Court construed the ambiguous clauses against the employer who drafted the contract and submitted the issue to the jury. On appeal by the employer, the Supreme Court examined the contract language and affirmed. The employment agreement was ambiguous on the issue of whether West would be paid trailing commissions or bonuses if West were terminated for cause, so the District Court did not err in ordering that the parties' intent on the issue be submitted to the jury. West v. The Club at Spanish Peaks, LLC, 2008 MT 183, 343 M 434, 186 P3d 1228 (2008), following Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Question Whether Condition Precedent Satisfied and Contract Formed — Remand: The parties negotiated for the purchase of a new vehicle, and the terms of the contract documents set the interest rate at 3.9%. The plain language of the contract was clear that there was no binding contract until the contract terms were accepted by a bank or finance company. A week after negotiations when the bank would not accept the 3.9% rate, the car dealer notified the buyers that they would have to sign new finance papers with a higher annual percentage rate of 4.9%, but the buyers refused. The buyers then sued the dealer, but the District Court compelled arbitration and stayed the proceedings. On appeal, the car dealer asserted that the contract language was not binding to the dealer unless financing was obtained and that the condition precedent applied only to the dealer and not the buyers. The Supreme Court disagreed. The totality of the contract language demonstrated that the condition precedent also applied to the buyers, even though that was not expressly stated. The total sales price and the corresponding finance charge agreed to by the buyers were based on financing at 3.9%, and a change in rate required renegotiation by both parties, so the condition precedent applied to both parties. Because there were questions of disputed fact whether the condition precedent was satisfied and a contract formed, the case was remanded to District Court for further factfinding and discovery. Thompson v. Lithia Chrysler Jeep Dodge of Great Falls, 2008 MT 175, 343 M 392, 185 P3d 332 (2008).

Lessor Fully Compensated for Loss of Truck Under Rental Agreement — Agreed Value of Truck Inapplicable to Damage Claim: Plaintiff leased a truck to defendant for construction work. The truck had an agreed value of $250,000 and a rental rate of $12,000 a month. While in defendant's possession, the truck was heavily damaged. Plaintiff initially sought to repair the truck, but eventually it was stripped of usable parts, and the remaining shell was sold for $15,000. Plaintiff received $114,500 from its insurer, based on the insurer's calculation that the truck had a $126,000 cash replacement value minus the $2,500 policy deductible owed to plaintiff by defendant and minus a $9,000 salvage value. Plaintiff then sued defendant for the unpaid balance of the agreed value, including the monthly payments because the agreed value had not been paid. The District Court noted that even though the parties did not have a signed, enforceable, written contract, defendant had properly insured the truck pursuant to a reasonable lease term, identifying plaintiff as beneficiary, and held that defendant had no independent obligation to pay damages beyond the deductible. Because plaintiff had recovered all damages to which it was entitled, judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court found that the language of the rental agreement did not require the lessee to pay the agreed value if the truck was damaged or destroyed, so defendant was not liable for the agreed value. Plaintiff failed to show the actual replacement cost of the truck and failed to establish that the District Court's finding was clearly erroneous, so the court did not err in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to additional compensation for replacing the truck. Additionally, plaintiff did not demonstrate what additional rental payments were owed, so defendant had no further obligation to pay damages for loss of use. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff was fully compensated under the rental agreement, and judgment was affirmed. Performance Mach. Co., Inc. v. Yellowstone Mtn. Club, LLC, 2007 MT 250, 339 M 259, 169 P3d 394 (2007).

Objective Determination of Whether Ambiguity Exists in Contract — Ambiguity Not Created by Disagreement Over Interpretation of Contract Language: The determination whether an ambiguity exists in a contract is made on an objective basis. A conclusion of ambiguity is not compelled by the fact that parties to a document, or their attorneys, have or suggest opposing interpretations of a contract or even disagree as to whether the contract is reasonably open to just one interpretation, nor does ambiguity exist just because a claimant says so. Rather, an ambiguity exists only if the language is susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. In the present case, plaintiffs' backup position was that language in a right-of-way contract was ambiguous, but the three circumstances proffered by plaintiffs, even when considered collectively, did not demonstrate that the contract language was susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. Thus, the trial court did not err in concluding that the language was unambiguous, which was in fact plaintiffs' primary position. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), followed in Wills Cattle Co. v. Shaw, 2007 MT 191, 338 M 351, 167 P3d 397 (2007).

Right-of-Way Contract Granting Language Unambiguous — Summary Judgment Proper: The District Court found that language in a right-of-way contract: (1) granted defendants an easement to bury a fiber optic cable on plaintiffs' land together with a pipeline; (2) did not limit use of the cable to operating and monitoring the pipeline; and (3) gave defendants the right to assign any of their rights, in whole or in part, to any third party. The language was unambiguous, and the court correctly applied the language as written and properly granted summary judgment to defendants. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Y2K Computer Problems Considered Faulty Design and Inherent Vice — Insurance Coverage Precluded by Policy Exclusions: The state filed insurance claims related to remediation of problems associated with the Y2K transition. The claims were denied, and the state sued. The District Court held that the claims were precluded from coverage by policy language that excluded coverage for damage caused by faulty design and inherent vice. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. An inherent vice is an existing defect, disease, or decay or the inherent nature of a commodity that will cause it to deteriorate over time and also means a loss not covered by a policy that is not related to an extraneous cause but to a loss entirely from internal decomposition or some quality that brings about its own injury or destruction and that must be inherent in the property for which recovery is sought. The state's Y2K problem was an excluded inherent vice because the date field was an inherent problem that brought about its own problem. The faulty design and inherent vice policy exclusions were not ambiguous and clearly excluded the claimed losses. Even though the state did not receive copies of the policies, the policies were renewals of existing policies that contained identical coverage provisions and exclusions, so the state could not reasonably claim that it was unaware of the relevant policy terms and exclusions, and the insurer could rely on valid exclusions in the policy when the state had notice of the exclusions. St. v. Allendale Mut. Ins. Co., 2007 MT 83, 337 M 49, 154 P3d 1233 (2007), following Port of Seattle v. Lexington Ins. Co., 48 P3d 334 (Wash. App. 2002), and GTE Corp. v. Allendale Mut. Ins. Co., 372 F3d 598 (3rd Cir. 2004).

Plain Contract Language Establishing Operating Agreement Rather Than Franchise Agreement — Summary Judgment Proper: Defendant ran residential care facilities for plaintiff and asserted that the parties' contract established a franchise allowing defendant to collect franchise fees and royalties. The District Court found that although there were contractual obligations between the parties, there was no evidence of privity between the parties and no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether a franchise existed, so plaintiff was entitled to summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined the plain language of the contract and determined that there was no special meaning ascribed to the term "franchise", that the contract was essentially an operating agreement rather than a franchise agreement, and that no ambiguity was created concerning defendant's rights to collect franchise fees and royalties. No fact question regarding the parties intention existed, so summary judgment was proper, and the District Court was affirmed. SVKV, L.L.C. v. Harding, 2006 MT 297, 334 M 395, 148 P3d 584 (2006).

Contract Interpretation Applicable to Restrictive Covenants — How Ambiguity Resolved — Restrictive Covenants Strictly Construed: General rules of contract interpretation apply to restrictive covenants, and any person having an interest under a restrictive covenant may seek declaratory relief concerning any question of construction arising under the covenant. When a restrictive covenant has been reduced to writing, the intent of the parties is to be ascertained, when possible, from the writing alone, and when the language of a covenant is clear, a court must apply the language as written. Restrictive covenants are strictly construed, and ambiguities in covenants are resolved to allow free use of property. The determination of whether an ambiguity exists in a restrictive covenant is a question of law for a court to decide, but mere disagreement between the parties as to interpretation of a restrictive covenant does not automatically create an ambiguity. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006). See also Newman v. Wittmer, 277 M 1, 917 P2d 926 (1996), and Toavs v. Sayre, 281 M 243, 934 P2d 165 (1997).

Payment of Actual Costs and Discretionary Attorney Fees Under Contract: A real estate contract provided that the award of reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party was discretionary with the court and also provided that the prevailing party was entitled to actual costs. The District Court deducted fees and costs related to actions in which plaintiff did not prevail, resulting in a reduction of both attorney fees and costs. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the attorney fee award as an appropriate exercise of the District Court's discretion, but reversed the reduced award of costs because plaintiff was entitled to actual costs under the contract. Gullett v. Van Dyke Constr. Co., 2005 MT 105, 327 M 30, 111 P3d 220 (2005).

Coverage Under Products Completed Operations Hazard Policy Inapplicable When Work Never Completed: Defendant had a products completed operations hazard policy with plaintiff insurer that triggered coverage when all contracted work was completed or when part of the work completed was put to its intended use but future service, maintenance, correction, repair, or replacement might be required. A complaint against defendant alleged that despite repeated requests and promises, the work in question was never completed. Because the work was not completed, materials were not installed, labor was not performed, and the system that was installed was inadequate for the intended purpose, coverage pursuant to defendant's products completed operations hazard policy did not apply. The reasonable expectations doctrine was also inapplicable because the policy language excluded such coverage. Generali-U.S. Branch v. Alexander, 2004 MT 81, 320 M 450, 87 P3d 1000 (2004), following Wellcome v. Home Ins. Co., 257 M 354, 849 P2d 190 (1993).

Dispute Over Contract to Deliver Log Home — No Requirement That Seller Provide Name of Third Party Boom Truck Operator — Rescission Proper Remedy for Material Breach of Contract: Anderson agreed to purchase a log home from Eschenbacher. The home was designed to be constructed on Anderson's homesite. Eschenbacher drafted the purchase contract, which provided that Eschenbacher would act only as a manufacturer, not as a building contractor, and also required Anderson to coordinate and ensure availability of a boom truck to assemble the structure at the site. Anderson contacted a third party to supply a boom truck instead of using Eschenbacher's truck. Eschenbacher then refused to deliver the logs unless Anderson supplied the name of the other boom truck operator. Both parties sued for breach of contract. The District Court concluded that Anderson was under no duty to provide Eschenbacher with the name of the boom truck operator, and the Supreme Court agreed. The contract clearly placed the responsibility for acquiring a boom truck with Anderson, but did not require Eschenbacher to use it, because other language required Anderson to pay any expenses incurred by Eschenbacher for waiting once the logs were delivered, if, for instance, the boom truck that Anderson provided was inadequate. Construing the contract most strongly against the drafter, Eschenbacher, the court found that Eschenbacher could easily have inserted provisions in the contract regarding specifications of an adequate boom truck, but he did not. Eschenbacher materially breached the contract by refusing to deliver the logs until the boom truck dispute was settled. The contract did not specify a remedy; thus, the District Court did not err in granting Anderson rescission of the contract. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Ambiguity of Term "Purchaser's Profit" in Real Estate Sales Contract — Special Meaning Not Ascribed to Ambiguous Term: The District Court determined that the language in a contract for deed was ambiguous because it failed to define the term "purchaser's profit", a term that was material to a promise to share profits on resale of the property. The court then went on to find that the term had a special meaning that did not allow for deduction of the buyers' sales costs and the costs of improvements. On appeal, defendants argued that the term referred to the net profit from the sale, meaning the selling price minus the purchase price as well as the sales costs and improvement costs. Plaintiffs contended that the term referred to the gross profit from the sale, meaning the selling price minus only the purchase price. The Supreme Court found that the term could reasonably be subject to either interpretation and was thus ambiguous. Further, the District Court's finding that the term had a special meaning completely contradicted its holding that the phrase was ambiguous. Construing the ambiguity against plaintiffs, who drafted the language, the Supreme Court construed the term in its ordinary rather than special meaning and allowed defendants to deduct the ordinary costs directly associated with the sale of the property, but not the costs of the improvements because no mention was made of any additional sums to be paid to acquire improvements. The Supreme Court also agreed with both parties that the District Court erred in determining the sum that defendants should be allowed to deduct as their purchase price in calculating the purchaser's profit because the sum did not reflect what was actually paid for the property. The Supreme Court arrived at its own calculation of the purchaser's profit and remanded for proceedings consistent with its calculations. Ophus v. Fritz, 2000 MT 251, 301 M 447, 11 P3d 1192, 57 St. Rep. 1037 (2000).

Shareholders' Agreement Enforceable Independent of Stock Exchange — Different Intent Contained in Separate Agreements Separately Enforceable: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay, contending that an earlier merger transaction and the subsequent shareholders' agreement should be read together and citing Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979), for the proposition that when construing an agreement that is part of a larger transaction, the intention of the parties must be determined by examining the entirety of the larger transaction. However, Rumph was distinguishable here because all the agreements in question occurred at different times and did not reference or depend upon each other. Each agreement was clear and unambiguous. Under Gerdes v. Omaha Home for Boys, 89 NW 2d 849 (Nebr. 1958), a court may not avoid the language of a complete, unambiguous contract by consolidating it with another writing if the effect of doing so would be to avoid an essential part of the contract. The District Court properly concluded that the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

No District Court Jurisdiction to Grant Summary Judgment When Dispute Subject to Arbitration: A condition of Burkhart's employment agreement with Semitool, Inc. (Semitool), was that employment disputes would be subject to Montana law and the Uniform Arbitration Act. After 8 months of employment, Burkhart was terminated. He later brought suit against Semitool, alleging that: (1) he had been terminated without good cause; (2) his termination was in retaliation for his refusal to violate public policy; (3) Semitool's opposition to his application for unemployment benefits was without probable cause and motivated by malice; and (4) representations made to him prior to employment were deceptive and motivated by malice, contained misrepresentations, and included false advertisements concerning the kind or character of the employment. In its answer, Semitool demanded arbitration, and Burkhart accepted the arbitration offer on the first two issues. The parties agreed that because trade secrets were involved, the record would be sealed and hearings closed to the public to avoid disclosure of confidential information. Semitool then moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim or, alternatively, to compel arbitration of all four claims. The District Court converted the motion to dismiss into a motion for summary judgment and held a hearing to discuss both motions, after which it granted summary judgment to Semitool and dismissed all four claims. The court determined that because proof of the allegations in the complaint would require disclosure of confidential attorney-client matters and because violation of the attorney-client privilege prejudiced the public interest, that prejudice was a proper ground upon which to invalidate the arbitration agreement. Burkhart appealed. On appeal, the Supreme Court cited 39-2-914 and Ratchye v. Lucas, 1998 MT 87, 288 M 345, 957 P2d 1128 (1998), as controlling. Once an offer to arbitrate has been accepted, neither the District Court nor the parties have a right to continue the lawsuit. The exception relating to the public interest pertains to the validity of the arbitration agreement, not to the merits of the underlying dispute. Thus, the District Court erred in deciding the merits of the issues because it lacked jurisdiction to do so once the parties agreed to arbitrate. Summary judgment was reversed and the claims were remanded for arbitration. Burkhart v. Semitool, Inc., 2000 MT 201, 300 M 480, 5 P3d 1031, 57 St. Rep. 785 (2000).

Title Insurer Not Obligated to Search City Engineer or Water Department Records — Public Records as Properly Recorded Documents — Reasonable Expectations Doctrine Inapplicable: The Millers sought to hold a title insurance company responsible for costs involved in relocating a neighbor's water and sewer lines that were discovered on the property. The lines were of record with the city engineer and the water department, but their existence was not recorded in the chain of title. The title insurance policy defined public records as "those records which by law impart constructive notice of matters relating to said land". The Supreme Court held that the definition was unambiguous and clearly related to records filed and docketed with the County Clerk and Recorder because it was proper recordation that imparted constructive notice of matters relating to the property. Nothing in Montana recordation law required the title insurer to search city engineer or water department records. For the same reason, the Millers' attempt to apply the reasonable expectations doctrine also failed because the policy did not insure against loss or damage by reason of "easements, or claims of easements, not shown by the public records". Miller v. Title Ins. Co. of Minn., 1999 MT 230, 296 M 115, 987 P2d 1151, 56 St. Rep. 908 (1999). See also Am. Family Mut. Ins. Co. v. Livengood, 1998 MT 329, 292 M 244, 970 P2d 1054, 55 St. Rep. 1336 (1998).

Reservation of Single Right-of-Way Over Existing Private Road — No Ambiguity or Conflict With Intended Access: The District Court determined that a reservation of rights in a 1965 deed was ambiguous because the reservation of rights over a single roadway conflicted with the grantors' intent to reserve as many means as possible to their remaining property in a mountainous area. Ambiguities in a reservation of rights in any grant of property are to be construed in favor of the grantor; however, the breadth and scope of an easement are determined upon the actual terms of the contract. The easement in this case was described as "a right of way" over "an existing private road which extends across" the servient tenement "for the use and benefit of Section 3 and [parts] of Section 34". That language indicated the use to which the easement would be put, not the scope of the easement itself. The Supreme Court found that the reservation of rights was not ambiguous; rather, the language restricting the easement to a single right-of-way over an existing private road did not conflict with the intended use of the easement to benefit the grantors' remaining properties, nor did the grantors' intent override any limitation of the singular use of the word "road" in the reservation. Van Hook v. Jennings, 1999 MT 198, 295 M 409, 983 P2d 995, 56 St. Rep. 767 (1999).

Vehicle Not Considered Utility Trailer if Not Being Towed — Liability Coverage Not Extended: George parked his fifth-wheel trailer on the shoulder of a road, unattached to a towing vehicle. A person driving on the road collided with the trailer and subsequently filed an action against George for damages for bodily injury and property damage resulting from the collision. George submitted a claim with his insurer requesting liability coverage. The insurer denied coverage and requested a determination that it had no obligation to defend George or pay any damage award, based on the definition of "utility trailer" in the policy. The policy defined a utility trailer as "a vehicle designed to be towed by a private passenger car or farm car, including a farm wagon or farm implement, while towed by a private passenger car, utility car, or farm car". The District Court correctly determined that George's trailer was not a utility trailer because it was not being towed by another vehicle at the time of the accident, so coverage was excluded. Based on the clear policy language, the Supreme Court affirmed. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co. v. George, 1998 MT 205, 290 M 386, 963 P2d 1259, 55 St. Rep. 873 (1998).

Rules Agreed Upon in Settlement Agreement as Binding Upon Arbitration: Parties agreed in a settlement agreement that controversies would be settled pursuant to the Commercial Arbitration Rules of the American Arbitration Association. A contention by one party that arbitration under those rules would be less efficient, slower, or more expensive than arbitration under Montana's Uniform Arbitration Act was immaterial. The parties were required to arbitrate according to the rules specifically designated in the settlement agreement. Ratchye v. Lucas, 1998 MT 87, 288 M 345, 957 P2d 1128, 55 St. Rep. 354 (1998).

Attorney Fees Payable Under Clear Language of Contract — Costs Awarded as Matter of Course: It was error for the trial court to order the parties to pay their own attorney fees and costs when the clear and unambiguous language of the property sale contract in question provided that plaintiffs, as the successful party, were entitled to recover fees. Further, under 25-10-101, plaintiffs were entitled to the award of court costs, as a matter of course, by virtue of receiving judgment in their favor. Quigley v. Acker, 1998 MT 72, 288 M 190, 955 P2d 1377, 55 St. Rep. 295 (1998).

Five Agreements Constituting Integrated Sales Agreement With Condition Precedent — Overriding Previous Partnership Agreements and Providing for Attorney Fees: Daines argued that of the five agreements executed by the parties, the option agreement should have been read separately and interpreted as an option to buy conferring a privilege but not imposing an obligation and that on that basis, he could not be liable for not completing a purchase agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly looked at the five agreements as a whole in interpreting the parties' intent and had correctly concluded that the agreements constituted an integrated sales agreement subject to conditions precedent. The Supreme Court further held that since the five agreements constituted a sales agreement, they superseded the previous partnership agreements. The respondents were not liable for capital contributions as partners, and the default provision in the option agreement providing for attorney fees did apply to the agreement created by all five of the documents executed by the parties. Daines v. Knight, 269 M 320, 888 P2d 904, 52 St. Rep. 8 (1995).

Insurance Contract:

Waller's injuries arose out of the operation and use of an aircraft, but he was not a residence employee or farm employee at the time. Policy coverage was explicitly excluded for bodily injury arising from the ownership, maintenance, operation, use, loading, or unloading of aircraft. The clear language of the contract exempted the airplane accident from coverage. Summary judgment on the issue of policy inapplicability was proper. Truck Ins. Exch. v. Waller, 252 M 328, 828 P2d 1384, 49 St. Rep. 318 (1992), followed in Wellcome v. Home Ins. Co., 257 M 354, 849 P2d 190, 50 St. Rep. 305 (1993).

Even though auto dealer remained record owner of automobile after its sale by his failure to send proper certificates to Registrar of Motor Vehicles, dealer's liability insurance policy, which was limited in its coverage by clear and explicit language, did not insure motorist who had purchased vehicle. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co. v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 166 M 128, 531 P2d 668 (1975).

Inability of insurer to write malpractice insurance in state and fact that insured carried malpractice insurance with another company could not be considered in determining intentions of parties to comprehensive liability insurance policy, since policy was unambiguous. Home Ins. Co. v. Pinski Bros., Inc., 156 M 246, 479 P2d 274 (1971).

Improper Modification of Maintenance Awarded "For Life": The District Court modified a property settlement agreement, which provided that the wife receive $300 a month "as maintenance for life" in lieu of property for which she was to receive income, after husband unilaterally discontinued maintenance when wife began receiving social security payments. The maintenance agreement was a plain and unambiguous contract between the parties that was not subject to later interpretation or construction by a court. The agreement was drawn up by husband, a practicing attorney, who clearly understood the meaning of the term "for life". The District Court erred in modifying the agreement, absent a showing of substantial credible evidence that modification was warranted, without considering all necessary information in the original settlement agreement. In re Marriage of McKeon, 252 M 15, 826 P2d 537, 49 St. Rep. 127 (1992), followed in In re Marriage of Woodford, 254 M 501, 839 P2d 574, 49 St. Rep. 887 (1992).

Parked Trailers Unattached to Insured Tractors — No Coverage Under Unambiguous Policy Provisions: The District Court found an insurance policy to be ambiguous regarding coverage for trailers that had been used to haul beer but that were parked and used for storage at the time they were accidentally run into and granted summary judgment for insurer based on that ambiguity. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in policy language that clearly covered only trailers that were attached to an insured tractor. Citing its authority in Hereford v. Hereford, 183 M 104, 598 P2d 600 (1979), the Supreme Court reversed and granted summary judgment to the nonmoving party based on the fact that the unambiguous policy language created no genuine issue of material fact. Canal Ins. Co. v. Bunday, 249 M 100, 813 P2d 974, 48 St. Rep. 597 (1991).

Contingency to Exist in Language of Agreement: The plaintiff held a security interest in 50% of the stock of a business as security for a promissory note from her ex-husband. The defendants wanted to purchase the entire business and executed a promissory note to the plaintiff for her interest. Thereafter, the defendants were unable to complete the purchase and sought a declaratory ruling that the promissory note with the plaintiff was contingent on their being able to acquire full ownership of the business. The lower court ruled that the note was contingent on purchase of the remaining interest, but the Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that the lower court could not look beyond the four corners of the document. Bain v. Williams, 245 M 228, 800 P2d 693, 47 St. Rep. 2049 (1990).

Commission as Evidence of Fiduciary Relationship — Rescission by Principal: The District Court did not err in relying on the explicit definition of the word "commission" in finding that a real estate agent who was granted a commission for the sale of a resort while intending to be one of the ultimate purchasers was acting in a fiduciary capacity in his relationship with the principal. Because the relationship existed, the sales agreement was voidable and subject to rescission by the principal. Boyne, U.S.A., Inc. v. Mallas, 236 M 305, 769 P2d 1235, 46 St. Rep. 380 (1989).

Obligation to Veracity of Warrant by Party Drafting It: Real estate was conveyed to plaintiff by "special warranty deed", drafted by defendant, which warrant defendant claimed limited liability to defendant's own acts. It was argued that because defendant did not cause latent defects, liability did not attach. However, by warranting the house, defendant contractually obligated itself to the veracity of the warrant. Because plaintiff relied on defendant's misrepresentations to her detriment, defendant was held liable for the latent defects. Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

Assignment of Estate Rights — Certificate of Deposit Held by Surviving Joint Tenant Not Transferred: A $10,000 certificate of deposit (C.D.) held by a surviving joint tenant was properly not included as an asset of the estate; therefore, a transfer and assignment of the tenant's right, title, and interest in the estate did not affect the C.D., of which tenant was sole owner upon the death of the nonsurviving joint tenant. Yellowstone Bank of Absarokee v. Morse, 226 M 126, 733 P2d 1310, 44 St. Rep. 524 (1987).

Issue of Authorship of Agreement Not Precluding Summary Judgment Where Agreement Not Ambiguous: Where the plaintiffs brought an action for default of a mining lease, arguing that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded by the ambiguity of the lease and a dispute as to its authorship, the Supreme Court held that the provisions governing royalty payments were not ambiguous, that authorship was therefore irrelevant, and that summary judgment was properly granted. The plaintiffs' interpretation of the agreement was absurd because that interpretation required payment of royalties before net smelter returns were received or before the royalties themselves could be calculated. The time and method of calculation of payment by the defendants were entirely consistent with the terms of the parties' agreement. Reading the agreement as a whole, there was no factual issue to preclude summary judgment. Lewis v. St., 207 M 361, 675 P2d 107, 41 St. Rep. 9 (1984).

Intent Clear — No Need to Interpret: Courts have no authority to change a contract when its intent is clear. Courts do interpret contracts when an ambiguity exists. An ambiguity exists when the contract taken as a whole in its wording or phraseology is reasonably subject to two different interpretations. No ambiguity exists in the clause in question in this case. The first sentence states the intent of the clause. The formula following dictates how the intent shall be accomplished. Taken as a whole, the contract is reasonably subject to only one interpretation. The formula is clear and express. Courts may not disregard the express language of a contract. Therefore the District Court properly adopted the formula contained in the clause. Lemley v.

Bozeman Community Hotel Co., 200 M 470, 651 P2d 979, 39 St. Rep. 1877 (1982), followed in N.H. Ins. Group v. Strecker, 244 M 478, 798 P2d 130, 47 St. Rep. 1736 (1990). See also Brigham Young Univ. v. Seman, 206 M 440, 672 P2d 15, 40 St. Rep. 1767 (1983), and Farmers Union Mut. Ins. v. Kienenberger, 257 M 107, 847 P2d 1360, 50 St. Rep. 179 (1993).

Termination of Lease — Use of Appraisal in Arriving at Value: Defendant leased a truck from plaintiff and later defaulted on the lease. A paragraph of the lease provided that "Upon premature termination, lessor shall promptly obtain the highest available cash offer at wholesale. . .". In a suit to collect amounts owing, the District Court relied upon appraisals obtained by plaintiff and disregarded the actual purchase price of the leased vehicle. The Supreme Court held that sufficient testimony was introduced on the value of the vehicle, and the District Court's use of a "wholesale value" and "retail value" in arriving at the figure used was within the meaning of the leasing agreement. R & W Leasing v. Mosher, 195 M 285, 636 P2d 832, 38 St. Rep. 1857 (1981).

Language Plain and Unambiguous — Language Controls — Nothing to Interpret or Construe: In a dispute involving a real estate listing contract where the contract was plain and unambiguous, 1-4-102 is irrelevant. When the language is plain and unambiguous, the language alone controls and there is nothing for the court to interpret or construe. Section 1-4-102 applies when an ambiguity exists in the language of the contract. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981), clarified in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Language of Lease Controlling on Payment of Property Taxes: In an action for breach of a lease of certain commercial property, the District Court did not err in granting the plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment, finding the defendants liable for payment of property taxes on the leased property. The District Court granted the motion only by finding that the lease and option to purchase agreement entered into by the parties required the defendants to make the payments. The agreement specifically provided for the payments in clear and unambiguous terms and did not condition payment of the taxes upon exercise of the option. As the language of the contract is clear, its terms must be given effect. Ragen v. Weston, 191 M 546, 625 P2d 557, 38 St. Rep. 456 (1981).

Custody Agreement Interpreted as Contract — No Contempt Found Under Joint Custody Agreement: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement for the joint custody of their three children and the agreement was incorporated into a decree divorcing the parties, the trial court committed reversible error in finding, upon a later petition by the plaintiff for modification of the divorce decree, that the decree granted custody of the children to the defendant and in holding the plaintiff in contempt for her custody of one of the children. Agreements for the dissolution of marriage are to be interpreted by the law of contracts, and the language of the agreement controls if it is clear and unambiguous. The plaintiff committed no contemptuous act by retaining custody of one child under a joint custody agreement. Quinn v. Quinn, 191 M 133, 622 P2d 230, 38 St. Rep. 93 (1981).

Employment Contract Controls: There was no need for further interpretation or parol evidence of an employment contract which expressly exempted appellant from recovering overtime compensation. There was no need for construction of any implied contract since there can be no express and implied contract for the same thing existing at the same time. Thus, summary judgment was appropriate. Weston v. Mont. Highway Comm'n, 186 M 46, 606 P2d 150 (1980).

Contract for Joint Purchase of Property — Construction of Contract as a Whole: Where the appellant and respondent entered into an agreement whereby the respondent agreed to loan appellant the downpayment for the purchase of real property on a contract for deed, the District Court correctly looked to the clear language of the instrument as a whole to determine the intention of the parties, and phrases relied on by the appellant would not be taken out of context to reach the result urged by the appellant. Downs v. Smyk, 185 M 16, 604 P2d 307 (1979).

Property Settlement Agreement: The property settlement agreement between Molly and Keith Herrin contained a qualified assignment of stocks to Molly Herrin. The agreement said that if Keith, Jr., died while there was any money or property in any trust, then the trust will cease and all property and income of the trust will revert to Keith Herrin and become his sole property. Keith, Jr., died but no trust existed since a trust was to be established only if Molly died or remarried during Keith, Jr.'s lifetime. Neither of these events occurred. The Supreme Court found that the stocks belonged to Molly after the death of Keith, Jr. Herrin v. Herrin, 182 M 142, 595 P2d 1152 (1979).

Intent Irrelevant if Agreement Clear and Specific — Subordination: Summary judgment is correct when subordination agreement does not present an issue of fact. The plain and clear meaning of the instrument controls and the intent of the parties is ascertained from the instrument. Batey Land & Livestock Co. v. Nixon, 172 M 99, 560 P2d 1334 (1977).

Unambiguous Contract — No Restriction on Use by Life Tenant: Court erred in imposing a restriction on the use of premises when life tenant was granted the right to use premises "as he may deem fit". Danielson v. Danielson, 172 M 55, 560 P2d 893 (1977).

Profit Sharing Agreement: When the intent of the contracting parties was clear from the contract itself that plaintiff was to receive 6% of the gross income of the business without regard to operating gain or deficit, the defendant could not assert a defense that performance of the contract was impossible due to a lack of funds after payment of business debts and expenses. Veterans Rehab. Center v. Birrer, 170 M 182, 551 P2d 1001 (1976).

Lease Modification Must Be Supported by Adequate Consideration: When lessee was entitled to two-thirds of all grain crops harvested, lessor-purchaser's claim that crop belonged to his seller was without merit because the lease was plain and unambiguous and needed no construction. Under the terms of the lease proof of adequate consideration is required to force the lessee to remake that portion of the lease requiring him to give up his two-thirds share. Edwards v. Peavey Co., 170 M 45, 549 P2d 1082 (1976).

Wheat Crop: Unambiguous provision in insurance policy stating that the insurance company agreed to pay all damages which the insured was obligated to pay resulting from injury to tangible property applied to negligent sale of winter wheat seed instead of spring wheat seed, since wheat field and crops were tangible property. Safeco Ins. Co. v. Munroe, 165 M 185, 527 P2d 64 (1974).

Verbal Clarity:

Restrictive covenant giving lessee exclusive right to operate drugstore did not extend to property beyond the plot described in the lease, and summary judgment for lessor was properly granted because the intent of the parties at the time they entered into the agreement was reduced to writing and expressed in clear and explicit language that the exclusive covenant applied to "the entire premises covered by the plans and specifications". Matteucci's Super Save Drug v. Hustad Corp., 158 M 311, 491 P2d 705 (1971).

Clause in disability insurance policy which provided that benefits were payable only in cases involving continuous and total disability within 30 days of date of accident preventing performance of every duty pertaining to insured's occupation precluded insured from recovering benefits under policy where he had returned to work and was able to perform part of his duties since, under this section, language of contract governs its interpretation if language is clear and explicit and as matter of law insured did not come within policy coverage. Nelson v. Combined Ins. Co. of Am., 155 M 105, 467 P2d 707 (1970).

Intention Ascertained From Language: Although a contract of insurance should be construed liberally in favor of insured and strictly against the insurer, contracts of insurance should be given a fair and reasonable construction. In arriving at such construction, no matter how strictly construed against the insurer, the intention of both insurer and insured should be ascertained from the language of the policy. Kansas City Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Clark, 217 F. Supp. 231 (D.C. Mont. 1963), affirmed in 329 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1964).

Crop-Share Agreement: Where contract provided that farm laborer would be paid $150 per month cash, would get 10% of the harvested crops after harvest, and would be expected to stay for a 12-month period, he was entitled to his share of the crop due on his crop-share agreement when wheat and barley were placed in storage at elevator although safflower, in which laborer did not share, had not been cut. Failure of employer to pay laborer's share on demand constituted a breach of contract and it was not necessary for laborer to complete the 12-month term in order to recover his percentage of the crops. Laughnan v. Sorenson, 139 M 531, 366 P2d 433 (1961).

Release: As against the contention that a release given by a claimant to one tortfeasor did not release the other joint tortfeasors because no consideration moved from the others to the plaintiff, and that they were not parties thereto, where the release expressly recited its purpose and intention and showed on its face full satisfaction of the claim arising out of the accident as against all, it was not necessary that consideration move from the other tortfeasors to the claimant, and these matters could not controvert the clear, unambiguous language of the release under this section. Lisoski v. Anderson, 112 M 112, 112 P2d 1055 (1941).

Language Taken as a Whole: In the construction of a contract its language is to be resorted to in the first instance, but the conclusion to be reached depends not upon the verbal clarity of the particular sentences or paragraphs but upon the view to be taken of it in its entirety. Roecher v. Commercial Nat'l Bank, 87 M 570, 289 P 388 (1930).

Court Not to Make New Contract:

Where no legal impediment is shown which would have prevented parties to a contract from entering into it or from expressing it in language of their own, courts must give effect to the meaning and intention of the parties as expressed in the language employed and may not make a new contract for them. The mere fact that as made the contract may appear unreasonable, burdensome, or unwise to one of them is insufficient to avoid it, where the latter party was of legal age, had all the facts clearly before him long prior to its execution, and his alleged damage was due to his own inattention and carelessness. Hinerman v. Baldwin, 67 M 417, 215 P 1103 (1923).

It is the province of courts to interpret contracts which are open to interpretation, not to make new ones for the parties, or to alter or amend those which they themselves have made. Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co. v. Raugstad, 65 M 297, 211 P 305 (1922).

Case Notes

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Whether Dam Operation Damaged Lakeshore Properties — Summary Judgment Improper — Class Action Vacated: Flathead Lake landowners brought a class action suit against defendant operators of Kerr Dam for operating outside the scope of their easements in a manner that continuously eroded and damaged plaintiffs' lakeshore properties. The District Court rejected plaintiffs' argument that the dam operator was not allowed to affect plaintiffs' properties above an elevation of 2,893 feet, concluding instead that defendants' easements covered entire parcels. The court concluded that erosion, including wave action erosion, was within the scope of the easements and held that any duty defendants had to not cause unreasonable damage to plaintiffs' properties applied only to damage unrelated to use of the easement. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court first agreed that the District Court's contour line theory was correct. The "2,893 feet" clause did not establish the vertical limit argued by plaintiffs because although the dam operators' right to flood, subirrigate, drain, or otherwise affect the shoreline was not unlimited, it was not restricted to a maximum elevation of 2,893 feet at each parcel, but rather extended to whatever part of each parcel was affected when the lake was held at 2,893 feet above mean sea level as measured at the dam. The court also agreed that the right to cause some erosion was necessary to the enjoyment of the right to perpetually flood, subirrigate, and drain and was thus included by implication in the easements. However, further factual development and trial were necessary to address the question of whether the erosion was reasonable, necessary, and within the scope of the easements, which could not be resolved by summary judgment. Additionally, the question of whether defendants breached their obligation to not cause unreasonable damage to the shoreline properties and to not unreasonably interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment also required further factual development and possibly trial. Therefore, the order certifying the case as a class action was vacated and the case was remanded for further consideration. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2009 MT 286, 352 M 212, 215 P3d 675 (2009).

No Ambiguity in Complete, Final Sales Agreement — Parol Evidence Inadmissible: The parties entered a sale agreement for a ready-mix concrete plant. Plaintiff subsequently filed an action alleging that defendant violated the agreement by breaching the covenant to not compete and the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which constituted malice resulting in lost profits, sales, and goodwill. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly concluded that the sales agreement constituted a complete, final agreement and unambiguously did not include a noncompetition provision, but in fact provided that plaintiff would sell concrete to defendant for use in the area. The intention of the parties was ascertainable from the writing alone, and the agreement was presumed to represent all transactions regarding elements extrinsic to the agreement and was thus considered complete and final, so parol evidence was inadmissible. Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009). See also Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920 (1990), and Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest States, Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Instrument Made Admissible for Determining Ambiguity: As a general rule, evidence of the circumstances under which an instrument was made may not be considered when the language of the instrument is clear and certain in its terms. However, objective evidence of those circumstances, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and the parties to it, may be shown and considered to aid the court in determining, as a preliminary matter, whether the instrument contains an ambiguity. If the court determines that no ambiguity exists, then the extrinsic evidence may not be considered further, but if the court determines that an ambiguity is present in the instrument, then the extrinsic evidence may be introduced at trial to allow the trier of fact to determine the intent of the parties in entering into the contract. In the present case, both parties agreed that language in a right-of-way contract was unambiguous, so the trial court did not err in refusing to consider the circumstances under which the contract was made. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007). See 11 Williston on Contracts, 33:39 (4th Ed. 1999).

Use of Phrase "Together With" in Contract Not Considered Limiting Language: The contract for a utility right-of-way granted defendants the right to construct, maintain, and operate a pipeline for the transportation of oil, liquids, and gases "together with" a buried fiber optic communications cable. The right-of-way landowners contended that the phrase "together with" unambiguously limited the use of the cable to operating and monitoring the pipeline and precluded defendants from leasing part of the cable to a third party for telecommunication purposes. The District Court disagreed, holding that the phrase meant nothing more than "and", rather than plaintiffs' limiting interpretation "in connection with", and granted summary judgment for defendants. The landowners appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The term "together with" in the granting language did not unambiguously limit defendants' use of the fiber optic cable to operating and monitoring the pipeline. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Five Agreements Constituting Integrated Sales Agreement With Condition Precedent — Overriding Previous Partnership Agreements and Providing for Attorney Fees: Daines argued that of the five agreements executed by the parties, the option agreement should have been read separately and interpreted as an option to buy conferring a privilege but not imposing an obligation and that on that basis, he could not be liable for not completing a purchase agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly looked at the five agreements as a whole in interpreting the parties' intent and had correctly concluded that the agreements constituted an integrated sales agreement subject to conditions precedent. The Supreme Court further held that since the five agreements constituted a sales agreement, they superseded the previous partnership agreements. The respondents were not liable for capital contributions as partners, and the default provision in the option agreement providing for attorney fees did apply to the agreement created by all five of the documents executed by the parties. Daines v. Knight, 269 M 320, 888 P2d 904, 52 St. Rep. 8 (1995).

Sufficient Evidence to Establish Contract for Line of Credit: The execution of a promissory note and the procurement by the bank of a contract of guarantee issued by the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) pointed to and confirmed an agreement between plaintiffs and the bank for a line of credit, despite bank's contention that the contract of guarantee was between the bank and FmHA and created no obligation on bank's part to loan money to plaintiffs. Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988), distinguished in Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988), and in Lachenmaier v. First Bank Sys., Inc., 246 M 26, 803 P2d 614, 47 St. Rep. 2244 (1990).

Commission Agreement Found Unambiguous — Use of Extrinsic Evidence to Prove Lack of Ambiguity Upheld: Where the defendant seller of real estate made a commission agreement with the plaintiff providing for payment of the commission out of the receipts from the contract for deed, the District Court did not err in holding that money received by the defendant under a modification of the contract for deed could not be used to calculate the amount of commission owed to the plaintiff. The terms of the commission contract were not ambiguous and show that it was the intent of the parties to count only that money received under the original agreement. The District Court properly looked to the terms of the contract for deed only to determine whether an ambiguity existed in the commission agreement, and having determined there was none, properly excluded other evidence of the parties' intent in making the commission agreement. Martin v. Community Gas & Oil Co., 205 M 394, 668 P2d 243, 40 St. Rep. 1385 (1983).

Contract Provisions Ascertainable by Conduct of Parties: Where electrical contractor submitted a bid on a job based not on written specifications but on a previous similar job and the previous pattern of conduct between the parties indicated that both parties contemplated the rendering of particular services and materials, contract was not so ambiguous as to render its object wholly unascertainable. Mathis v. Daines, 196 M 252, 639 P2d 503, 39 St. Rep. 73 (1982).

Written and Oral Real Property Agreements — No Timing of Valuation Provision: The parties were married in 1973. They entered a prenuptial agreement providing that the real and personal property of each would remain separate. In 1974, defendant brought a quiet title action against his sisters. He executed a handwritten agreement with plaintiff that if she would finance the legal expenses of the action he would give her 10% of the land or the value thereof. He was successful, and the parties entered into an oral agreement containing the same provisions for appellate costs. The trial court found that defendant owed plaintiff 20% of the value of the land and that the value was to be determined at the time he elected to pay and be based on 20% of the value of all the land. The Supreme Court held that the defendant, under the clear terms of the written contract, had the option to select the acreage which he wished to convey. The District Court disregarded this language in ordering him to convey the percentage of his land as a whole. Since no contract provision addressed the timing of the valuation of the land and conflicting evidence was presented, the District Court's determination that it be valued at the time of payment was upheld. Kartes v. Kartes, 195 M 383, 636 P2d 272, 38 St. Rep. 1941 (1981).

Termination of Lease — Removal of Holdover Tenant — Agricultural Exception to Landlord-Tenant: Defendant sold plaintiff her property. The instrument contained a lease back to defendant of the buildings and 6 acres. Plaintiff gave notice that the lease was to terminate. Defendant refused to vacate. Plaintiff brought an action under the unlawful detainer statutes which provide for an award of treble damages. Defendant contended the dispute was governed by the Montana Residential Landlord and Tenant Act of 1977. Plaintiff contended the lease was within the "agricultural" exclusion contained in 70-24-104(8). The lease provisions gave no indication of the nature of the buildings or of the intended use of the 6 acres. The trial court allowed the introduction of photographs and oral testimony regarding the lease, which established that the use of the land was for maintenance of defendant's livestock. The trial court properly allowed parol evidence to resolve an ambiguity in the lease. The Supreme Court determined that the legislative intent of 70-24-104 was for a comprehensive coverage of all agricultural operations, whether they are large-scale operations for profit or small-scale operations secondary to the use of the residence. The unlawful detainer provisions were properly applied. Dussault v. Hjelm, 192 M 282, 627 P2d 1237, 38 St. Rep. 738 (1981).

Serious Weight: This section requires that a court give serious weight to the purpose and circumstances leading up to the execution of a contract when the court is required to interpret the language. Energy Oils, Inc. v. Mont. Power Co., 626 F2d 731 (C.A. Mont. 1980).

"Sell or Otherwise Dispose" — Reference to Circumstances to Explain: It was proper for the District Court to look to the circumstances to explain the ambiguous phrase "sell or otherwise dispose". Jappe v. Co-op Supply, Inc., 183 M 397, 600 P2d 184 (1979).

Contract for Lease of Vehicle: When a dispute as to whether a truck which was transferred to defendant was subject to an agreement to lease the truck to defendant, evidence of the conduct of the parties in transferring title to protect the plaintiff from liability and of agreed monthly payments was sufficient to establish a rental agreement. Veterans Rehab. Center v. Birrer, 170 M 182, 551 P2d 1001 (1976).

Contract of Sale:

Substantial credible extrinsic evidence warranted resolution of ambiguity concerning grazing permits in real estate sales contract in favor of buyers who were repeatedly assured during final negotiations that permits would be transferred to them as part of deal. Dooling v. Casey, 152 M 267, 448 P2d 749 (1969).

A telegram, "Wire lowest price you will sell 7,000 S. & W. yearling ewes", and an answering telegram, "Lowest price on S. & W. yearling ewes eleven fifty this subject to immediate acceptance", together with custom and usage and 28-3-201, 28-3-102, and this section, evidenced a complete contract for the sale of the sheep, where defendant's offer was accepted within 24 hours, as against an objection that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties upon the price to be paid for the sheep, in that price could only be determined upon delivery and that the offer was not accepted immediately. Story v. Stanfield, 275 F 401 (9th Cir. 1921).

Evidence explanatory of the circumstances leading up to the making of a written contract of sale as well as of the conversation had between the defendant and plaintiff's agent at the time it was made is admissible under this section. Nat'l Cash Register Co. v. Wall, 58 M 60, 190 P 135 (1920).

Intention of Parties:

Where there is ambiguity in a contract, it is open under this section and 28-3-301 to interpretation by the aid of evidence aliunde, so as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties to it at the time it was made. McNussen v. Graybeal, 146 M 173, 405 P2d 447 (1965); Butte Water Co. v. Butte, 48 M 386, 138 P 195 (1914).

Extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain the true intentions of the parties to an "output" contract since the terms of the contract are ambiguous and such contracts must be interpreted in light of circumstances surrounding prior business dealings. McNussen v. Graybeal, 146 M 173, 405 P2d 477 (1965).

A contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect; it may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made and the matter to which it relates, and however broad may be its terms, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract, particular clauses being subordinate to its general intent. Custer v. Missoula Pub. Serv. Co., 91 M 136, 6 P2d 131 (1931).

Lease: Where there is an uncertainty in a contract it is to be interpreted most strongly against the person who caused the uncertainty to exist. Thus where there was a question as to what were intended to be improvements as contemplated by the $1200 rent provisions of the lease and both the lessor and the lessee gave testimony, it was error for the court to disregard such testimony. Consideration of the improvements made by the lessee should be given by the lower court and the value of these items offset against the rents contemplated. Hempstead v. Allen, 126 M 578, 255 P2d 342 (1953).

Intent Ascertained From Conduct:

In the construction of contracts such as a teacher's contract of employment, courts may look not only to the language employed but to the subject matter and the surrounding circumstances and may avail themselves of the same light which the parties possessed when the contract was made. To ascertain the intention of the parties to a contract, regard must be had to the nature of the instrument, the condition of the parties executing it, the objects which they had in view, and the words employed. If the words are capable of more than one meaning, they are to be given that meaning which it is apparent the parties intended them to have. The practical interpretation of a contract which the parties placed upon it by their course of conduct over a period of years is entitled to great, if not controlling, influence in ascertaining what they understood by its terms. Smith v. School District, 115 M 102, 139 P2d 518 (1943).

Lease was not void for failing to designate the time and place for a division of the crops provided for since under 28-3-102 any uncertainty in that respect was determinable by the custom or usage observed in the vicinity in the light of the surrounding facts and circumstances bearing upon the transaction. McDonald v. McNinch, 63 M 308, 206 P 1096 (1922).

Endorsement of Note: The minutes of a meeting of the Board of Directors of a corporation attested as correct by its president, plaintiff in an action on the corporation's note against endorsers thereon, acquired by plaintiff after maturity, tending to show that plaintiff knew that when the endorsements were made, defendants endorsed as representatives of various farmers' associations and not in their individual capacities, were admissible in support of the defense disclaiming personal responsibility for its payment. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Application of Section:

In an action by the payee of a promissory note against the maker, it was a valid defense that the note was delivered upon the condition that the maker should not be held liable thereon, pursuant to a written agreement between the parties, and in support of the plea evidence of the circumstances leading up to the making of the agreement and resulting in the delivery of the note was admissible. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Chappell, 71 M 553, 230 P 1084 (1924).

While in the interpretation of a contract, the language of which is ambiguous and uncertain, the attending circumstances may be examined to determine its proper construction, this may not be done where its language is clear and unambiguous. Berne v. Stevens, 67 M 254, 215 P 803 (1923).

Commission Sales: Where a commission agreement for sale of automobiles was little more than a memorandum of certain points of the parties' agreement, it was proper for the court to go into the circumstances surrounding the agreement. Brockway v. Blair, 53 M 531, 165 P 455 (1917).

Case Notes

No Duty of Insurer to Cover City's Conversion of Pension Funds: The city of Dillon failed to properly pay pension benefits, even though the city received the money from the state. When a beneficiary sued the city to recover unpaid benefits, the city tendered defense of its claim to its insurer, but the insurer declined to provide coverage or defend the claim based on a financial gain exclusion in the insurance policy. The beneficiary was granted summary judgment, so the city paid the judgment and filed an action to recover against the insurer. The District Court held that the insurer was liable and breached its duty to defend, so the insurer appealed. The Supreme Court held that the insurer had no duty to provide coverage to the city because the city's claim arose in whole or in part from the city's unlawful retention and conversion of the pension funds, so the city had no coverage for the claims for return of principal and interest. The District Court was reversed. Dillon v. Mont. Municipal Ins. Authority, 2009 MT 393, 353 M 370, 220 P3d 623 (2009).

Casino That Serves Alcohol Considered Bar or Tavern: Defendant owned a shopping center where plaintiff leased space. Pursuant to a 1973 lease agreement, no part of the shopping center was to be leased for a bar or tavern without the tenant's prior written consent. Defendant leased space to a casino and card room that also served alcoholic beverages. Plaintiff contended that defendant violated the original lease provisions prohibiting a bar or tavern. The District Court held that the casino fell under the common and ordinary understanding of a bar or tavern and granted summary judgment for plaintiff without a hearing. On appeal, defendant contended that the term "bar or tavern" in the lease language was ambiguous and created an issue of fact regarding the intent of the original parties to the contract, noting that the District Court used two separate dictionary definitions and a statutory definition in the Montana Clean Air Act to define the term. Defendant asserted ambiguity because any of three definitions might apply: (1) an establishment with the primary purpose of selling alcohol to be consumed on the premises; (2) an establishment that sells alcohol pursuant to a state liquor license for consumption on the premises; or (3) an establishment that does not include a casino or card room. However, defendant provided no authority to show that its alternative definitions reflect the ordinary or popular meaning of bar or tavern. The District Court's use of three definitions simply illustrated that the casino qualified as a bar or tavern under any of the three definitions, not that ambiguity existed in the definition. The District Court correctly concluded that the casino constituted a bar or tavern. The District Court also did not abuse its discretion in granting summary judgment without a hearing under these circumstances, given that either party could have requested a hearing to present evidence of a genuine issue of material fact but failed to do so. Dollar Plus Stores, Inc. v. R-Mont. Associates, 2009 MT 164, 350 M 476, 209 P3d 216 (2009), following SVKV, LLC v. Harding, 2006 MT 297, 334 M 395, 148 P3d 584 (2006).

Bodily Injury in Insurance Policy May Include Mental or Psychological Injury Accompanied by Physical Manifestations — Jacobsen Overruled: Defendant caused an automobile accident that injured two brothers, one of whom suffered severe trauma and was hospitalized for an extended period. The boys' mother filed a negligence action against defendant claiming emotional and physical injuries to herself and the brother who was not struck by the vehicle, including the mother's stress, migraine headaches, pain, depression, and a rapid heartbeat when hearing sirens, and the brother's withdrawal. Defendant sought liability coverage from her insurer, and the District Court, relying on Jacobsen v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 72, 320 M 375, 87 P3d 995 (2004), granted the insurer's motion for a declaratory judgment on grounds that the insurer was not obligated to provide a defense or coverage to defendant because defendant's policy did not cover the claimed emotional injuries or physical injuries resulting from the emotional injuries within the definition of bodily injury. On appeal, the Supreme Court reexamined the Jacobsen analysis in light of subsequent case law and overruled Jacobsen. Bodily injury as construed in an insurance policy includes a mental or psychological injury that is accompanied by physical manifestations. Defendant's insurance policy provided general coverage for damages that the insured was legally obligated to pay because of a bodily injury sustained by any person, which in this case included the physical manifestations that accompanied the mother's and brother's mental and psychological injuries. Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wagner-Ellsworth, 2008 MT 240, 344 M 445, 188 P3d 1042 (2008), followed in Tucker v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 2009 MT 247, 351 M 448, 215 P3d 1 (2009).

Use of Phrase "Together With" in Contract Not Considered Limiting Language: The contract for a utility right-of-way granted defendants the right to construct, maintain, and operate a pipeline for the transportation of oil, liquids, and gases "together with" a buried fiber optic communications cable. The right-of-way landowners contended that the phrase "together with" unambiguously limited the use of the cable to operating and monitoring the pipeline and precluded defendants from leasing part of the cable to a third party for telecommunication purposes. The District Court disagreed, holding that the phrase meant nothing more than "and", rather than plaintiffs' limiting interpretation "in connection with", and granted summary judgment for defendants. The landowners appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The term "together with" in the granting language did not unambiguously limit defendants' use of the fiber optic cable to operating and monitoring the pipeline. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Plain Contract Language Establishing Operating Agreement Rather Than Franchise Agreement — Summary Judgment Proper: Defendant ran residential care facilities for plaintiff and asserted that the parties' contract established a franchise allowing defendant to collect franchise fees and royalties. The District Court found that although there were contractual obligations between the parties, there was no evidence of privity between the parties and no genuine issue of material fact regarding whether a franchise existed, so plaintiff was entitled to summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined the plain language of the contract and determined that there was no special meaning ascribed to the term "franchise", that the contract was essentially an operating agreement rather than a franchise agreement, and that no ambiguity was created concerning defendant's rights to collect franchise fees and royalties. No fact question regarding the parties intention existed, so summary judgment was proper, and the District Court was affirmed. SVKV, L.L.C. v. Harding, 2006 MT 297, 334 M 395, 148 P3d 584 (2006).

No Ambiguity in Restrictive Covenant Prohibiting Placement of Trailers and Mobile Homes Upon Property — Development of Recreational Vehicle Park Precluded: A restrictive covenant provided that no trailers or mobile homes were to be placed upon the property conveyed by a deed. The District Court held that the term "placed upon" contemplated permanent placement, and that temporary placement was therefore not precluded. The court also held that the covenant disallowed only trailer houses or mobile homes used for residences. The court thus concluded that the covenant did not disallow development of the property as a campground for recreational vehicles and travel trailers. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that language in a restrictive covenant should be understood in its ordinary and popular sense. It is not the role of a court to insert modifying language into clearly written and unambiguous written instruments, and the unambiguous language in the covenant contained no words to indicate the parties' intent to allow temporary trailers or mobile homes not used as residences. The District Court erred in modifying the covenant language to allow trailers to be placed on the property, so the conclusion that a campground for recreational vehicles and travel trailers was allowable was reversed. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Process for Amending Restrictive Covenant to Be Strictly Followed: Myers contended that a subdivision corporation did not follow the proper method for amending a restrictive covenant disallowing the rental of subdivision property for less than 30 days. The District Court disagreed, holding that the amendment was properly adopted and restrained Myers from renting the property for less than 30 days. Myers appealed. The Supreme Court held that because restrictive covenants must be strictly construed, when a covenant is amended to impose an impediment on use of the property, the method prescribed for amending the covenant must also be strictly followed. In this case, Myers established that the prescribed amendment method was not used, so the Supreme Court reversed the judgment. Point Serv. Corp. v. Myers, 2005 MT 322, 329 M 502, 125 P3d 1107 (2005).

No Contractual Definition of Cause — Discretionary Termination of Professional Sports Team Coach Related to Legitimate Business Needs Warranted: Cole was fired as a professional hockey coach because of the team's poor performance. Cole's 5-year employment agreement contained a clause, drafted by Cole, providing that if Cole was terminated without cause, he would receive 1 year's salary and a bonus. Although the contract did not contain a definition of cause, the District Court found that the termination was without cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. Applying de novo review of the District Court's summary judgment to interpret the employment contract terms in their ordinary and popular sense and construing any uncertainty in the contract language against Cole, who drafted it, the Supreme Court held that discharging the coach of a poorly performing professional sports team was a discretionary decision related to the legitimate needs of the business and constituted cause, so the employer had a legitimate business reason to terminate the coach. Thus, Cole was not entitled to recover under the contract. Cole v. Valley Ice Garden, LLC, 2005 MT 115, 327 M 99, 113 P3d 275 (2005).

Payment of Actual Costs and Discretionary Attorney Fees Under Contract: A real estate contract provided that the award of reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party was discretionary with the court and also provided that the prevailing party was entitled to actual costs. The District Court deducted fees and costs related to actions in which plaintiff did not prevail, resulting in a reduction of both attorney fees and costs. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the attorney fee award as an appropriate exercise of the District Court's discretion, but reversed the reduced award of costs because plaintiff was entitled to actual costs under the contract. Gullett v. Van Dyke Constr. Co., 2005 MT 105, 327 M 30, 111 P3d 220 (2005).

Rules for Interpretation of Restrictive Covenants: Restrictive covenants are construed under the same rules of construction as other contracts. Declarations of covenants are read on their four corners as a whole, and terms are construed in their ordinary or popular sense. Bordas v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2004 MT 342, 324 M 263, 102 P3d 1219 (2004), following Windemere Homeowners Ass'n, Inc. v. McCue, 1999 MT 292, 297 M 77, 990 P2d 769 (1999), and followed in Point Serv. Corp. v. Myers, 2005 MT 322, 329 M 502, 125 P3d 1107 (2005).

Bodily Injury Not Inclusive of Emotional or Psychological Injury Within Terms of Uninsured Motorist Policy: Jacobsen was driving a car insured by defendant when he stopped to assist another motorist who was unconscious with a bleeding head wound. Despite Jacobsen's ministrations, the motorist died a few days later, and the cause was determined to be suicide. The next year, Jacobsen began seeking treatment for emotional distress suffered as a result of the incident and filed a claim with defendant to recover uninsured motorist benefits and medical pay benefits. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendant, and Jacobsen appealed on grounds that his policy for uninsured motorist coverage included damages for bodily injury sustained by the insured caused by an accident. The Supreme Court held that the term "bodily injury" was not ambiguous and was limited to physical injury caused by an accident but did not include emotional or psychological injuries. Thus, Jacobsen's emotional injury, including resulting physical manifestations, did not constitute bodily injury as defined in the insurance contract and was not compensable. Jacobsen v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 72, 320 M 375, 87 P3d 995 (2004), following Bain v. Gleason, 223 M 442, 726 P2d 1153 (1986), and Aetna Life & Cas. Co. v. First Sec. Bank of Bozeman, 662 F. Supp. 1126 (D.C. Mont. 1987). Jacobsen was overruled in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wagner-Ellsworth, 2008 MT 240, 344 M 445, 188 P3d 1042 (2008), to the extent that bodily injuries include mental or psychological injuries that are accompanied by physical manifestations.

Ambiguous Settlement Agreement Language Regarding Maintenance Calculation — Gross Disposable Income Interpreted as Pretax Income: A settlement agreement provided that monthly maintenance payments be 15% of the husband's gross disposable income. In direct opposition to the husband's interpretation, the wife and her expert contended that the amount should be based on pretax rather than after-tax income, and the District Court agreed. The court found that the term gross disposable income was ambiguous because "gross" and "disposable" had mutually exclusive meanings in this context, so the court looked beyond the agreement language to the parties' intent. Because the term was ambiguous, the parties' proposed interpretations were equally proper, so under 28-3-306, the ambiguity was construed in the wife's favor because the maintenance provision was for her benefit. The court's allowance of testimony from the wife's expert was also within the court's discretion. In re Marriage of Mease, 2004 MT 59, 320 M 229, 92 P3d 1148 (2004).

Wendell Test Applied to Determination of Whether Bodily Injury Caused by Accident "Resulting From the Use" of Insured Vehicle: Defendant's son was injured in a hunting accident after riding to the hunt in a vehicle owned by Wajahuski and insured by plaintiff. The insurance policy provided for coverage resulting from the use of a vehicle. The District Court applied the test in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), and held that the automobile insurance policy did not provide liability coverage with respect to defendant's claims for bodily injury. Defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Even though the Wendell test was originally applied in an uninsured motorist case, the expansive, fact-intensive test also applied here. The phrase "resulting from the use" was ambiguous, so the contract terms were construed in a light most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary. The accident could have occurred in any location, regardless of how the hunters reached their destination. The fact that that particular vehicle was used to transport the hunters and assist in the hunt provided no connection between the use of the vehicle and the hunting accident. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that the personal injuries were not caused by an accident resulting from the use of the insured motor vehicle. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Ferrin, 2002 MT 196, 311 M 155, 54 P3d 21 (2002).

Doctrine of Reasonable Expectations Inapplicable When Policy Language Excludes Coverage — Liability Coverage on Borrowed Horse Trailer Limited to Policy Terms: Babcock borrowed a horse trailer from her neighbor, and even though the trailer ball on Babcock's truck was too small for the trailer hitch, she attempted to tow the trailer anyway. The trailer came unhooked, left the road, and struck a fence. Farmers Insurance Exchange (Farmers) paid Babcock the full cost of the fence repair. Babcock requested that Farmers also pay for damages to the trailer. Farmers paid $500 toward the trailer, which constituted Babcock's policy limit for collision and comprehensive coverage. Babcock sued, claiming that Farmers was required to pay for the trailer damage under the liability coverage. The District Court granted summary judgment for Farmers, concluding that the plain policy language limited coverage to $500. Babcock appealed, asserting that the policy language was ambiguous but nevertheless created a reasonable expectation that a trailer was covered and that the exclusion for damage "to property owned or being transported by an insured person" did not apply because the trailer was not being "transported" when it was damaged, having separated from the truck. Farmers argued that, under Babcock's interpretation, a passenger ejected from a car would have no claim for medical payments because the passenger did not "occupy" the vehicle at the time of injury. The Supreme Court agreed. The doctrine of reasonable expectations does not apply to create coverage when the terms of the policy clearly demonstrate an intent to exclude particular coverage. In this case, the policy language clearly excluded liability coverage for the borrowed trailer because it was in Babcock's charge and she was transporting it at the time of the accident. Babcock v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 2000 MT 114, 299 M 407, 999 P2d 347, 57 St. Rep. 479 (2000).

"Arising Out of" Ambiguous — Coverage for Liability Not Excluded: Pablos were injured in a vehicle accident involving Moore, who was transporting a landscaping tractor for his employer. The employer was covered by a commercial general liability insurance policy that provided liability insurance for negligent acts of the corporation and its employees. Pablos contended that the employer was negligent in the hiring, training, and supervision of Moore. The employer conceded that the claim arose during the policy period and fell within the definitions of "bodily injury" and "occurrence" and that the policy would provide coverage unless coverage was denied by an exclusion but contended that coverage was excluded under both the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the use of an automobile and the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the transportation of mobile equipment. The District Court held that the term "arising out of" was ambiguous and, construing the instrument against the drafter-insurer, ruled that coverage for Pablos' accident was not excluded under the policy language. Noting that the phrase "arising out of" has been declared ambiguous in another insurance context in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), the Supreme Court applied a similar rationale to the phrase in both exclusionary clauses at issue in the present case. The phrase was reasonably subject to more than one interpretation and thus ambiguous. Pursuant to Head v. Cent. Reserve Life of N. America Ins. Co., 256 M 188, 845 P2d 735, 50 St. Rep. 20 (1993), if the terms of an insurance policy are ambiguous, obscure, or open to different constructions, the construction most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary must prevail, particularly if an ambiguous provision attempts to exclude the liability of the insurer. Here, the policy did not clearly and unambiguously exclude coverage for the theories of liability pleaded by Pablos, and the District Court's summary judgment that coverage was owed on Pablos' claims for negligent hiring, training, and supervision of Moore was affirmed. Pablo v. Moore, 2000 MT 48, 298 M 393, 995 P2d 460, 57 St. Rep. 231 (2000), following Marquis v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 961 P2d 1213 (Kans. 1998).

Original Declaration of Restrictive Covenants Broad Enough to Authorize New or Unexpected Restrictions: A supermajority of subdivision property owners authorized an amendment creating new and unexpected restrictions not contained or contemplated in the original declaration of restrictive covenants, resulting in assessment against subdivision landowners of the costs of paving a common road. Strictly construing the original amendment language, the District Court ruled that the clause in the covenants allowing amendment was broad enough to authorize new or unexpected restrictions. The Supreme Court agreed. Under the rule of strict construction, covenants should not be extended by implication or enlarged by construction. In this case, the drafters of the original covenants used universal language to describe the kinds of changes that could be made, clearly providing that each aspect of the covenants, conditions, restrictions, and uses was subject to amendment by a supermajority. Further, under the universal language, it was unnecessary that amendments to the restrictive covenants be connected to a provision in the original covenants. Windemere Homeowners Ass'n, Inc. v. McCue, 1999 MT 292, 297 M 77, 990 P2d 769, 56 St. Rep. 1173 (1999), following Sunday Canyon Property Owners Ass'n v. Annett, 978 SW 2d 654 (Tex. App. 1998), and distinguishing Lakeland Property Owners Ass'n v. Larson, 459 NE 2d 1164 (Ill. App. 1984), Caughlin Ranch Homeowners Ass'n v. Caughlin Club, 849 P2d 310 (Nev. 1993), and Boyles v. Hausmann, 517 NW 2d 610 (Nebr. 1994).

Gradual Accumulation of Smoke and Soot — "Sudden and Accidental" Construed — Damage Not Covered Under Pollution Exception to All-Risk Homeowner's Policy: During a 4- or 5-week holiday season, the Sokoloskis burned scented candles in their home, which caused a discharge of smoke and soot, damaging their home and belongings. Their insurer denied coverage under a pollution exclusion because smoke and soot were defined as pollutants in the policy. The District Court held that coverage was barred under the exclusion and that the damages were not sudden and accidental. The Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. The very use of the words "sudden" and "accidental" reveals a clear intent to state two separate requirements, so that "sudden" means more than "unexpected". "Sudden", even if it includes the concept of unexpectedness, also encompasses a temporal element because unexpectedness is already expressed by the word "accidental". Having determined that the damage was not sudden, the Supreme Court did not address the additional requirement of being accidental. Under the clear language of the policy definitions and exclusion clause, coverage was properly barred and summary judgment proper. Sokoloski v. Am. W. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 93, 294 M 210, 980 P2d 1043, 56 St. Rep. 392 (1999), citing N. Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Aardvark Assoc., Inc., 942 F2d 189 (3rd Cir. 1991), and followed in Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005).

Liability Coverage of Newly Acquired Vehicle — Date of Delivery Determinative: Powell purchased a truck from his brother and sister-in-law, making monthly payments to his brother. During the time that Powell made payments, the truck remained in the possession of Powell's brother, who continued to use the truck as in the past. In January, Powell's brother executed a title in Powell's name, but the intent of both parties was that the truck would be owned by Powell after the payments were completed. When all of the payments were completed, Powell's brother executed a bill of sale and canceled his insurance policy on the truck. Several days later, Powell struck and killed a pedestrian with the truck. The pedestrian's insurance company claimed that title to the truck passed more than 30 days prior to the accident and that because Powell had failed to give notice to the company of his new ownership of the truck, the truck was not a "newly acquired car" within the meaning of the insurance policy. The Supreme Court held that "delivery" of the truck, as contemplated by the insurance policy, would be construed in the ordinary sense of the word to mean the passage of physical possession of the truck. Because that occurred on July 10, when the payments were completed and the bill of sale signed, the period for notification of a newly acquired car had not yet expired and the policy was therefore construed to apply to the truck. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co. v. Powell, 274 M 92, 906 P2d 198, 52 St. Rep. 1138 (1995).

Meaning of Provision for Bonus if "Competition" Is Beaten: A contract between television station and a news editor/reporter that provided for a bonus if the station led its competitors meant that the station had to lead both competitors in the city. No bonus was due when the station led one but not the other. Berry v. KRTV Communications, Inc., 262 M 415, 865 P2d 1104, 50 St. Rep. 1617 (1993).

"Deposit" — Spending of Earnest Money Not Material Breach: In a contract for sale of real estate, use of words such as "deposit", "depositing", and "held on deposit" prohibited the sellers from spending the earnest money paid by the buyer pending the closing of the sale; however, the sellers' failure to keep earnest money on deposit until the closing did not constitute a material breach of contract. The buyer was entitled to seek contract damages but not rescission. Cady v. Burton, 257 M 529, 851 P2d 1047, 50 St. Rep. 395 (1993).

Improper Modification of Maintenance Awarded "For Life": The District Court modified a property settlement agreement, which provided that the wife receive $300 a month "as maintenance for life" in lieu of property for which she was to receive income, after husband unilaterally discontinued maintenance when wife began receiving social security payments. The maintenance agreement was a plain and unambiguous contract between the parties that was not subject to later interpretation or construction by a court. The agreement was drawn up by husband, a practicing attorney, who clearly understood the meaning of the term "for life". The District Court erred in modifying the agreement, absent a showing of substantial credible evidence that modification was warranted, without considering all necessary information in the original settlement agreement. In re Marriage of McKeon, 252 M 15, 826 P2d 537, 49 St. Rep. 127 (1992), followed in In re Marriage of Woodford, 254 M 501, 839 P2d 574, 49 St. Rep. 887 (1992).

Subjective Standard Applicable to Term "Satisfactory": A real estate listing contract contained the following clause, typed in by the realtor: "This listing is subject to Fultz being able to satisfactory [sic] trade the above lands for lands in Big Horn Co. on a tax free exchange." The realtor argued that an objective standard for a satisfactory trade should be used. The District Court found that because the realtor drafted the contract, any ambiguities should be construed against him. The term "satisfactory" was found to be a subjective standard rather than a reasonable man standard. Because the trade arrangement set up by the realtor did not meet the requirement of a tax-free exchange, the arrangement was properly found to be unsatisfactory under the contract terms. Watson v. Fultz, 239 M 364, 782 P2d 361, 46 St. Rep. 1751 (1989).

Covenant — "For Residence Purposes Only" Defined: A home owners' association brought suit to have a garage declared in violation of the subdivision's restrictive covenants. The Supreme Court ruled that a private garage is a proper appurtenance necessary to the enjoyment of a dwelling. However, if the garage is not appurtenant to a home, then it does violate the restrictive covenant. Hillcrest Homeowners Ass'n v. Wiley, 239 M 54, 778 P2d 421, 46 St. Rep. 1507 (1989), followed in Tipton v. Bennett, 281 M 379, 934 P2d 203, 54 St. Rep. 229 (1997), and Micklon v. Dudley, 2007 MT 265, 339 M 373, 170 P3d 960 (2007).

"Sale": A transfer of property in exchange for a valuable consideration constitutes a "sale". A sale occurred when a bank gave valuable consideration to a contractor by releasing him from his construction loan debt and the costs and expenses of foreclosure in exchange for title to the property. Schultz v. Stevens, 233 M 42, 758 P2d 287, 45 St. Rep. 1277 (1988).

Restrictive Covenant Allowing Disapproval of House Plans Based on "Harmony of External Design" — Specific Objective Standards Required: A restrictive covenant that allowed a design review committee to disapprove house plans and prevent construction based on "harmony of external design" was held to be too vague to be enforceable absent some general plan or scheme defining the standard of approval or an objective standard of design. Town & Country Estates Ass'n v. Slater, 227 M 489, 740 P2d 668, 44 St. Rep. 1257 (1987), contrasted in Jarrett v. Valley Park, Inc., 277 M 333, 922 P2d 485, 53 St. Rep. 671 (1996).

Responsibility for Accounts Payable Following Default in Sales Contract: Eight months after buyer and sellers entered into a contract for the sale of sellers' business, buyer defaulted and, pursuant to the contract, sellers reassumed possession of the business. The parties agreed that the assets of the business reassumed by the sellers included the accounts receivable, but they disagreed on who was responsible for the accounts payable. The District Court ruled that the sellers assumed the accounts payable, agreeing with the buyer's theory that accounts receivable and accounts payable were analytically indivisible in a determination of which party had assumed the accounts of the business. The Supreme Court affirmed. Heine v. Seibert, 217 M 224, 703 P2d 865, 42 St. Rep. 1152 (1985).

Ambiguous Phrase — Entire Contract to Determine Intent: A coal contract was entered on March 31, 1974. In 1976, the Montana Department of State Lands (functions now transferred to Department of Environmental Quality) determined that Decker was precluded under Title 82, ch. 4, part 2, from disturbing a certain portion of land within the mine area contemplated by the contract. It was conceded this would increase mining costs. The contract contained a price adjustment provision that allowed for price adjustments due to new government regulation. Decker contended the nondisturbance determination was a "new regulation" even though the statute under which the Department acted was enacted in 1973. The court in construing "new regulation" looked to the entire contract to determine mutual intent. The court determined, in light of adjustment provisions for all other cost increases, that "new regulation" meant increases required by government action taken after the effective date of the contract. Austin v. Decker Coal Co., 701 F2d 420 (5th Cir. 1983).

"Majority of Owners of Lots": Where the phrase "a majority of the then owners of the lots affected thereby" is not used in a technical sense, has no special meaning in its common usage, and is not ambiguous, the term means a majority of the owners, not the owners of a majority of the lots. Cieri v. Gorton, 179 M 167, 587 P2d 14 (1978).

"Denies Coverage" — Interpretation: Plaintiff settled with tortfeasor's insurance company for injuries sustained in an auto accident but the company became insolvent before making payment. Plaintiff's own company was not liable under its "uninsured automobile" clause because there was no affirmative act by the insolvent insurer whereby it "denied coverage". Application of the Montana Insurance Guaranty Association Act protects plaintiff as effectively as a strained judicial construction of the uninsured motorist policy terms. Murray v. Mont. Ins. Guar. Ass'n, 175 M 220, 573 P2d 196 (1977).

Water Rights: Where buyer and seller of real property discuss "water rights" in general terms, the term "water rights" in a contractual agreement will be used in its ordinary and popular sense, not in its statutory and technical sense. Moore v. Swanson, 171 M 160, 556 P2d 1249 (1976).

Strict Construction of Restrictive Covenants: Where the language of a restrictive covenant is plain, direct, and certain and admits of but one meaning, it is the duty of the court to declare what the terms of the covenant contain and not to insert a limitation. Higdem v. Whitham, 167 M 201, 536 P2d 1185 (1975), followed in Jarrett v. Valley Park, Inc., 277 M 333, 922 P2d 485, 53 St. Rep. 671 (1996). See also Windemere Homeowners Ass'n, Inc. v. McCue, 1999 MT 292, 297 M 77, 990 P2d 769, 56 St. Rep. 1173 (1999), in which the universal language of an original declaration of restrictive covenants was found to be broad enough to authorize subsequent amendment, by a supermajority of affected property owners, authorizing creation of new or unexpected restrictions not contained or contemplated in the original covenants.

"Final and Conclusive": Contract stating that the architect/engineer's estimates and decisions shall be "final and conclusive" was properly interpreted by the court to mean that the engineer's certificate of completion was binding upon the parties, absent any proof of fraud or mistake on the part of the engineer. United Pac. Ins. Co. v. County of Flathead, 499 F2d 1235 (9th Cir. 1974).

"Trailer": "Trailer" as used in restrictive covenant against their use was construed to refer to a type of structure and not the mobility of that structure. Timmerman v. Gabriel, 155 M 294, 470 P2d 528 (1970).

Intended Meaning: The words employed in a written agreement, if capable of more than one meaning, are to be given that meaning which it is apparent the parties intended them to have. Kintner v. Harr, 146 M 461, 408 P2d 487 (1965).

Insurance Contract: The words of an insurance contract are to be understood in their usual meaning. Kansas City Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Clark, 217 F. Supp. 231 (D.C. Mont. 1963), affirmed in 329 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1964).

"Actual Cash Value": Where dealer's trucks were insured for "actual cash value" it was not error to allow insured to recover the retail market value of the destroyed property rather than the wholesale market value. Johnson v. Equitable Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 142 M 128, 381 P2d 778 (1963).

"Finance Plan": In an action to recover the purchase price of merchandise (sewing machines) claimed to have been sold to defendants but alleged by them to have been delivered on consignment, plaintiff introduced in evidence a printed order for the goods obtained by its agent, which under the subject "Terms" contained the words "Finance Plan". Defendants, contending that the contract did not contain all the terms agreed upon and that the words "Finance Plan" rendered the contract ambiguous, were properly permitted to introduce parol evidence to explain the term as the meaning of the term was not so free from doubt that it might be said, as a matter of law, that it furnished its own interpretation. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Songer, 91 M 127, 7 P2d 238 (1931), explained in Brown v. Homestake Exploration Co., 98 M 305, 39 P2d 168 (1934).

"Commence Drilling Operations": In an action to have an oil and gas lease forfeited for failure of the lessee to "commence drilling operations for oil" within the time specified in the lease, the quoted phrase meant the commencement of actual drilling and not the commencement of preliminary work necessary to such drilling; evidence that the well was not "spudded in" being sufficient to make out a prima facie case, the granting of a nonsuit was error. Solberg v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 73 M 94, 235 P 761 (1925).

"Spudding In": The terms "spudding in" of an oil well, as understood by oil operators, and "commence drilling operations", used in an oil lease, denote the first movement of the drill in penetrating the ground. Solberg v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 73 M 94, 235 P 761 (1925).

"Vacation": Under a partnership providing for a 6 weeks' vacation for each member of the firm without deduction from the income, "vacation" meant absence from any cause and therefore included absence on account of sickness. Kettlekamp v. Watkins, 70 M 391, 225 P 1003 (1924).

Operation and Effect: Where there are no technical words in a contract, the words must be given their ordinary and popular meaning. Frank v. Butte & Boulder Min. & Lumber Co., 48 M 83, 135 P 904 (1913).

"Out of the First Earnings of Its Business, After Deducting Running Expenses": A written contract that a loan to a corporation shall be repaid monthly "out of the first earnings of its business, after deducting running expenses" does not create a general liability on the part of the company, to be paid after a reasonable time, but makes the indebtedness payable out of a special fund, consisting of the net proceeds, as rapidly as they accumulate. Frank v. Butte & Boulder Min. & Lumber Co., 48 M 83, 135 P 904 (1913), distinguished in Howard v. Hancock Oil Co., 68 F2d 694 (9th Cir. 1934).

Bankable Note: The words employed in a contract shall be given definite meaning. A bankable note is one receivable as cash by a bank, and a note that banks will not buy is not bankable, regardless of the bank's reasons for refusing to buy, or the high character of the paper. Pasha v. Bohart, 45 M 76, 122 P 284 (1912).

"Firm": The word "firm" was used in the will of a testator as an equivalent for "Gans & Klein", and had no technical reference to the copartnership of Gans & Klein. In re Klein's Estate, 35 M 185, 88 P 798 (1907).

"Connected": Where in an action to recover the amount of an insurance policy it appeared that the assured had represented in his application for the policy that he was not in any way connected with the manufacture or sale of spirituous liquors, the word "connected" must be presumed to have been used in its popular sense, involving the idea of permanency. Collins v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 32 M 329, 80 P 609 (1905).

28-3-502. Interpretation of technical words.

Case Notes

Default: Against contention that failure to procure consent constituted a breach as opposed to a default, the failure was determined to be a default of the contract for deed. Dobitz v. Oakland, 172 M 126, 561 P2d 441 (1977).

Judicial Notice: A court cannot take judicial notice of the meaning of technical words; such words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate, unless used in a clearly different sense than the technical one. Lehrkind v. McDonnell, 51 M 343, 153 P 1012 (1915).

Mining Lease: Witnesses who are qualified may testify as to the meaning of the following words in a mining lease: "There shall be no ores stoped, except at the three hundred foot level, and all ores shall be extracted from the drifts, raises, or winzes." Chambers v. Lowry, 21 M 478, 54 P 816 (1898).

28-3-503. Inconsistent words to be rejected.

Case Notes

Contradictory Provisions: In suit by contractor for additional expenses incurred in obtaining suitable gravel to perform road construction contract, contradiction whereby State Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) on one hand warranted condition of gravel pit but on other hand disclaimed any liability from reliance on such representations, would be resolved in favor of contractor for reason that contractor was in "take it or leave it" situation and justifiably relied upon Commission's warranty. Haggart Constr. Co. v. St. Highway Comm'n, 149 M 422, 427 P2d 686 (1967).

Meaningless Words: Under this section where a word appears in a contract which is meaningless in the connection in which it is employed, it must be disregarded in the interpretation of the writing. Davis v. Park Sec. Corp., 117 M 393, 159 P2d 323 (1945); Norwegian Lutheran Church of Am. v. Armstrong, 112 M 528, 118 P2d 380 (1941); Shelley v. Normile, 109 M 117, 94 P2d 206 (1939); Kasun v. Todevich, 71 M 315, 229 P 714 (1924).

Time of Performance

Part Case Notes

Failure of Insurer to Pay Within Sixty-Day Period Specified in Insurance Contract — No Error in Interpretation of Contract: An insurance contract required the insurer to pay for a loss within 60 days after the insurer received proof of loss and: (1) the parties reached an agreement; (2) there was a final judgment; or (3) the insured filed an appraisal with the insurer. The insured sought money damages because the claim was not paid within the 60-day period following the joint appraisal, which resulted in plaintiffs' alleged mental anguish and emotional distress. However, given a lengthy dispute over the amount of damages, the significant disparity between estimates, and plaintiffs' rejection of the joint appraisal, the District Court found that the agreement contemplated by the contract that would trigger the 60-day payment period was never reached. Plaintiffs appealed on grounds that the District Court misinterpreted the contract. The Supreme Court affirmed. The rejected joint appraisal did not constitute an agreement. Because the contractual requirements for the 60-day payment period were not met, the District Court did not err when it declined to conclude that the insurer should have made payment within 60 days of the joint appraisal. Nelson v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2003 MT 101, 315 M 268, 68 P3d 689 (2003).

Exceptions to Requirement for Matching Terms in Offer Made Under Right of First Refusal: A right of first refusal does not give the rightholder the power to compel an unwilling owner to sell, but merely requires the owner, when and if a decision is made to sell, to offer the property first to the rightholder at the stipulated price. The preemptive right ripens into an option when the owner elects to sell, at which point the owner has the contractual obligation to offer the property to the optionee on the same terms and conditions as the offer made to the owner by a third party. (See 77 Am. Jur. 2d Vendor Purchaser §40 (1997).) In order that each party to the contract receives the benefit bargained for, under Miller v. LeSea Broadcasting, Inc., 87 F3d 224 (7th Cir. 1996), three exceptions to the requirement for the exact matching of terms have been recognized: (1) the grantor of the option can waive exact matching; (2) proper names need not be matched; and (3) the grantor of the option may not act in bad faith, including procuring from the third party terms that the grantor knows are unacceptable to the optionee for the purpose of discouraging exercise of the right of first refusal. As long as the conditions of the sale are commercially reasonable, imposed in good faith, and not specifically designed to defeat the right of first refusal, the optionee is obliged to match the offer if the right is to be exercised. Here, although attorneys for the parties engaged in discussions concerning whether poison pill provisions included in an offer were an attempt to dissuade exercise of the right of first refusal, the discussions were not found to impact the effective exercise of the right, so the District Court's conclusion that the right had been properly exercised was not in error. Kennedy v. Dawson, 1999 MT 265, 296 M 430, 989 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 1078 (1999). See also Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767, 47 St. Rep. 850 (1990), and Lee v. Shaw, 251 M 118, 822 P2d 1061 (1992).

Involuntary Satisfaction of Judgment — Request for Stay of Execution Not Required: Following entry and satisfaction of judgment in District Court, the parties were aware of a contemplated appeal, but no stay of execution was requested or supersedeas bond posted. After plaintiff acquired title to the disputed property pursuant to the judgment, defendant filed a notice of appeal and lis pendens, effectively preserving the status quo pending appeal. Plaintiff moved to dismiss, contending that by voluntarily satisfying the judgment, defendants waived their right to appeal. Applying Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799, 53 St. Rep. 23 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the parties' course of conduct illustrated the involuntary, rather than voluntary nature of the satisfaction of judgment. Because satisfaction was involuntary, the right to appeal was not waived. Further, under former Rule 7, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), a party could request a stay of execution, but the request was not mandatory, even though a party choosing not to seek a stay ran the risk of having the appeal become moot. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss was denied. Kennedy v. Dawson, 1999 MT 265, 296 M 430, 989 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 1078 (1999).

Conduct Constituting Waiver of Right of First Refusal to Purchase Property: After a determination by the Supreme Court in Lee v. Shaw, 251 M 118, 822 P2d 1061 (1992), that the Lees' lease-management agreement contained a valid right of first refusal to purchase ranch property, notification of intent to sell was given and extensive sale negotiations were begun to finalize purchase of the ranch. Although none of the various proposed contracts was signed by all of the parties, an agreement was reached to complete the sale on a specified closing date, thus triggering the running of the preemptive right to purchase, which was set by the agreement at 45 days. However, the Lees failed to show up for the closing, despite an extension of the closing date. The District Court properly determined that the Lees' actions constituted an intentional relinquishment of their right of first refusal and thus a waiver of that right. In re Estate of Pelzman, 261 M 461, 863 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1408 (1993).

Contract Construed as Right of First Refusal and Not Option Contract — Ambiguity Resolved Against Lessee Drafters of Agreement: Lessor signed two documents giving the lessees certain rights in lessor's 800-acre ranch. The first document, granting a "first option" to purchase, required other offers to be in writing and gave the lessees 45 days from the day of notification of intent to sell to make payment. The Supreme Court held that this document created a right of first refusal. The second document granted a "first option to purchase [my] property . . . upon or before my passing . . ." and also granted 45 days for payment "[u]pon notification of intent to sell". The Supreme Court found that while some of the language in the second document was consistent with a true option, the insertion of the last sentence granting 45 days for payment upon notification of intent to sell indicated a right of first refusal. Because the lessees had drafted the second document, the Supreme Court construed the ambiguity against the lessees and held that the document created a right of first refusal and not an option contract. Because notice of intent to sell had never been given by lessor's estate, the right of first refusal did not come into effect. Lee v. Shaw, 251 M 118, 822 P2d 1061, 48 St. Rep. 1110 (1991). See also a subsequent appeal addressing waiver of the right of first refusal in In re Estate of Pelzman, 261 M 461, 863 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1408 (1993).

Specified Time of Performance — Nonperformance of Condition Precedent: Contract farmer and landowner orally agreed that farmer would seed landowner's land between August 25 and September 20, with the condition that landowner would help farmer with the downpayment on drills needed for seeding. The help with the downpayment was a condition precedent that had to be performed by landowner before farmer was bound to the time frame in the contract. When landowner did not help with the downpayment, farmer was relieved of his obligation to meet the contract performance dates and the contract was to be performed within a reasonable time. Weyler v. Kaufman, 196 M 132, 638 P2d 393, 38 St. Rep. 2197 (1981).

Interpretation of Contract — Time of Performance: On appeal, the seller of a log cabin urged that the agreement required the buyer to remove the logs from the seller's property as soon as possible. The Supreme Court found that the negotiations were quick and informal and that nothing specific was said about the time in which the cabin was to be removed. Noting the seller's testimony that he was in the process of refurbishing his motel and wanted the cabin removed as soon as possible so that he could take advantage of the good building weather to expand the motel and that the cabin was old and had not been used for years and contributed nothing to the value or appearance of the property and little value to the motel, the Supreme Court held that there was substantial evidence to support the trial court's finding that a condition of the sale was that the logs were to be removed as soon as possible. Jeffery v. Neville, 190 M 300, 620 P2d 1218, 37 St. Rep. 1983 (1980).

28-3-601. Time of performance when not specified.

Case Notes

Reasonableness Considered on Case-by-Case Basis — Forty-Five Days to Finalize Settlement Agreement Not Unreasonable: Plaintiff moved to enforce the terms of a settlement agreement, and defendant subsequently satisfied its settlement obligation to pay plaintiff $80,000. Plaintiff then sought interest for the 45 days that elapsed between the date of the settlement agreement and the time the settlement obligation was actually paid. The District Court denied the request for interest, and plaintiff appealed. The question of whether a given length of time is reasonable can either be one of fact or of law, depending on the surrounding circumstances. Reasonableness does not lend itself to a precise bright line definition but hinges on the underlying factual circumstances, which vary from case to case. The question of whether a party has performed its obligations under a settlement agreement must be assessed on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the matters that need to be accomplished before a settlement can be finalized. In this case, defendant's obligation consisted of more than just the payment of money. The settlement agreement also required defendant to prepare a mutually agreeable release of claims form and to submit a stipulation for dismissal of the case, so immediate performance was neither feasible nor required. The Supreme Court recommended that a date of performance be negotiated as part of a settlement agreement to avoid the prospect and cost of a court making the decision. However, under the circumstances of this case, 45 days to finalize the settlement was considered reasonable, and the District Court's denial of interest during that time was affirmed. Dambrowski v. Champion Int'l Corp., 2003 MT 233, 317 M 218, 76 P3d 1080 (2003).

Decree of Specific Performance — Enforcement of Purchase Option in Lease Agreement — Remand for Establishment of Performance Schedule: McDonald constructed a restaurant on leased real property in Bozeman. The lease included a provision allowing McDonald a limited option to purchase the property. The property was appraised pursuant to the lease conditions, and McDonald indicated that he was prepared to purchase the property at the appraised price. The lessors refused to complete the transaction, resulting in an action by McDonald to enforce the agreement. The District Court found that the option provision contained all material terms and was legally enforceable and that the requirements of the option had been met, so specific performance was awarded to McDonald. The lessors appealed. The remedy of specific performance is allowed under 27-1-411, and contracts for the sale of real property are specifically enforceable under 27-1-419 because it is presumed that the breach of an agreement to transfer real property cannot be adequately relieved by pecuniary compensation. The lessors contended that the option clause was ambiguous and represented only "an agreement to agree" and that a further contract between the parties was necessary if the option was to be enforced. The Supreme Court noted that the option clause set forth the time in which the option was exercisable, the method for calculating the purchase price and interest rate, the method by which the purchase price would be paid, and the parties' rights in case of default. Thus, the option contained all the material terms to make the acts necessary to purchase the property clearly ascertainable and was not ambiguous. The lessors nevertheless complained that the option provision did not state who was responsible for paying taxes or provide fully for forfeiture remedies. However, under Keaster v. Bozik, 191 M 293, 623 P2d 1376 (1981), absolute certainty in every detail is not a prerequisite for specific performance and collateral matters, such as responsibility for taxes and insurance, need not be expressed in the contract. The District Court's finding that the purchase option was enforceable was therefore affirmed, but the Supreme Court remanded to allow the District Court to set up a schedule for performance of the obligations and the commencement of interest, as required in Keaster. McDonald v. Cosman, 2000 MT 126, 299 M 499, 6 P3d 956, 57 St. Rep. 522 (2000), distinguishing Henkel v. Hewitt Agency, Inc., 206 M 303, 671 P2d 582 (1983), and Quirin v. Weinberg, 252 M 386, 830 P2d 537 (1992).

Nine Years Unreasonable Time to Hold Property — Specific Performance Appropriate: When dissolving a business relationship, the parties agreed by contract that property would be transferred in consideration for cash payments, but the contract did not provide a specific time for transfer or make the property subject to a security interest in case of default. The time to transfer the property was at the time the contract was executed, and as a matter of law, 9 years was an unreasonable length of time to hold the property. Under the circumstances, specific performance of the contract was appropriate as a remedy in equity. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda v. Vander Pas, 250 M 148, 818 P2d 384, 48 St. Rep. 900 (1991).

"Reasonable Time" Defined — Question of Law: "Reasonable time" is defined to be so much time as is necessary, under the circumstances, to do conveniently what the contract or duty requires should be done in a particular case. When the facts are clearly established or are admitted or undisputed, the question of what is a reasonable time is one of law; however, when surrounding circumstances are in dispute, the question is at least partially one of fact and requires resolution by the trier of fact. Walters v. Getter, 232 M 196, 755 P2d 574, 45 St. Rep. 986 (1988), citing Dunjo Land Co. v. Hested Stores Co. of Wyo., 163 M 87, 515 P2d 961 (1973), and Henderson v. Daniels, 62 M 363, 205 P 964 (1922).

Certainty of Option Contract — Specific Performance of Reformed Contract: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into an option contract giving the plaintiff an option to purchase certain real estate but the parties failed to specify the interest which would be retained by the defendant in certain improvements and failed to specify the dates upon which the downpayment and annual payments would be made and the date upon which interest would accrue, the contract was nonetheless sufficiently definite to allow its enforcement by specific performance. At trial, the court took testimony of the parties and reformed the contract so as to make it sufficiently definite as to the defendant's retained interest to allow specific performance. The fact that certain dates were not specified is not fatal to the contract, as it need not be absolutely certain in every detail, and where a time of performance is not specified, a reasonable time will be implied. Keaster v. Bozik, 191 M 293, 623 P2d 1376, 38 St. Rep. 194 (1981).

Time Fixed for Convenience of Parties: The general rule is that a bill payable on condition does not mature until the performance of the condition. When the time fixed, however, is for the convenience of the parties and the future event does not happen as contemplated, the law implies a promise to pay in a reasonable time. Kinjerski v. Lamey, 185 M 111, 604 P2d 782 (1979).

Crop-Share Agreement: Where contract provided that farm laborer would be paid $150 per month cash, would get 10% of the harvested crops after harvest, and would be expected to stay for a 12-month period, he was entitled to his share of the crop due on his crop-share agreement when wheat and barley were placed in storage at elevator although safflower, in which laborer did not share, had not been cut. Failure of employer to pay laborer's share on demand constituted a breach of contract and it was not necessary for laborer to complete the 12-month term in order to recover his percentage of the crops. Laughnan v. Sorenson, 139 M 531, 366 P2d 433 (1961).

Reasonable Time:

That no definite time was stipulated for performance by the purchaser of the payment of money is immaterial, for our law implies an agreement here to perform within a reasonable time. Bennett v. Dodgson, 129 M 228, 284 P2d 990 (1955).

Where under contract for sale of real estate deed was placed in escrow to be delivered to purchaser upon making certain payments, but no time limit was provided for in the contract, the reasonable time for compliance with the contract would not extend beyond the date the purchaser was to have "possession of the premises on expiration of present lease" which was 7 months thereafter. Hart v. Barron, 122 M 350, 204 P2d 797 (1949).

Where under an executed oral agreement the terms of an oil and gas lease were modified to the extent of granting an indefinite extension of time of payment of delay rentals by the lessee, the latter had a reasonable time within which to make payment. Griffith v. Cedar Creek Oil & Gas Co., 91 M 553, 8 P2d 1071 (1932).

Where no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be done by a contract a reasonable time therefor is allowed under this section. Orem v. Hansen Packing Co., 91 M 222, 7 P2d 546 (1932).

Time of Payment — Reasonable Time or Upon Demand: Where time of payment is not specified in contract the law implies that payment will be made within a reasonable time or upon demand. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950). However, when demand is made, the other party still must be given reasonable time after demand in which to perform. Walters v. Getter, 232 M 196, 755 P2d 574, 45 St. Rep. 986 (1988).

Reasonable Time Implied — Ranch Lease — Completion of Fencing by Tenant: Where a ranch lease requiring the tenant to rebuild fences and clear brush lands fixed no time for completion of fencing or clearing of brush, a reasonable time therefor was implied. Morris v. Hall, 122 M 418, 205 P2d 800 (1949).

Complaint — Allegation as to Time of Payment:

Where in an action against an estate to recover on a rejected claim based on the oral agreement of decedent to pay half the expense incident to repairs of residence property owned by him and plaintiff, his sister, jointly, the complaint did not allege when payment should be made, but it was pleaded therein that a verified claim had been presented to the administratrix, which allegation was admitted, the complaint was sufficient under this section to show that the amount due was ascertained and that it was due and payable when the complaint was filed. Binzel v. Viehmann, 111 M 6, 106 P2d 187 (1940).

In order to state a cause of action for the breach of a contract calling for payment within a reasonable time, the complaint must allege a time of performance so that it may appear what relation time bore to the alleged breach of duty and that the cause of action had accrued before the commencement of suit. Evankovich v. Howard Pierce, Inc., 91 M 344, 8 P2d 653 (1932).

Where a contract is wholly silent as to the time of performance and contains no statement from which any particular time may be inferred, a complaint based thereon was insufficient unless it alleged that the contract was to be performed within a reasonable time; however a promise to perform (make payment) when convenient is construed as a promise to do so within a reasonable time. Evankovich v. Howard Pierce, Inc., 91 M 344, 8 P2d 653 (1932), distinguished in Bennett v. Dodgson, 129 M 228, 284 P2d 990 (1955).

Alternative or Unstated Conditions: Where the place of performance of a contract is in the alternative, ordinarily the promisor may elect what act he will perform, the obligation being discharged by the performance of either of the enumerated acts, and if one contracts to do one of two things by a given date and allows the day to elapse without performing either, his right of election is lost. If a given date is not stated, the expiration of a reasonable time has the same effect. Thomas v. Cloyd, 110 M 343, 100 P2d 938 (1940).

Sale of Personalty — Time of Delivery as Time of Payment: Where one buys personal property at a stipulated price and no time of payment is agreed upon, the law fixes the time of delivery as the time of payment, and the rule declared by this section that if no time is specified for the performance of an act, a reasonable time for performance is allowed, has no application. Burden v. Elling St. Bank, 76 M 24, 245 P 958 (1926).

Mining Claim Development:

Where purchasers of an interest in mining property agreed to develop the property and proceeded to do so at once and continued doing so until an action was commenced by the owner to cancel the contract upon the ground, among others, that it did not provide a specified time within which operations should be begun and prosecuted to completion, plaintiff was not in a position to complain on the latter ground. Lee v. Lee Gold Min. Co., 71 M 592, 230 P 1091 (1924).

Failure of a contract for the development of mining claims to provide a specified time within which defendants should begin operations and prosecute the work of development to completion is alone insufficient to void the contract since under this section they were allowed a reasonable time within which to do the acts required. Lee v. Lee Gold Min. Co., 71 M 592, 230 P 1091 (1924).

28-3-602. When time considered of the essence.

Case Notes

Modification of Nonexistent Contract Impossible — Minutes of Preconstruction Meeting Inadmissible Extrinsic Evidence Absent Ambiguity in Subsequent Contract: Keeney Construction (Keeney) subcontracted to perform certain construction work for James Talcott Construction Co., Inc. (Talcott). The subcontract stated that time was of the essence, but contained no specific date of completion, Rather, Keeney was to complete the work as directed by Talcott and on Talcott's completion schedule. Keeney asserted that the parties intended a 1996 completion date, but the project was not finished until 1997. Keeney sued for damages for delay and extra work, contending that extrinsic evidence in the form of minutes from a preconstruction meeting, held 2 days before the contract was finalized, would verify the parties' intent and represented an executed oral agreement that modified the written contract. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in the written contract to warrant further examination of the intent of the parties. Because the intent of the contract was clear, the extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to support the contention that a specific completion date was intended. Keeney could not assert a claim for damages based on Talcott's direction of the timing of the completion of the project when the contract authorized Talcott to do so. Further, because an oral agreement cannot modify a contract that does not yet exist, the meeting and conversations held prior to the contract signing could not be interpreted as a modification of the subsequent written contract. Keeney Constr. v. James Talcott Constr. Co., Inc., 2002 MT 69, 309 M 226, 45 P3d 19 (2002).

Contract Part Oral, Part Written — Bid Not Contract — Parol Evidence Rule Inapplicable — Time of Essence by Oral Agreement: The plaintiff in a breach of contract case obtained a bid on a job building a basement. The defendant contractors on appeal argued: (1) that their bid constituted a contract and therefore the parol evidence rule barred testimony concerning a completion date not contained in the writing; and (2) time was not of the essence unless expressly provided in the writing. The Supreme Court said that the bid was an offer and that a purported acceptance which varied or added to the terms of the offer was not an acceptance but a counteroffer. The trial court's finding that the parties had agreed orally to a specific completion date was not clearly erroneous. The contract was partially written and partially oral. Because there was not a final, complete written document intended by the parties to contain all of the terms of the contract, the parol evidence rule did not apply. By agreeing to the completion date with the knowledge that the plaintiff considered the date essential because of approaching cold weather, the defendants agreed that time was of the essence. Therefore, the defendants were in substantial breach on the agreed date. Carriger v. Ballenger, 192 M 479, 628 P2d 1106, 38 St. Rep. 864 (1981), distinguishing Higby v. Hooper, 124 M 331, 221 P2d 1043 (1950).

Time of the Essence in Oil and Gas Leases: Oil and gas leases are construed liberally in favor of the lessor, and time is of the essence even though the contract does not so provide. Thus, failure of lessee to timely pay a draft executed at the same time as the lease was sufficient justification for cancellation of the lease. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

Parol Evidence — Delivery Date Under Contract for Sale: Where the correspondence which constituted the memoranda of agreement in a contract for the sale did not specifically provide that time was of the essence, it was error to admit evidence regarding discussions of the delivery date. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Gleason Equip., Inc., 166 M 479, 534 P2d 883 (1975).

Meaning of "Time Is of the Essence" — Reasonable Time: Where a contract provided that "time is of the essence" in the performance of its terms, and a specific time is not set for performance, a reasonable time is implied. Maxted v. Stenberg, 166 M 460, 534 P2d 864 (1975).

Omission of Statement: Where a lease with option to purchase does not state that time is of the essence, failure of the optionee to perform the covenants strictly at the time they may or should be performed will not cause him to lose his right to specific performance of the option. Cont. Oil Co. v. McNair Realty Co., 137 M 410, 353 P2d 100 (1960).

When Time Is of the Essence:

Where escrow agreement in connection with sale of land required $700 to be paid by a certain date for delivery of the deed, provision in such agreement that "time is and shall be in so far as the Escrow Agent is concerned of the essence of this agreement" did not by its express terms make time the essence of the contract so far as the purchaser was concerned and did not require the $500 original payment to be forfeited. Herman v. Herman, 123 M 39, 207 P2d 1155 (1949).

An oil and gas lease is merely an option contract and time is of its essence even though a stipulation to that effect is absent from the writing, and failure of the lessee to act promptly renders his rights subject to termination at the election of the lessor. Thomas v. Standard Dev. Co., 70 M 156, 224 P 870 (1924).

Under this section, only one subject is open to discussion, and that is not what the parties may have intended to say but what they did say in their contract. It is true, of course, that no set form or arrangement of words is necessary but the contract must, upon its face, convey the meaning that time shall be of the essence. Curtis v. Parham, 49 M 140, 140 P 511 (1914).

Under a contract of sale by the terms of which failure to pay an installment of the purchase price ends the contract, time being expressly declared of the essence of it, notice that an installment has fallen due is not required and therefore a claim that plaintiff was guilty of laches because of delay in giving it had no merit. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Where an oral contract was made to sell real property and suit was brought by the vendee for specific performance, the court could not say, according to the facts of the case, that time was of the essence of the agreement. Stevens v. Trafton, 36 M 520, 93 P 810 (1908).

What Sufficient to Meet Requirement of Statute — Life Insurance Policy: Under this section a provision in a life insurance policy that payment of a premium should not maintain the policy beyond the due date when the next premium is payable was tantamount to a declaration that time should be considered as of the essence of the contract and sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute, and failure to make prompt payment ipso facto voided the contract. Johnson v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 107 M 133, 83 P2d 922 (1938).

Exception to Forfeiture Disfavor: While the general rule is that forfeitures are not favored, an exception is where time is made of the essence and default is provided for upon not meeting the time requirements. Huffine v. Lincoln, 87 M 267, 287 P 629 (1930).

Oral Evidence Not Admissible to Show Time to Be of Essence: Where a contract for the sale of sheep was silent as to time being of the essence of the contract it was error to permit oral evidence that such was nevertheless the intention of the parties. Curtis v. Parham, 49 M 140, 140 P 511 (1914).

Duty of Court When Time Is of Essence:

When the provision that time is of the essence of the contract is included in the contract, it is the duty of courts to carry out the intention of the parties by giving effect to that provision; for to ignore or circumvent it when deliberately written into a contract by the parties or by any sort of construction to nullify its effects is to make a new contract for the parties different from the one which they themselves constructed—something even a court of equity is not authorized to do. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Courts will not undertake to make contracts for parties different from those which the parties themselves intended, but will enforce a provision making time of the essence of a contract, unless the party for whose benefit it was inserted has waived it or is estopped to insist upon its enforcement, or performance has been prevented by intervening circumstances sufficient to relieve the party from the performance of any other provision of the contract. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Effect of Breach of Provision Relative to Time: Where a contract of sale provides that the vendor shall have the right to declare it at an end, upon failure by the vendor to make payment on a date fixed, time being expressly made of the essence of the contract, breach by the vendee does not ipso facto terminate the agreement, but an election is necessary on the part of the vendor requiring some sort of notice on his part to make the provision effective. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Validity of Provision Making Time of Essence: Neither the provision making time of the essence of a contract of sale nor the contract containing such a provision is invalid as against positive law or public policy. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Unenforceable Note: A note was given in consideration of payee's written promise to purchase or procure a purchaser for certain mining property before a certain stated date. Time was expressly declared to be of the essence. Where the property was not sold within the stated time, the note was unenforceable. Talbott v. Heinze, 25 M 4, 63 P 624 (1901).

Section as Providing Grace Period Not Prohibition: Instead of embodying a prohibition, this section merely provides an extra day of grace. Any of the enumerated acts may be done lawfully on a holiday, but are in time if not done until the next business day. State ex rel. Hay v. Alderson, 49 M 387, 142 P 210 (1914).

Public Act Performed on Sunday: There is no prohibition against the performance of any public act on Sunday as such. State ex rel. Hay v. Alderson, 49 M 387, 142 P 210 (1914), distinguished in Miller v. Emerson, 120 M 380, 186 P2d 220 (1947).

Part 7
Provisions Implied by Law

Part Case Notes

Recoupment of Costs Provided for Defense of Claims Outside Insurance Policy Coverage: Plaintiff defended claims from third parties against defendant, but the claims were subsequently determined to be barred by exclusionary language in defendant's policy. Plaintiff sought to recoup the costs expended on defendant's behalf, and the District Court awarded plaintiff's costs. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the award. Plaintiff timely and explicitly reserved the right to recoup the defense costs by notifying defendant of plaintiff's reservation of rights prior to paying the costs and thus expressly reserved its right to recoup defense costs if a court determined that plaintiff had no duty to provide the costs. Defendant implicitly accepted plaintiff's reserved rights by posing no objection to the reservation. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005). See also Grinnell Mut. Reins. Co. v. Shierk, 996 F. Supp. 836 (S.D. Ill. 1998), and United Nat'l Ins. Co. v. SST Fitness Corp., 309 F3d 914 (6th Cir. 2002).

Witness Testimony — Substantial Evidence to Support Implied Fee Agreement: The trial court's determination that an oral agreement was entered into between the parties but that no express agreement was reached as to the fee to be paid plaintiff for architectural services and that there was an implied agreement at law to pay the reasonable value of those services was supported by substantial evidence. Most of the evidence consisted of witness testimony, and where the credibility of the witness is of prime importance, the determination of weight given to the testimony is the primary function of the trial judge sitting without a jury. Knight & Co. v. Manaras, 184 M 448, 603 P2d 675 (1979).

28-3-701. Stipulations necessary for reasonableness or conformity to usage.

Case Notes

Written and Oral Real Property Agreements — No Timing of Valuation Provision: The parties were married in 1973. They entered a prenuptial agreement providing that the real and personal property of each would remain separate. In 1974, defendant brought a quiet title action against his sisters. He executed a handwritten agreement with plaintiff that if she would finance the legal expenses of the action he would give her 10% of the land or the value thereof. He was successful, and the parties entered into an oral agreement containing the same provisions for appellate costs. The trial court found that defendant owed plaintiff 20% of the value of the land and that the value was to be determined at the time he elected to pay and be based on 20% of the value of all the land. The Supreme Court held that the defendant, under the clear terms of the written contract, had the option to select the acreage which he wished to convey. The District Court disregarded this language in ordering him to convey the percentage of his land as a whole. Since no contract provision addressed the timing of the valuation of the land and conflicting evidence was presented, the District Court's determination that it be valued at the time of payment was upheld. Kartes v. Kartes, 195 M 383, 636 P2d 272, 38 St. Rep. 1941 (1981).

Sale of Real Estate: Corporation which sold apartments in condominium was properly enjoined from selling space for commercial purposes in the same building since even though restrictions requiring residential use were not included in the sales contract or deed to apartment buyers, equitable servitude could be implied as a reasonable part of the deed. Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965).

Oil and Gas Lease — Marketing Product: The parties entered into an oil and gas lease under which plaintiffs were to receive royalties. A producing gas well was completed. No royalties were paid as the gas was not marketed. The court found that where the principal consideration for a lease is the payment of a royalty, the lease carries an implied covenant to use reasonable diligence to market the product. Severson v. Barstow, 103 M 526, 63 P2d 1022 (1936).

Implied Stipulation: Where a person makes an offer by mail and requires an answer of acceptance by return mail, the making of the offer is accompanied by an implied stipulation that the answer shall be so sent. If it is not so sent, the person making the offer is released from it. Beale v. Lingquist, 92 M 480, 15 P2d 927 (1932).

28-3-702. Necessary and incidental terms.

Case Notes

Allowance for Suspension Without Pay Contained in Policies Covered by Employment Manual — Suspension Proper: A doctor was suspended without pay by a health care facility for failing to sign outstanding warrants. The doctor contended that the suspension was improper because the employment contract allowed for suspension without pay only under specific circumstances, none of which were present in this case. However, the employment contract also contained a provision requiring the doctor to follow the facility policies and procedures, and that reference clearly incorporated the facility's employment manual into the employment contract. The employment contract was not inconsistent with the employment manual, nor was the disciplinary procedure used by the facility to suspend the doctor inconsistent with the employment contract. Thus, the District Court correctly held that the doctor was properly suspended without pay and that the suspension did not violate the employment contract. The doctor's claim for wages during the suspension also failed absent evidence of the hours worked and the ability to calculate the value of those hours. Marias Healthcare Serv., Inc. v. Turenne, 2001 MT 127, 305 M 419, 28 P3d 491 (2001).

Date Contract Enforceable — Effect of Absence of Collateral Terms to Be Added: In an action by a real estate broker against a seller for a brokerage commission, it was argued that if the sale of the property was enforceable on January 31, 1978, the broker would be entitled to his commission. If the sale was not enforceable until August 18, 1978 (90 days after expiration of broker's contract), he would not be entitled to his commission. The buy-sell was executed on January 31, 1978, but two financial terms within the contract were left out. The terms left out involve the method of payment, a collateral issue to the contract. The contract for deed was valid and enforceable on January 31, 1978, and the broker is entitled to his commission. Nardi v. Smalley, 197 M 321, 643 P2d 228, 39 St. Rep. 606 (1982).

Sale of a Water Right With Implied Reservation of Another Water Right: Landowner owned two water rights on a river and each had a related ditch right; one was called the "McNiven Right" and the other was called the "Grannis Right". He sold part of his land together with part of the McNiven Right and "related ditch rights". The Supreme Court held that the words "related ditch rights" in the deed's water right grant referred only to the McNiven ditch, and further held that since the landowner held two water rights and related ditch rights, the conveyance of the McNiven water and ditch right impliedly reserved to landowner the Grannis water right and related ditch right. Castillo v. Kunnemann, 197 M 190, 642 P2d 1019, 39 St. Rep. 460 (1982), reversing on rehearing, 38 St. Rep. 1618 (1981).

Sale of Apartments in Condominium: Where corporation selling apartments in condominium sought to sell space for commercial purposes in the same building, injunction was proper since even though restriction was not stated in sales contract or deed to apartment buyers, an equitable servitude could be implied as an essential part of the deed. Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965).

Water Right Conveyance: Where a deed to a tract of farmland expressly conveyed a water right sufficient in amount to irrigate the acreage sold, all other rights theretofore used in connection with the land were impliedly excluded and did not pass under the general appurtenance clause in the deed. Lensing v. Day & Hansen Sec. Co., 67 M 382, 215 P 999 (1923).

Farm Lease: A lease of agricultural lands which did not impose upon either party the work of preparing them for crops or provide who should furnish seed, bear the expense of harvesting, extra help, etc., was not void for uncertainty, it being implied under this section from the fact that the lessees were to have possession for the purpose of producing crops, that they were to do these things. McDonald v. McNinch, 63 M 308, 206 P 1096 (1922).

RECIPROCAL RIGHT

Reciprocal Attorney Fees and Costs Under Loan Guaranty: A loan guaranty provided that the guarantor would pay costs and expenses incurred in connection with enforcement of the guaranty. After holding for the defendant guarantors, the trial court awarded witness fees and litigation costs to defendants, and the plaintiff bank appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Contractual attorney fees and costs provisions are reciprocal under 28-3-704, so the award to defendants was not in error. First Citizens Bank v. Sullivan, 2008 MT 428, 347 M 452, 200 P3d 39 (2008).

Attorney Fees Through Fee-Shifting, but Limited Fees-for-Fees, Recoverable for Defendants Under Declaration of Covenants: A declaration of covenants provided that the applicant for relief was entitled to recover attorney fees in any action for enforcement of the covenants. Plaintiffs applied for relief, but defendants were granted summary judgment and sought attorney fees. Plaintiffs contended that defendants were not allowed attorney fees under the declaration because defendants were not the applicant for relief. However, this section renders contractual fee-shifting provisions reciprocal, so as the prevailing party, defendants were entitled to reasonable attorney fees, including fees-for-fees to the extent that attorney fees were incurred in establishing defendants' entitlement to fees under the contract. Defendants' claim for attorney fees for fees incurred in establishing the amount of attorney fees was not compensable under the contract, and the District Court erred in awarding attorney fees to defendants incurred in establishing the amount of fees. In addition, the court erred in awarding defendants' attorney fees incurred in securing the withdrawal of plaintiffs' attorney because of a conflict of interest because that cost was not a necessary expense of enforcement of the declaration. Because the District Court erred by awarding defendants all legal costs without making an effort to ascertain the specific source of the costs, the issue was remanded for a proper determination of fees, particularly fees-for-fees, that defendants could recover. Chase v. Bearpaw Ranch Ass'n, 2006 MT 67, 331 M 421, 133 P3d 190 (2006).

No Reciprocal Right to Attorney Fees When Issue Not Contained in Pretrial Order or Raised at Trial: Plaintiff sought $900,000 in attorney fees, posttrial, based on a request for attorney fees by defendant in its pleading, arguing that under this section, the award of attorney fees should be reciprocal. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the request because it was not contained in the pretrial order or raised at trial and thus was not properly before the court. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 1998 MT 129, 289 M 119, 960 P2d 291, 55 St. Rep. 508 (1998), distinguished in In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 179, 295 M 277, 983 P2d 316, 56 St. Rep. 701 (1999).

Inapplication of Attorney Fee Provision of Buy-Sell Agreement Held to Mean Inapplication of Reciprocal Right Under Statute: Gainey sold real property located on Flathead Lake to Garrison, and Garrison later sued Gainey, alleging constructive fraud and failure of consideration, and sought rescission of the buy-sell agreement. The Supreme Court noted that the provisions of the buy-sell agreement provide for payment of attorney fees only in the instance of default, breach of contract, and specific performance. The Supreme Court held that because Gainey was not sued for default or breach of contract and specific performance was not sought, the attorney fee provisions of the buy-sell agreement were inapplicable and, therefore, the reciprocal fee provisions of this section do not apply. Gainey was therefore not entitled to recover his attorney fees. Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Water Supply Company Not Entitled to Attorney Fees if Successful Defending Against Class Action: Certain residents of Butte brought a class action against the local water company alleging that the water was polluted and was a health problem. The company argued that the lower court should have included in the notice sent to residents concerning the class action a statement that if the residents chose to join in the action, they might be liable for the water company's attorney fees if the company was successful in defending against the suit. The Supreme Court held that the contract between the company and the residents for the supply of water did not contain an express provision providing for attorney fees and therefore the prevailing party had no contractual right to fees and further held that the lower court had properly excluded any reference to attorney fees from the notice. McDonald v. Washington, 261 M 392, 862 P2d 1150, 50 St. Rep. 1374 (1993).

Attorney Fees Not Recoverable Under Contract — Failure of Either Party to Raise Issue of Attorney Fees in Pretrial Order as Precluding Reciprocal Award: Although both parties claimed attorney fees in the pleadings, the final pretrial order did not include any reference to attorney fees, the fees were not listed as a contention at trial, and the amount to be awarded to the prevailing party was not listed as a fact to be considered at trial. Because attorney fees were not recoverable by defendant under the contract language and no evidence was presented on the issue at trial, failure by either party to raise the issue in the pretrial order placed the issue outside the record of the District Court and it was error for the court to amend the judgment to grant fees to defendant on grounds of reciprocity. Naftco Leasing Ltd. Partnership 301 v. Finalco, Inc., 254 M 89, 835 P2d 729, 49 St. Rep. 644 (1992), distinguishing Bell v. Richards, 228 M 215, 741 P2d 788 (1987).

Debtors Entitled to Attorney Fees on Reciprocity — Bank Entitled to Fees on Foreclosure: In the trial court and on appeal, the debtors in an action to foreclose on a deed of trust on residential real property were entitled to attorney fees on the basis of reciprocity under this section; on foreclosure, the bank was entitled to attorney and trustee fees granted by 71-1-320. First Fed. S&L Ass'n of Missoula v. Anderson, 238 M 296, 777 P2d 1281, 46 St. Rep. 1280 (1989), distinguished in Valeo v. Tabish, 1999 MT 146, 295 M 34, 983 P2d 334, 56 St. Rep. 579 (1999).

Reciprocal Award of Contractual Attorney Fees — Not Subject to Contingent Fee Agreement: Since one purpose for a contractual provision for attorney fees is to make the successful party whole, it should be clear that the attorney fees, when finally fixed by the court, belong to the party and are not subject to a contingent fee agreement. Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988).

Reciprocal Right: A clause in a contract for sale that provides that the seller is entitled to reasonable attorney fees in any subsequent litigation also gives a similar right to the buyer and includes fees incurred on appeal. Magers v. The Shining Mtns., 230 M 373, 750 P2d 449, 45 St. Rep. 283 (1988).

Failure to Mention Attorney Fee Issue on Pretrial Order — Reciprocal Right Not Abandoned: Defendants did not abandon their right to attorney fees by failing to mention the issue under "defendants' contentions" on the pretrial order. The right is reciprocal. Under this section, plaintiffs had a contractual right to attorney fees and so did defendants. Bell v. Richards, 228 M 215, 741 P2d 788, 44 St. Rep. 1467 (1987).

Reciprocal Fee Allowance Under Unenforceable Contract: Even though note and mortgage were unenforceable for lack of consideration, "mortgagor" was entitled to attorney's fee under this section for defending suit on mortgage, which provided for attorney's fee for mortgagee in event of foreclosure. Bartmess v. Bourassa, 196 M 231, 639 P2d 1147, 39 St. Rep. 56 (1982).

Contract for Deed Providing for Attorney Fees: Attorney fees were properly granted sellers under a contract for deed where buyer defaulted and the contract specifically provided for them. Hares v. Nelson, 195 M 463, 637 P2d 19, 38 St. Rep. 2036 (1981).

Indemnity Suit — No Reciprocal Right to Attorney Fees: This section grants a reciprocal right to attorney fees only when the party from whom one is requesting fees has an express right to attorney fees. Thus when plaintiff in a suit for indemnity did not have an express right to attorney fees and no agreement existed between plaintiff and defendant, the alleged indemnitor, defendant, even though a successful party, had no right to recover attorney fees under this section. Town Pump v. Diteman, 191 M 98, 622 P2d 212, 38 St. Rep. 54 (1981), followed in Lasar v. Bechtel Power Corp., 223 M 491, 727 P2d 526, 43 St. Rep. 1938 (1986).

Broker's Commission: In an action involving a broker's commission in which the contract to sell the real estate gave plaintiff the express right to collect attorney fees, this statute made the right reciprocal as to defendant. As the prevailing party defendant is entitled to an award of reasonable attorney fees. Diehl & Associates, Inc. v. Houtchens, 180 M 48, 588 P2d 1014 (1979). See also Fields v. Wells, 239 M 392, 780 P2d 1141, 46 St. Rep. 1775 (1989).

Tortious Conversion: When a complaint alleged a tortious conversion against some defendants in a foreclosure action against another defendant, 30-9-511 (now repealed) was not applicable to the former. However defendants in the alleged tortious conversion were entitled to attorney fees by virtue of this section even though such action arose out of events that occurred prior to that section's effective date. Belgrade St. Bank v. Swainson, 172 M 350, 564 P2d 174 (1977).

Right Exists Regardless of Who Instituted Action: A reciprocal right to attorney fees does not exist only when the party having the contractual right institutes the action. Compton v. Alcorn, 171 M 230, 557 P2d 292 (1976), followed in Rauch v. Michel, 221 M 1, 716 P2d 617, 43 St. Rep. 587 (1986), and in Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986), affirmed, 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987).

PREVAILING PARTY

Award of Attorney Fees on Appeal: If a contract includes a provision stating that the prevailing party is entitled to reasonable attorney fees arising from litigation under the contract, appellate attorney fees are included under the provision. Boyne USA, Inc. v. Lone Moose Meadows, LLC, 2010 MT 133, 356 Mont. 408, 235 P.3d 1269.

Payment of Actual Costs and Discretionary Attorney Fees Under Contract: A real estate contract provided that the award of reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party was discretionary with the court and also provided that the prevailing party was entitled to actual costs. The District Court deducted fees and costs related to actions in which plaintiff did not prevail, resulting in a reduction of both attorney fees and costs. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the attorney fee award as an appropriate exercise of the District Court's discretion, but reversed the reduced award of costs because plaintiff was entitled to actual costs under the contract. Gullett v. Van Dyke Constr. Co., 2005 MT 105, 327 M 30, 111 P3d 220 (2005).

No Award of Attorney Fees on Appeal When None Granted at Trial: As the prevailing party on appeal, defendant contended that attorney fees should be awarded. Citing Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Finch, 246 M 359, 805 P2d 1331 (1990), the Supreme Court declined to award attorney fees on appeal because the District Court did not award defendant attorney fees in the first place and defendant failed to appeal the District Court's determination not to award attorney fees to any party upon summary judgment. R.C. Hobbs Enterprises, LLC v. J.G.L. Distrib., Inc., 2004 MT 396, 325 M 277, 104 P3d 503 (2004).

No Reciprocal Right to Attorney Fees When No Contract Formed — Prevailing Party Under Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act Not Entitled to Attorney Fees Absent Written Offer to Arbitrate: Under 39-2-915, a party is not entitled to attorney fees under the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act unless that party makes a written offer to arbitrate that is refused and that party prevails in the action. Here, a probationary law enforcement officer made an offer to arbitrate with the town on a wrongful discharge claim, but the town prevailed in the action without making an arbitration offer. The town subsequently claimed a reciprocal right to attorney fees under this section, asserting that the officer's request to arbitrate qualified as an obligation in the nature of a contract that granted the town the same rights as the officer. The Supreme Court disagreed. To hold that 39-2-915 provided the town a reciprocal right to attorney fees would defeat the statutory element that rewards the making of an arbitration offer and allow a party that refuses to arbitrate to claim attorney fees. Further, if an offer to arbitrate is not accepted and no arbitration occurs, no contract is formed upon which a right to reciprocal fees can be based under this section. Denial of the town's request for reciprocal fees was properly denied. Ritchie v. Ennis, 2004 MT 43, 320 M 94, 86 P3d 11 (2004).

Recovery of Attorney Fees, Including Appeal Costs, Based on Indemnification Provision in Underlying Contract: Four people decided to start a business, but ultimately three decided to opt out and exchange their respective corporate shares of stock for cash. The release agreement also held the three harmless from all causes of action relating to the incorporation and provided an indemnification clause that held each party harmless from and against all liability, claim, loss, damage, or expense, including attorney fees, incurred or required to be paid by the other parties by reason of any breach or failure of observance or performance of any representation, warranty, or covenant or other provision of the agreement. Nevertheless, the corporation subsequently sued one of the three resigning members for breach of fiduciary duty, conversion, actual and constructive fraud, and negligent misrepresentation, seeking $110,000 in general damages and also punitive damages. Defendant counterclaimed that by filing a claim that was barred by the release agreement, the corporation had breached its contract. Following trial, the District Court awarded only $3,673.53 for constructive fraud, but also concluded that all claims based on the parties' contractual relationship were barred. Each party then requested attorney fees as the prevailing party pursuant to the indemnification clause, but the court denied the motions, holding that there was no prevailing party because each party had gained a victory but also suffered a loss. The corporation appealed, seeking attorney fees. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to the reciprocal right under 28-3-704, the corporation had the statutory right to recover attorney fees, but only the fees incurred in defending the breach of contract counterclaim as the prevailing party, pursuant to the contractual indemnification provision. Under the same reasoning, the Supreme Court awarded attorney fees for costs of appeal as well, remanding for a determination of fees. Transaction Network, Inc. v. Wellington Technologies, Inc., 2000 MT 223, 301 M 212, 7 P3d 409, 57 St. Rep. 920 (2000), followed in Peschel Family Trust v. Colonna, 2003 MT 216, 317 M 127, 75 P3d 793 (2003).

Assignment of Retail Installment Contract — Breach of Warranty — Abrogation of Waiver of Recourse: Arcadia Financial, Ltd. (Arcadia), is a Minnesota corporation that purchases retail installment contracts from automobile dealers, including Prestige Toyota (Prestige) in Billings, after the dealers have entered into installment contracts with automobile buyers. Knight purchased a Toyota from Prestige, and Knight's contract contained a provision assigning the contract to Arcadia under one of four options. The same day that Knight purchased the automobile, Prestige assigned the contract to Arcadia "without recourse", which meant that only the contract warranties applied, one of which was that Prestige had a valid certificate of title and would send it to the appropriate officials within 10 days of sale to ensure Arcadia's interest in the vehicle. The contract also provided that Prestige unconditionally guaranteed full performance of the contract in the event that it breached any of the warranties. Prestige failed to send a valid certificate of title as required. Knight later defaulted and filed for bankruptcy protection. Arcadia demanded that Prestige repurchase the Knight contract. Prestige admitted breaching the warranty but claimed that it was not required to repurchase the contract and refused to do so, asserting that Arcadia's damages were limited to the amount that the bankruptcy trustee received from sale of the automobile. The District Court awarded Arcadia the principal amount due on the Knight contract, plus interest, attorney fees, and costs, concluding that under the clear language of the contract assignment provisions, Prestige had guaranteed payment of all sums due when it failed to deliver the valid title within the time required. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that the contract was converted into a full recourse contract when Prestige failed to deliver the valid title, so Prestige was required to repurchase the contract for the amount of principal remaining due. The detriment proximately caused by Prestige's failure to repurchase the contract was the principal amount owing on the contract. Further, the District Court properly awarded attorney fees to Arcadia as the prevailing party pursuant to 28-3-704. Arcadia Financial, Ltd. v. Prestige Toyota, 1999 MT 273, 296 M 494, 989 P2d 831, 56 St. Rep. 1111 (1999).

Award of Attorney Fees and Costs on Appeal of Contract Action: Under former Rule 33, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), costs in civil actions were automatically awarded to the prevailing party and, additionally, when an award of attorney fees was based on a contract, the prevailing party was also entitled to an award of reasonable attorney fees incurred on appeal. Chamberlin v. Puckett Constr., 277 M 198, 921 P2d 1237, 53 St. Rep. 593 (1996).

Verdict That Neither Party Breached — Party That Made Higher Monetary Claim Owes Costs and Attorney Fees: Inn sued for $15,556 in damages for breach of a remodeling contract, claiming incomplete performance by the contractor. The contractor counterclaimed for failure to pay the total of the monthly payments due him, alleging that $1,609 was still owed. The contract provided that the prevailing party in a suit would be entitled to costs and attorney fees. The jury found that neither party was in breach. Because the contractor prevailed on the main issue in controversy, Inn's claim for $15,556 in damages, the contractor was the prevailing party and was entitled to costs and attorney fees. Rod & Rifle Inn, Inc. v. Giltrap, 273 M 232, 902 P2d 38, 52 St. Rep. 945 (1995).

Right to Attorney Fees When Defendant Files for Entry of Judgment After Originally Denying Allegations: The parties, Gandy and Eschler, entered into an agreement releasing each other from the performance of a real estate purchase contract upon the payment of $20,000 by Eschler to Gandy. Eschler defaulted on the payments, and Gandy brought an action seeking specific performance requiring Eschler to pay the underlying contract price of $258,640 or in the alternative the $20,000. After originally denying the allegations in Gandy's complaint, Eschler moved the District Court to enter a judgment against him for the balance of the $20,000 owed to Gandy. The Supreme Court held that Gandy was a prevailing party entitled to attorney fees under the provisions of the contract between the parties because Eschler had initially denied the allegations in Gandy's complaint. Gandy v. Eschler, 261 M 355, 862 P2d 1116, 50 St. Rep. 1357 (1993).

No Prevailing Party When All Parties Prevail in Part on Some but Not All Issues: There are some cases when, at the close of litigation, there is no actual prevailing party entitled to attorney fees because both parties gain a victory but also suffer a loss. Such was the case at bar when even though all parties prevailed in part and were entitled to part of a judgment award, none prevailed on all issues or recovered the total of what was individually sought. Failure of the trial court to award attorney fees to any of the parties was not error. Nyquist v. Nyquist, 255 M 149, 841 P2d 515, 49 St. Rep. 927 (1992), followed in Marias Healthcare Serv., Inc. v. Turenne, 2001 MT 127, 305 M 419, 28 P3d 491 (2001).

Attorney Fees to Successful Litigants — Voluntary Dismissal of Moot Counterclaim Not Trial Loss: Attorney fees were properly granted sellers of property under a contract for deed provision that awarded fees to successful litigants. Seller's voluntary dismissal of a moot counterclaim does not constitute a trial loss invalidating the contract provision. Lauderdale v. Grauman, 223 M 357, 725 P2d 1199, 43 St. Rep. 1785 (1986), followed in Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Finch, 246 M 359, 805 P2d 1331, 47 St. Rep. 2154 (1990), and in Wise v. Sebena, 248 M 32, 808 P2d 494, 48 St. Rep. 309 (1991).

Prevailing Party: While no one factor should be considered in determining the prevailing party, the party that survives an action involving a counterclaim with the net judgment should generally be considered the successful party. Rustics of Lindbergh Lake, Inc. v. Lease, 213 M 246, 690 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2092 (1984).

"Prevailing Party" When Usury Penalty Assessed Against Party Exceeds That Party's Recovery: Appellants filed an action to recover money due on a promissory note that was usurious on its face. The District Court assessed a usury penalty against appellants which exceeded the balance due on the note. Thus, the net judgment was in favor of respondents. The court then assessed attorney fees against the appellants. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that respondents had been properly found to be the prevailing party. E.C.A. Envtl. Management Serv., Inc. v. Toenyes, 208 M 336, 679 P2d 213, 41 St. Rep. 388 (1984).

Attorney Fees — Not Costs — Timeliness: The defendants signed a contract to purchase a tract of land from plaintiffs. The contract provided for attorney fees to the prevailing party in an action commenced on the contract. Plaintiffs filed suit alleging that under the contract and various oral agreements, defendants had agreed to pay a real estate commission to plaintiffs. The trial court granted summary judgment to defendants, holding that written evidence of an agreement to pay a commission did not exist. No notice of entry of judgment was ever filed. Defendants later moved to set an attorney fee award. The trial court ruled that under Title 25, ch. 10, attorney fees were not recoverable costs and that the motion for costs was not timely, as it was not filed within 5 days of judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that attorney fees were awardable under the contract and that defendants' motion was essentially a motion to amend judgment under former Rule 59(g), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). The motion was timely made since no notice of entry of judgment was ever filed. Cook v. Harrington, 203 M 479, 661 P2d 1287, 40 St. Rep. 580 (1983), followed in In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 179, 295 M 277, 983 P2d 316, 56 St. Rep. 701 (1999).

Action for Rescission of Contract: Contention that contract provision allowing attorney fees and costs to the prevailing party applied only to actions to enforce the contract and not to the instant action for rescission of the contract lacked merit, particularly when parties making that claim amended their complaint to seek attorney fees and only objected to such an award after the other party prevailed in the action and was granted attorney fees and costs. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983), affirmed in Carey v. Wallner 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987). See also Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43

St. Rep. 1706 (1986), and Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000) (citing Mackintosh v. Calif. Sav. Fed'n, 935 P2d 1154 (Nev. 1997)).

Persons Not Parties to Contract — Right to Attorney Fees Under Contract Granting Them: When suit is brought under a contract providing for attorney fees to the prevailing party, persons who are not parties to the contract are not entitled to attorney fees, either under the contract or a statutory attorney fees provision. Where persons who were not parties to a contract by which a business was sold guaranteed payment of the purchase price, a guarantee which they had no intention of honoring, it was error to award them attorney fees upon finding that they were not liable under the guarantee because they received no consideration from plaintiff seller of the business for their guarantee. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982).

District Court to Award Attorney Fees if Contract Provided: If a contract provides for attorney fees to the prevailing party, the District Court should have awarded attorney fees to the prevailing party. Wortman v. Griff, 200 M 528, 651 P2d 998, 39 St. Rep. 1916 (1982).

Determination of Validity of Lease: The tenant was forced to sue to determine the validity of the lease. The tenant prevailed in his suit and is therefore entitled to attorney's fees under this section. Kosena v. Eck, 195 M 12, 635 P2d 1287, 38 St. Rep. 1736 (1981).

Attorney's Fees for Action to Compel Forfeiture: The defendants defaulted on a contract for deed in October 1977, but in March 1978, tendered to the plaintiffs the full amount due under the contract, plus the plaintiffs' personal expenses and attorney's fees. The plaintiffs brought suit to enforce forfeiture of the defendant's payments made under the contract, but the court refused to enforce the forfeiture. Under these circumstances, the court erred in granting the plaintiffs their attorney's fees under a contract provision which entitled the prevailing party to his attorney's fees in the event of suit. The defendants have been ready, willing, and able to perform the contract since March 1978. Because the defendants were not relieved from their default but only from forfeiture, the defendants should pay the plaintiffs their reasonable attorney's fees until the time of tender of payment in March 1978. Sharp v. Holthusen, 189 M 469, 616 P2d 374, 37 St. Rep. 1651 (1980).

Losing Party Not Awarded Attorney Fees: Appellant's request for attorney fees pursuant to a contract provision was dismissed since it was not the successful party in litigation. Mont. Williams Double Diamond v. Royal Village, Inc., 186 M 359, 607 P2d 1120 (1980).

Prevailing Party in Real Estate Contract: By virtue of this section the contractual right to attorney fees contained in a real estate broker's contract was reciprocal and entitled the defendant, as the prevailing party, to an award of his attorney fees. Lyle v. Moore, 183 M 274, 599 P2d 336 (1979).

GENERAL

Challenge to Award of Attorney Fees Based on Contract — Failure to Argue that Claim Was Not Based on Contract Before District Court — Supreme Court Refusal to Review Argument: The District Court awarded the prevailing hospital attorney fees pursuant to its signed Patient Service Agreement contract with the plaintiff estate. On appeal, the estate argued that the hospital was not entitled to recover attorney fees under the contract because it did not bring an action on the contract. Citing In re Parenting of N.S., 2011 MT 98, 360 Mont. 288, 253 P.3d 863, the Supreme Court declined to address the estate's argument because it had not been presented to the District Court. Estate of Donald v. Kalispell Regional Medical Center, 2011 MT 166, 361 Mont. 179, 258 P.3d 395.

Attorney Fees Owing Despite Choice of Enforcement Alternative Provided in Contract: A real estate sale contract provided three enforcement alternatives for the seller to apply in case of a default by the buyers. Two of the three alternatives expressly provided for payment of attorney fees, but one did not. The seller chose the alternative remedy that did not expressly provide for attorney fees, and the buyers contended that attorney fees were thus not owing. However, a later provision in the contract provided that the seller was entitled to attorney fees regardless of which alternative the seller elected, so the District Court properly awarded attorney fees under the clear language of the more comprehensive contract provision. Weter v. Archambault, 2002 MT 336, 313 M 284, 61 P3d 771 (2002).

Verdict That Neither Party Breached — Party That Made Higher Monetary Claim Owes Costs and Attorney Fees: Inn sued for $15,556 in damages for breach of a remodeling contract, claiming incomplete performance by the contractor. The contractor counterclaimed for failure to pay the total of the monthly payments due him, alleging that $1,609 was still owed. The contract provided that the prevailing party in a suit would be entitled to costs and attorney fees. The jury found that neither party was in breach. Because the contractor prevailed on the main issue in controversy, Inn's claim for $15,556 in damages, the contractor was the prevailing party and was entitled to costs and attorney fees. Rod & Rifle Inn, Inc. v. Giltrap, 273 M 232, 902 P2d 38, 52 St. Rep. 945 (1995).

What Constitute Reasonable Attorney Fees: In determining what constitute reasonable attorney fees, the following factors should be used as guidelines: (1) the amount and character of the services rendered; (2) the labor, time, and trouble involved; (3) the character and importance of the litigation in which the services were rendered; (4) the amount of money or the value of the property to be affected; (5) the professional skill and experience called for; (6) the character and standing in their profession of the attorneys; and (7) the result secured by the services of the attorneys. Morning Star Enterprises, Inc. v. R.H. Grover, Inc., 247 M 105, 805 P2d 553, 48 St. Rep. 112 (1991); Majers v. The Shining Mtns., 230 M 373, 750 P2d 449, 45 St. Rep. 283 (1988); Carkeek v. Ayer, 188 M 345, 613 P2d 1013 (1980); First Sec. Bank of Bozeman v. Tholkes, 169 M 422, 547 P2d 1328 (1976); Crncevich v. Georgetown Recreation Corp., 168 M 113, 541 P2d 56 (1975); Forrester & MacGinniss v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 29 M 397, 74 P 1088 (1904).

Attorney Fees Proper When Provided in Assignment, Release, and Indemnity Agreement: The Supreme Court reversed a denial of attorney fees when an assignment, release, and indemnity agreement executed by the parties contained the substance of the parties' accord and satisfaction and specifically provided for award of attorney fees to the prevailing party in the event of litigation. Bohnsack v. Hi-Noon Petroleum, Inc., 243 M 190, 793 P2d 815, 47 St. Rep. 1125 (1990).

Contract Provision That Attorney Fees May Be Awarded — Court Need Not Award Fees: The parties entered into a water well use agreement that provided that in the case of litigation between the parties, reasonable attorney fees could be provided. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's refusal to award either party attorney fees on the basis that when the contract states that reasonable fees may be awarded, it is within the trial court's discretion to grant or deny either or both parties attorney fees. Baker v. Bailey, 240 M 139, 782 P2d 1286, 46 St. Rep. 2005 (1989).

Attorney Fees and Costs Award Not Abuse of Discretion: The plaintiff purchased a motorcycle dealership from the defendant. The plaintiff changed the business's name, location, and product line. The business ceased making a profit, and the plaintiff sued the defendant for fraud and negligent misrepresentation. The suit was dismissed on summary judgment. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of fees and costs, stating that the sales contract between the parties provided for attorney fees and costs. Although the award was high, it did not constitute an abuse of discretion by the lower court and could not be set aside on appeal. Batten v. Watts Cycle & Marine, Inc., 240 M 113, 783 P2d 378, 46 St. Rep. 1984 (1989).

Failure of Attorney to Read Findings, Conclusions, and Order Not Excusable Neglect: Defendant prevailed in a case regarding a real estate transaction. The trial court addressed reciprocal award of attorney fees in its findings, conclusions, and order and set a hearing to determine fees. Plaintiff's attorney failed to read the findings, to notice the date of the hearing, or to appear at the hearing. Defendant was subsequently allowed to present his claim for fees and costs. The District Court properly found that the attorney's failure to carefully read the findings, conclusions, and order was not excusable neglect. Watson v. Fultz, 239 M 364, 782 P2d 361, 46 St. Rep. 1751 (1989).

Prevailing Party — Net Judgment on Counterclaim No Justification of Attorney Fees: Although lessor received a net judgment on a counterclaim, it was within the lower court's discretion to not award attorney fees when both parties had breached the contract. The award of money was only one factor in determining the prevailing party. Empire Dev. Co. v. Johnson, 236 M 433, 770 P2d 525, 46 St. Rep. 487 (1989).

Attorney Fees Not Awardable on Affidavit of Counsel — Hearing Required: Even though a contract may provide for the award of reasonable attorney fees, it is improper to award attorney fees solely on the affidavit of counsel without holding an evidentiary hearing on the matter. Stark v. Borner, 234 M 254, 762 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 1885 (1988), followed in Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Denial of Attorney Fees When Both Parties Breach Contract: Seller of real property breached a contract by not providing mortgage releases, while buyer breached by not making contract payments when obligated to do so. In light of the breach of contract by both parties, a District Court award of attorney fees based on this section was reversed. Sjoberg v. Kravik, 233 M 33, 759 P2d 966, 45 St. Rep. 1270 (1988).

Provision for Fees by Contract or Statute: Attorney fees are allowed when they are provided for by statute or contractual provision. Poulsen's, Inc. v. Wood, 232 M 411, 756 P2d 1162, 45 St.

Rep. 1154 (1988), followed in Wise v. Sebena, 248 M 32, 808 P2d 494, 48 St. Rep. 309 (1991), and in Farm Credit Bank of Spokane v. Hill, 266 M 258, 879 P2d 1158, 50 St. Rep. 726 (1993).

Costs Provided by Contract Allowable Despite Tortious Nature of Claim: In an action by plaintiff to rescind a contract for sale of real property because of alleged fraud, misrepresentation, undue influence, and unconscionability, the award of attorney fees and costs that the contract provided to the successful defendant, relating to his defense and counterclaim of wrongful occupation by the plaintiff, was proper notwithstanding the contention that the action sounded in tort and not in contract (citing Winer v. Jonal Corp., 169 M 247, 545 P2d 1094 (1976)). The underlying action was based on a contract dispute. Westlake v. Osborne, 230 M 364, 750 P2d 444, 45 St. Rep. 277 (1988).

Reversal of Award of Attorney Fees — Applicability of Specific Statutes: Respondents contended that under 27-1-316, 28-3-704, and 30-14-222 they were entitled to attorney fees. The court considered each statute and decided: (1) since the issue of unlawful restraint of trade was reversed, no damages were allowable under 30-14-222; (2) because there was no allowance for attorney fees where the covenantor brings an action for breach of contract against the covenantee, 27-1-316 was inapplicable; and (3) since an agreement with an attorney fee provision was entered into prior to the July 1, 1971, effective date enumerated in 28-3-704 and was found to have been merged in the deeds that contained no such provision, 28-3-704 was also not applicable. The award of attorney fees to respondents was reversed. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Contractual Attorney Fees — "At Fault" Party Offering to Pay Prior to Trial Prevailing on Appeal: The parties entered into a 5-year lease for office space. Defendant failed to make a monthly rental payment, and plaintiff sent a notice of default followed by a notice to quit. An unlawful detainer action followed. The lease contained a clause providing that in the event of breach, the party "at fault" was liable for the other party's reasonable costs and attorney fees. Defendant admitted fault and, on September 14, offered to pay back rent, interest, attorney fees, and costs. Plaintiff refused and proceeded to trial. Plaintiff prevailed at the District Court, but defendant prevailed on appeal to the extent that it was found entitled to access to the protective statutes. The Supreme Court held that under these circumstances, defendant was "at fault" only until September 14 and was liable only for attorney fees through that date. The Grand Co. v. Jim Slack & Assoc., Inc., 212 M 149, 687 P2d 683, 41 St. Rep. 1654 (1984).

No Provision in Property Settlement for Attorney Fees — Fees Improperly Awarded: Where the parties to a dissolution proceeding agreed to a property settlement that did not provide for payment of attorney fees and the District Court later issued an order providing for the attorney fees to be paid by the husband if he did not comply with the agreement, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred in issuing the order for the payment of fees by the husband. The property settlement agreement was approved by the District Court but never incorporated by reference into the decree and therefore has the status of a private contract, and the remedies for enforcement of a judgment are unavailable. Absent a statute or contractual provision, attorney fees are generally not recoverable, and since neither is involved here, there was no right to those fees. Lorge v. Lorge, 207 M 423, 675 P2d 115, 41 St. Rep. 50 (1984).

Payee-Assignor's Right to Attorney Fees Provided for by Note: Maker gave payee a promissory note which provided that maker would pay reasonable attorney fees incurred in collection of the note. Payee assigned it to corporation which sued maker on the note, maker in turn filing a third-party complaint against payee-assignor for fraudulent inducement for the note, wrongful assignment of it, and lack of consideration for it. Payee-assignor had no right to attorney fees as against maker, either under this section or the note. He had assigned all his rights under the note, and the complaint against him was not a collection action under the note. Sliter's v. Lee, 197 M 182, 641 P2d 475, 39 St. Rep. 453 (1982), followed in Shull v. First Interstate Bank of Great Falls, 269 M 32, 887 P2d 193, 51 St. Rep. 1345 (1994).

Recovery of Fees Absent Contract or Statute: Attorney fees are not generally recoverable in the absence of a contractual or statutory provision for recovery. Sliter's v. Lee, 197 M 182, 641 P2d 475, 39 St. Rep. 453 (1982), followed in Shull v. First Interstate Bank of Great Falls, 269 M 32, 887 P2d 193, 51 St. Rep. 1345 (1994).

Attorney Fees — Procedure for Determining Amount: Defendant leased a truck from plaintiff. Defendant defaulted on the lease. Plaintiff sued for amounts owing and prevailed. The lease agreement provided for attorney fees. A motion for fees was filed along with a supporting affidavit. A hearing was held, and the District Court reduced the amount awarded from what was requested. The Supreme Court found nothing improper in the award of attorney fees on appeal. R & W Leasing v. Mosher, 195 M 285, 636 P2d 832, 38 St. Rep. 1857 (1981).

"Parties to the Contract": When the plaintiff bank sued upon its contract with one defendant, codefendants who had an interest in the object of the contract but who were not "parties to the contract" could in no event become entitled to attorney fees under this section. First Westside Nat'l Bank v. Llera, 176 M 481, 580 P2d 100 (1978).

Law of the Case: The argument raised by appellant concerning the award of attorney fees in relation to the effective date of this section was the precise issue in a prior appeal of this case and was plainly and unequivocally resolved in favor of the propriety of such award. The general rule in Montana is that when a decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court on a particular issue between the same parties in the same case, whether that decision is right or wrong, it is binding and cannot be relitigated. Belgrade St. Bank v. Swainson, 176 M 444, 578 P2d 1166 (1978), followed in In re Marriage of Gies, 218 M 433, 709 P2d 635, 42 St. Rep. 1715 (1985).

Retail Installment Contract — No Award of Attorney Fees: The provision for attorney fees in the retail installment contract could not be made a basis for an award of attorney fees under this section when the contract had been fully executed and was separable from the purchase contract which was the basis of plaintiff's action. Brabender v. Kit Mfg. Co., 174 M 63, 568 P2d 547 (1977).

Proof of Costs Required: Proof of costs for reasonable attorneys' fees is required when services are contracted for or appear on a note. A determination of reasonableness is made to insure efficient administration of justice and maintain public confidence in bench and bar. Crncevich v. Georgetown Recreation Corp., 168 M 113, 541 P2d 56 (1975). See also Stark v. Borner, 234 M 254, 762 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 1885 (1988), and Krone v. McCann, 205 M 190, 666 P2d 766, 40 St. Rep. 1207 (1983).

Real Estate Listings Agreement: Seller who successfully defended suit by real estate broker for payment of sales commission was entitled to recover attorney's fees. Flaherty v. Hensley, 165 M 434, 529 P2d 1389 (1975).

AGENCY

General Provisions

Part Case Notes

Agency — Issue Raised for First Time on Appeal Not Considered: The Supreme Court will not determine the existence of an agency relationship for the first time on appeal. Serv. Funding, Inc. v. Craft, 234 M 431, 763 P2d 1131, 45 St. Rep. 2030 (1988).

Power of Attorney — General Rules of Interpretation: A power of attorney is nothing more than an instrument in writing authorizing another to act as one's agent. The rules governing the interpretation of written instruments generally govern the construction of powers of attorney. First and foremost the intention of the parties as it existed at the time the powers were granted is to be ascertained. Next and when ascertained, that intention is to be given effect. The intention is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible. The words used in the writing are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than according to their strict legal meaning, unless used by the parties in a technical sense or unless a special meaning is given to them by usage, in which case the latter must be followed. Technical words are to be interpreted as usually understood by persons in the profession or business to which they relate, unless clearly used in a different sense. The whole of the writing is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other. While the powers granted must be strictly pursued by the agent, where the language permits, a power must be construed so as to carry out the purposes of the appointment. Where the words used are ambiguous in themselves, they are to be taken most strictly against the principal, and the agent in his dealings with a third person may bind his principal in accordance with usage or by any construction of the ambiguous words that is reasonable. The grant of powers is not to be frittered away by very nice and metaphysical distinctions when the general tenor of the instrument is in favor of what was done under the power and when the principal has reaped the benefit of it. A strained interpretation of the powers granted should never be given. McLaren Gold Mines Co. v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1951), distinguished in In re Trust of Jameison v. Bolich, 2000 MT 190, 300 M 418, 8 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 753 (2000).

Deficiency Judgment Not Barred by Alleged Misrepresentations Absent Evidence of Agency: A partnership sought to bar a deficiency judgment by imputing to the lender on agency grounds responsibility for alleged misrepresentations made by a partnership member in securing signatures of borrowers to the promissory note and the trust indenture. However, absent any evidence that the partner was either an actual or ostensible agent of the lender, no imputations could be made that the lender was responsible for the misrepresentations. Trustees of the Wash.-Idaho-Mont. Carpenters-Employers Retirement Trust Fund v. Galleria Partnership, 239 M 250, 780 P2d 608, 46 St. Rep. 1661 (1989).

Control Necessary for Agency: Wolfes' tavern was destroyed in a fire caused by wires leading to a refrigeration unit serviced by the defendant, Schulz Refrigeration. The jury was instructed that the action of the Wolfes' insurance company in inspecting the tavern for fire hazards could be imputed to the Wolfes. This instruction was improperly given. Merely contacting an owner and obtaining permission to inspect his premises is not sufficient control in such owner to establish an agency relationship. The judgment was affirmed however because the grounds for objection at the trial level are different from the argument made on appeal. Wolfe v. Schulz Refrigeration, 188 M 511, 614 P2d 1015, 36 St. Rep. 2091 (1979), followed in Weingart v. C&W Taylor Partnership, 248 M 76, 809 P2d 576, 48 St. Rep. 332 (1991).

Joint Ventures: The members of a joint venture are principals for themselves and are agents as to the other members. Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Determination of Agency Status — Burden of Proof: Appellant failed to sustain burden of proof to establish that third party was agent of respondent when respondent never claimed there was an agency relationship, negotiations were between appellant and respondent, and information gathered by third party was at the request of the respondent. Schulz v. Peake, 178 M 261, 583 P2d 425 (1978).

Factors Determining Existence of Agency: Where service station proprietor was not required to file any written reports to oil company, proprietor could stock any merchandise of his choosing, oil company did not inspect service station and did not require proprietor to wear any particular uniform or to operate station during any particular hours, and only written agreements between oil company and proprietor were equipment leases and truck rental, oil company was not liable for injury sustained by third person on service station premises due to gasoline fire since relationship between oil company and proprietor was not one of actual agency under this section. Elkins v. Husky Oil Co., 153 M 159, 455 P2d 329 (1969).

Insurance Adjuster as Agent of Vehicle Owner: Where after automobile collision plaintiff wrote to owner of other vehicle respecting damage to his automobile and was referred to adjuster of insurance company, and after meeting with adjuster such adjuster agreed to pay a certain sum as damages, which sum was never paid, owner of such other vehicle was liable on such agreement in suit brought by plaintiff. Selby v. Victoria Mines, Inc., 124 M 321, 221 P2d 423 (1950), explained in Jensen v. O'Daniel, 210 F. Supp. 317 (D.C. Mont. 1962).

No Notice Imputed to Escrow Party by Knowledge of Escrow Officer: In action by bank to recover on a promissory note and set aside a conveyance of property securing payment of the note, the Supreme Court held that a third party did not have notice of an assignment of a promissory note and refused to impute such notice to him through a special agent, the escrow officer. First Fidelity Bank v. Matthews, 214 M 323, 692 P2d 1255, 41 St. Rep. 2502 (1984).

Peril of Person Dealing With Special Agent:

One dealing with a special agent without acquainting himself with the strict extent of the agent's authority and governing himself accordingly acts at his peril; he is not justified in relying upon any appearance of authority except that which is directly deductible from the nature of the authority actually conferred. Phelps v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 105 M 195, 71 P2d 887 (1937), followed in Estate of Pruyn v. Axmen Propane, Inc., 2009 MT 448, 354 M 208, 223 P3d 845 (2009).

Rule that one dealing with a special agent is bound at his peril to ascertain the scope of the agent's authority applies not only to special agents employed for a single transaction but to agents who have only special authority. Barrett v. McHattie, 102 M 473, 59 P2d 794 (1936).

A person dealing with a special agent is bound at his peril to ascertain the scope of the agent's authority. Benema v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 94 M 138, 21 P2d 69 (1933); NW. Elec. Equip. Co.

v. Leighton, 66 M 529, 213 P 1094 (1923); Schaeffer v. Mut. Benefit Life Ins. Co., 38 M 459, 100 P 225 (1909); Moore v. Skyles, 33 M 135, 82 P 799 (1905).

If a person in negotiating for the purchase of land deals with an agent whom he knows to be a special one and makes a partial payment to him which the agent has no right to receive, after which the deal falls through, the receipt of the agent for the money is not the receipt of the principal and the payer cannot recover such payment from the principal. Schaeffer v. Mut. Benefit Life Ins. Co., 38 M 459, 100 P 225 (1909).

General Agent — Who Is: A local agent of a fire insurance company who had authority to accept risks, issue policies and cancel the same, collect premiums, and consent to assignments of policies and to a change of title on foreclosure, unrestricted or hedged about with limitations, will be held to have possessed the powers of a general agent of the insurer. Baker v. Union Assurance Soc'y of London, Ltd., 81 M 281, 264 P 132 (1928).

Special Agent — Who Is:

Where one not in the general employment of the owner of an automobile was directed by the latter to take the car to a prospective purchaser for the purpose of demonstration and then take it to the garage, he was the special agent of the owner for that and no other purpose. Susser v. Delovage, 73 M 354, 236 P 1082 (1925).

One to whom a money order was given by another, with instructions to see if it was all right, and if so, to get it cashed, was a special agent of the latter within the meaning of this section. Moore v. Skyles, 33 M 135, 82 P 799 (1905).

Case Notes

No Evidence of Ostensible Agency in Livestock Transaction: Semenza sold cattle to Kniss, and the sale was paid through a wire transfer from Stockman's Livestock Order Buying, Inc. (Stockman's), an Oklahoma corporation. Semenza sold a second lot of cattle to Kniss and received another wire transfer from Stockman's, but the amount was $52,000 less than the price that was orally agreed on between Semenza and Kniss. Semenza brought a breach of contract action against Kniss and Stockman's, arguing that Kniss acted as Stockman's ostensible agent. The District Court found that no agency relationship existed between Kniss and Stockman's, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The only evidence that suggested an ostensible agency was the wire transfers and Semenza's affidavit that he believed that Kniss worked for Stockman's. The evidence was insufficient to support a reasonable belief that an ostensible agency relationship existed, and the District Court did not err in so holding. Semenza v. Kniss, 2008 MT 238, 344 M 427, 189 P3d 1188 (2008).

Failure to Prove Agency — Summary Judgment on Nonliability for Constructive Discharge by Alleged Agent Improper: Plaintiff sued defendant corporation American Music Co. (AMC) for constructive discharge based on individual defendant Kelman's tortious interference with plaintiff and AMC's business relationship. Kelman founded AMC and then transferred ownership to his daughters but remained a creditor of AMC and owned the building where the business was located. Plaintiff cited numerous instances of Kelman's intimidating and threatening behavior in the office, contending that Kelman's actions and AMC's failure to control Kelman impaired plaintiff's ability to function normally at work and resulted in plaintiff's constructive discharge. Kelman moved for summary judgment on grounds that Kelman was an agent of AMC and thus was privileged from claims of tortious interference. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment to Kelman and AMC. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Kelman was not employed by AMC and thus was not an actual agent, nor did ostensible agency exist because AMC never caused any third person to believe that Kelman was an AMC agent. Absent an agency relationship between Kelman and AMC, Kelman's claimed privilege from suit failed. In addition, constructive discharge is usually a question of fact for the trier of fact to decide and is not subject to summary judgment. Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to create a question of fact whether a reasonable person would have felt forced to resign, so the grant of summary judgment to AMC was also reversible error. Bellanger v. Am. Music Co., 2004 MT 392, 325 M 221, 104 P3d 1075 (2004).

Insufficient Notice of Employment Relationship Between Hospital and Anesthesiologist — Question of Fact Regarding Patient's Belief of Agency Relationship — Summary Judgment for Hospital Improper: Following two epidural injections for back pain by different anesthesiologists, Butler developed a spinal infection that was likely caused by one of the two injections. Subsequently, Butler filed a medical malpractice case against the two anesthesiologists and St. Patrick Hospital, alleging that each was negligent in breaching the standard of care and causing his infection by failing to provide a sterile environment prior to performing the injections. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of St. Patrick Hospital, concluding that Butler failed to raise genuine issues of material fact as to whether the hospital intentionally or negligently led Butler to reasonably believe that one of the anesthesiologists was its employee. In reversing the District Court's ruling, the Supreme Court adopted the rationale of a Supreme Court of Indiana decision in Sword v. NKC Hosp., Inc., 714 NE 2d 142 (Ind. 1999), agreeing with its conclusion that "a hospital will be deemed to have held itself out as a provider of care unless it gives notice to the patient that it is not the provider of care and that the care is provided by a physician who is an independent contractor and not subject to the control and supervision of the hospital". In its ruling, the court cited the following three facts in Sword to be of particular relevance: (1) the record contained no evidence that would have indicated that the hospital did anything to put the patient on notice that the physician, an independent contractor, and not the hospital, was responsible for medical care; (2) the patient did not select an anesthesiologist prior to admission, and the record did not contain any evidence that would have indicated that the patient had any special knowledge with regard to the hospital's employment arrangements; and (3) the hospital held itself out as a full service hospital. Applying these factors, the court ruled that the evidence was sufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the hospital caused Butler to believe that the anesthesiologist who administered the injection at the hospital was its agent because Butler received no notice of the employment relationship between the anesthesiologist and St. Patrick Hospital and did not select the particular anesthesiologist to perform the procedure and because the record contained no evidence indicating that Butler did not believe that the anesthesiologist was not the hospital's employee. Butler v. Domin, 2000 MT 312, 302 M 452, 15 P3d 1189, 57 St. Rep. 1320 (2000).

Failure of Stucco Product — No Agency Relationship Between Contractor-Applicator and Manufacturer — No Negligence or Strict Liability Found — Leave to Amend Complaint Denied: Sunset Point Partnership (Sunset), a condominium developer, sued Wolstein, d/b/a Stuc-O-Flex Systems; Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc.; and Melton and Fischer, d/b/a Melton Fischer Construction (Melton/Fischer). Sunset's complaint alleged breach of contract, breach of warranty, indemnity, negligence, and strict liability in tort because a stucco-like product that Wolstein, as a subcontractor with Melton/Fischer, applied to the exterior of condominium buildings developed problems. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., on each of the five counts in Sunset's complaint, holding that there was no evidence of negligence or breach of contract or warranty by Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., and no evidence of agency between Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., and Melton/Fischer. Sunset appealed. Citing previous decisions by it to the effect that in order for there to be ostensible agency the principal and not the agent must have taken steps to lead a third party to the belief that an agency relationship existed, the Supreme Court held that there was no evidence of actual or ostensible agency between Melton/Fischer and Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., As to Sunset's claim of negligence, the Supreme Court answered Sunset's argument that Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., was negligent in failing to provide adequate training, supervision, and instruction to Wolstein by pointing out that Sunset's complaint only alleged negligence against the defendants in the "manner in which they applied" Stuc-O-Flex and that there was no record evidence indicating a duty on the part of Stuc-O-Flex International, Inc., to train and supervise Wolstein. Concerning Sunset's claim for strict liability, the Supreme Court noted that Sunset had only alleged defective application of Stuc-O-Flex and had not alleged a defective product. Moreover, the Supreme Court pointed out that Sunset's own expert testified that: (1) there was nothing inherently defective about Stuc-O-Flex; (2) Stuc-O-Flex

International, Inc., did not sell a "system" consisting of the material on which the product was applied and the product, but only sold the product itself; and (3) therefore only that product was guaranteed. In its review of the District Court's denial of Sunset's motion to amend its complaint to add the seller of the product as a defendant, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision, pointing out that the litigation was 2 years old by the time that Sunset made its untimely motion to amend. Sunset Point Partnership v. Stuc-O-Flex Int'l, Inc., 1998 MT 42, 287 M 388, 954 P2d 1156, 55 St. Rep. 141 (1998).

Insufficient Evidence:

Plaintiffs relied on Kober v. Billings Deaconess Hosp., 148 M 117, 417 P2d 476 (1966), in maintaining that the provision of office space by a small rural hospital to a radiologist who rotated between several small hospitals constituted sufficient material fact to establish an ostensible agency relationship. However, the allegations did not demonstrate intentional conduct on the part of the hospital to cause plaintiffs to believe the radiologist was an agent of the hospital, nor were there any acts amounting to want of ordinary care by the hospital to indicate an agency relationship existed. The Supreme Court distinguished Kober in affirming the trial court's grant of summary judgment based on plaintiff's failure to present sufficient evidence that would give rise to a genuine issue of material fact regarding ostensible agency. Estates of Milliron v. Francke, 243 M 200, 793 P2d 824, 47 St. Rep. 1134 (1990), following Elkins v. Husky Oil, 153 M 159, 455 P2d 329 (1969). See also Sunset Point Partnership v. Stuc-O-Flex Int'l, Inc., 1998 MT 42, 287 M 388, 954 P2d 1156, 55 St. Rep. 141 (1998). However, see Butler v. Domin, 2000 MT 312, 302 M 452, 15 P3d 1189, 57 St. Rep. 1320 (2000), distinguishing Milliron in ruling that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to St. Patrick Hospital because testimony raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the hospital caused the patient to reasonably believe that the anesthesiologist was an agent of the hospital.

In a dispute over a machine lease transaction, the lessee Doll claimed that the supply company's representative, Walth, was the ostensible agent of a second company, the leasing company, Colonial Pacific. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no ostensible agency created since the undisputed record showed that neither Walth nor Colonial Pacific represented that Walth was Colonial Pacific's agent and further showed that Doll did not believe that Walth was the agent of Colonial Pacific. Doll v. Major Muffler Centers, Inc., 208 M 401, 687 P2d 48, 41 St. Rep. 429 (1984).

Pilot was not ostensible agent of aviation service where owner of plane made own arrangements with pilot and plaintiff's decedent did not rely on aviation service's responsibility, even though aviation service had introduced pilot to plane owner, had previously supplied its own employees as pilots, furnished weather information for flight plans, and organized recovery activities after plane had gone down. Calkins v. Oxbow Ranch, Inc., 159 M 120, 495 P2d 1124 (1972).

Fact that service station proprietor displayed signs advertising oil company's products and honored oil company's credit cards was not sufficient to make proprietor ostensible agent of oil company under this section or 28-10-403, and therefore oil company was not liable for injury sustained by third person on service station premises. Elkins v. Husky Oil Co., 153 M 159, 455 P2d 329 (1969). See also Sunset Point Partnership v. Stuc-O-Flex Int'l, Inc., 1998 MT 42, 287 M 388, 954 P2d 1156, 55 St. Rep. 141 (1998).

The facts that plaintiff in a letter to a bank enclosed with the deed, notes and mortgage to be executed by defendant the supplemental contract between G. and defendant, that it was delivered to him with the deed and that plaintiff did not thereafter repudiate the contract, did not under the circumstances amount to a holding out of G. as his agent so as to make it binding upon himself. Hartt v. Jahn, 59 M 173, 196 P 153 (1921).

Agency Relationship of National Realty Organization With Locally Owned Franchisee as Question of Fact: Summary judgment was improper where a genuine issue as to a material fact existed regarding home buyers' reliance on the name and reputation of a national realty organization despite an "independently owned and operated" disclaimer displayed on materials furnished by the local franchisee. Burkland v. Electronic Realty Associates, Inc., 228 M 113, 740 P2d 1142, 44 St. Rep. 1384 (1987).

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. Jacobs, as secured party, repossessed the inventory and sold it to Snick Sports. Dirkson, who worked for K&M and then Snick, told Powers that Jacobs would guarantee Snick's payment of goods sold to Snick by Powers. There was disagreement as to whether Dirkson worked for Jacobs. For 2 years Powers mailed merchandise, statements, and invoices to Jacobs, who forwarded them to Snick, who paid the bills. When some bills went unpaid, Powers sued Jacobs when he failed to pay the bills on request. The mailings to Jacobs put him on reasonable notice that something was wrong. His failure to investigate and take action was want of ordinary care that caused or allowed Powers to believe an authorized agency existed between Jacobs and Dirkson. Thus, there was an ostensible agency and ostensible authority. For the same reason, a valid guaranty existed and Jacobs was estopped from defending against it on the basis of the Statute of Frauds. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Notice of On-Job Injury Through Employer's Agent, a Physician: Employer, a hospital, in a suit to recover workers' compensation benefits may be considered to have actual notice within the meaning of 39-71-603 when claimant, a nurse in the hospital, sought and was given treatment by a physician in the emergency room. The physician is an agent under this section, and the hospital may be considered to have notice under 28-10-604. The purpose of the notice requirement is to enable the employer to protect himself by prompt investigation of the claimed accident and prompt treatment of the injury involved with a view toward minimizing its effects by proper medical care. Where, as here, within 2 hours of the accident, the employer had notice and a diagnosis and its managing agent had prescribed treatment for the injury, the purpose of 39-71-603 is fulfilled. Harmon v. Deaconess Hosp., 191 M 285, 623 P2d 1372, 38 St. Rep 65 (1981).

No Agency — Independent Contractor: The determinative question in this case was whether any type of agency relationship existed between York and Cascade Northern at the time York signed the agreement with Miller such that Miller could enforce the agreement against Cascade Northern. No actual agency existed since York was acting as an independent contractor and no ostensible agency existed since there was no act or conduct on the part of Cascade Northern holding York out as its agent. Miller v. Cascade N. Co., 181 M 66, 592 P2d 156 (1979), followed in Sunset Point Partnership v. Stuc-O-Flex Int'l, Inc., 1998 MT 42, 287 M 388, 954 P2d 1156, 55 St. Rep. 141 (1998).

Acts and Statements Establishing Agency:

Where retailer placed orders through wholesaler but received billings directly from manufacturer, and manufacturer attended sales and promotion meetings arranged by wholesaler, retailer was entitled to rely on the ostensible agency relationship between the manufacturer and the wholesaler. Butler Mfg. Co. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975), followed in Youderian Constr., Inc. v. Hall, 285 M 1, 945 P2d 909, 54 St. Rep. 1012 (1997).

Where a husband signed a letter employing an attorney and where his wife conferred with the attorney several times and approved his actions with the husband's knowledge and without his expressed disapproval, and where the husband claimed the benefits of the attorney's actions, the wife was the ostensible agent of the husband. Purcell v. Gibbs, 133 M 481, 326 P2d 679 (1958).

In an action against a bank for the conversion of plaintiff's funds deposited in a joint account in her own name and that of her daughter in wrongfully paying practically the entire account to the daughter on checks issued by the latter, evidence that plaintiff in opening the account told the bank cashier that she was placing her affairs in the daughter's hands and wished her to have complete charge of the account without requiring plaintiff's presence, attention, or signature, established the daughter's agency in any transaction had with the bank. Ludwig v. Mont. Bank & Trust Co., 109 M 477, 98 P2d 377 (1939).

Evidence that a lien claimant who performed work on defendant's building dealt with a brother of the attorney-in-fact of the owner, which brother was looking after the building either at the request of the attorney-in-fact or the owner and collected rents and endorsed rent checks received, was sufficient to sustain trial court's finding of agency, since the brother with whom the contract was made was at least the ostensible agent of the owner. Doney v. Ellison, 103 M 591, 64 P2d 348 (1937).

To constitute one an ostensible agent, the party sought to be held as principal must, by reason of some act or want of ordinary care on his part, have led the other party to believe he was his agent even though not actually employed by him. Hartt v. Jahn, 59 M 173, 196 P 153 (1921).

Course of Dealing Establishing an Ostensible Agency: Where principal's conduct led third party to believe he was dealing with an agent and third party returned merchandise to agent under such belief, principal cannot hold third party liable for cost of returned merchandise as principal led third party to believe agent had apparent authority to accept return of merchandise. Butler Mfg. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975).

Negligence: Where appellant failed to establish a case of negligence against the supposed agent, it would be impossible to impute negligence to the principal. Knowlton v. Sandaker, 150 M 438, 436 P2d 98 (1968).

Service Upon Corporation — Proper Agent: The doctrine of ostensible agency appears to have no application when it becomes involved with the question whether service of process has been legally made upon a "managing or general agent". Further, service upon a former employee of a company was not service upon the company itself and default judgment was vacated and set aside. Kraus v. Treasure Belt Min. Co., 146 M 432, 408 P2d 151 (1965).

Acquiescence in Agency: Where a hotel company had acted as a ski lift company's agent in managing the latter's business, and where the hotel company's principal stockholder had later taken possession of and controlled the ski lift company's office and principal place of business for 2 years, the principal stockholder was the agent of the ski lift company in negotiating an employment contract, and this was further confirmed when the stockholder engaged counsel to defend the ski lift company in the instant litigation. Hamilton v. Lion Head Ski Lift, Inc., 139 M 335, 363 P2d 716 (1961), explained in Kraus v. Treasure Belt Min. Co., 146 M 432, 408 P2d 151 (1965).

Burden of Proof: Where plaintiff in his complaint contended that there was a partnership, he assumed the burden of establishing that there was one in fact, or that the partners had permitted themselves to be represented as such to him and that on the faith of such representations, he had given the credit to the partnership. Hempstead v. Allen, 126 M 578, 255 P2d 342 (1953).

Ratification: In an action to recover oil well driller's wages, and on an assigned claim for supplies furnished at the instance and request of an employee of the operator, evidence held to have warranted a judgment for plaintiff on theory that the persons at whose instance the claims were incurred were agents of defendant operator whose acts the latter had ratified with knowledge of the facts resulting in the claims. Stoican v. Withers, 104 M 173, 65 P2d 604 (1937).

Agency Implied: Agency may be implied from conduct and from all the facts and circumstances in the case and may be shown by circumstantial evidence. Also ratification may be implied from the acts and conduct of the alleged principal. Freeman v. Withers, 104 M 166, 65 P2d 601 (1937).

Estoppel: Where one to whom another is indebted by want of ordinary care causes the debtor to believe that a third person is his agent for the purpose of receiving payment, such latter is the ostensible agent of the creditor, and payment having been received by the agent, the principal is estopped to disavow it. Millious v. Thompson, 94 M 110, 20 P2d 1060 (1933).

Workers' Compensation — Disaffirmation of Settlement Agreement by Minor: A minor was injured while working and filed for workers' compensation benefits. He subsequently signed a settlement agreement after negotiating with a claims adjuster. The claimant's filing of a petition to reopen his claim resulted in a hearing and the conclusion that the case was closed. The claimant appealed, based on his minority status at the time of the settlement and his concomitant right to disaffirm contracts. The Supreme Court held that the close relationship and continuing awareness of the claimant's mother during the claims negotiations were of no avail to the defendants because only the minor claimant had signed the settlement. The defendant should have required the claimant's legal guardian to sign as well as the claimant. Accordingly, the final compromise settlement was set aside. Parrent v. Midway Toyota, 192 M 118, 626 P2d 848, 38 St. Rep. 559 (1981).

Agency — Parents' Neglect to Give Notice Not Imputable to Child — Child Incapable of Appointing Agent: Neglect of parents of injured child to give 60-day notice provided for by Ch. 122, L. 1937, may not be imputed to the child, and since under this section a child is incapable of appointing an agent for any purpose, it is questionable whether the statute can be complied with in that respect by anyone as agent. Child's cause of action for personal injuries is a property right over which under 40-6-232 a parent has no control. Lazich v. Belanger, 111 M 48, 105 P2d 738 (1940).

Transfer of Property for Creation of Trust Not Included in General Power of Attorney: Jameison appointed her granddaughter, Bolich, as "true and lawful attorney", granting her authority to generally act in Jameison's stead "in all matters affecting my business or property". Bolich created a trust agreement naming Jameison the income beneficiary for life and Bolich as trustee and designating Jameison's two daughters as income beneficiaries during their lives in the event that they survived Jameison. The trust agreement provided for distribution of the trust principal for the health, maintenance, and welfare of the income beneficiaries at the trustee's discretion, and upon the death of the last income beneficiary, the trust was to dissolve, with the remainder distributed to Bolich or her estate. Bolich then conveyed all of Jameison's real property, including over 30 parcels, and personal property, including several certificates of deposit and promissory notes, to herself. Jameison died a few months later, and one daughter died shortly thereafter. Over 7 years later, Bolich distributed $100 in trust income to the remaining daughter, who was unhappy with the accounting and challenged the validity of the trust agreement, moving for summary judgment on grounds that Bolich did not have authority under the power of attorney to create it, citing a lack of evidence of Jameison's intent to create the trust and the fact that the trust agreement and conveyance documents were signed solely by Bolich and not by Jameison. The District Court found that Bolich's assertions regarding Jameison's intent were purely speculative and that Bolich had failed to produce any evidence that Jameison had intended to create the trust. The court concluded that the general power of attorney did not specifically authorize Bolich to create the trust and that Bolich exceeded her authority in doing so. The trust was invalidated and terminated, and the estate was distributed pursuant to the laws of intestacy. Bolich appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. In this case, the power of attorney was broad and general but did not grant authority to create a trust, reflect Jameison's intent to create a trust, or even mention a trust, so Bolich's transfer of Jameison's property to herself as trustee was not warranted by the terms actually used in the power of attorney or as a means of executing other authority. The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to 28-10-211 by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208. Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Bolich, 2000 MT 190, 300 M 418, 8 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 753 (2000), distinguishing McLaren Gold Mines Co. v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1951).

Creation of Agency

Lack of Agency as Negative Defense: Lack of agency is a negative rather than affirmative defense. Sterrett v. Milk River Prod. Credit Ass'n, 234 M 459, 764 P2d 467, 45 St. Rep. 2048 (1988), following Porto v. Peden, 233 F. Supp. 178 (W.D. Pa. 1964). See also Grimsley v. Estate of Spencer, 206 M 184, 670 P2d 85 (1983).

No Agency Created by Supervision of Federal Intermediate Credit Bank Over Production Credit Association: Under 12 U.S.C. 2012(13) and 2072(15) and in accord with Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Langley, 792 F2d 547 (5th Cir. 1986), the regulatory function exercised by a federal intermediate credit bank over a production credit association creates no agency relationship. The separate corporate nature of the entities under their enabling statutes and the separate functions of the organizations mandate this conclusion. Sterrett v. Milk River Prod. Credit Ass'n, 234 M 459, 764 P2d 467, 45 St. Rep. 2048 (1988).

County Not Acting as State's Agent in Denial of Disposal Permit — Mandamus Erroneously Granted: Where the plaintiff applied to the county health department for a disposal permit but was not informed for a period of 6 years whether the permit would be granted, the District Court erred in holding that the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) was estopped from denying the permit by the county's failure to act. There were no statutes or decisions that made the county the agent of the Department at the time of the 1971 permit application. Under the rationale of St. v. District Court, 170 M 15, 550 P2d 382 (1976), the record and statutes show that the county did not act as an agent for the state in the denial of the 1971 application. Huttinga v. Pringle, 205 M 482, 668 P2d 1068, 40 St. Rep. 1444 (1983).

28-10-201. How agency may be created.

Case Notes

Ratification of Void Deeds — Authority of Agent to Convey Property — Title Properly Quieted: Defendant third party raised three challenges to a District Court's conclusion that deeds voided by forgery during transfer were nevertheless ratified by subsequent actions of the parties and contended that the court erred by quieting title to plaintiff. The first argument dealt with the fact that one of the parties never received proper written authority to convey the property to plaintiff, so ratification was voided under the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court noted that an agreement to sell an interest in property must be in writing and that an agent's authority to sell property must also be in writing. However, the agency relationship may arise either by precedent authorization or by subsequent ratification. In this case, the warranty deeds constituted subsequent written authority for conveyance of the property, so the statute of frauds was not violated for want of written authorization. The second argument was that the criteria for ratification were not satisfied, but after examining the chain of title, the Supreme Court found that the personal actions of the principal ratified the deed and that the criteria for ratification were satisfied. The third argument was that defendant was prejudiced as a third party by ratification, but that argument did not prevail because defendant could not have been prejudiced since defendant's interest in the property was invalid both prior to and after ratification and defendant could have become aware of the void deeds by conducting a title check and avoiding the problem. Lastly, title was properly quieted in plaintiff because defendants with prior interests in the property stipulated that they no longer claimed any right, title, or interest in the property. Plaintiff's deed was superior because it was the first to be recorded and had been ratified, and plaintiff was therefore entitled to have quiet title to the property. The District Court was affirmed. Erler v. Creative Fin. & Inv., LLC, 2009 MT 36, 349 M 207, 203 P3d 744 (2009). See also U.S. v. Heinszen, 206 US 370 (1907), Audit Serv., Inc. v. Francis Tindall Constr., 183 M 474, 600 P2d 811 (1979), Safeco Ins. Co. v. Lovely Agency, 200 M 447, 652 P2d 1160 (1982), and Moore v. Adolph, 242 M 221, 789 P2d 1239 (1990).

Breach of Contract Action for Failure to Properly Embalm Deceased — Agency — Standing to Sue: Maria handled all funeral arrangements for her deceased mother. The family of the deceased, when viewing the body, observed a stain on the clothing that was determined to be caused by leaking embalming fluid. The lower court dismissed the family's claim for breach of contract and also ruled that Maria was not acting as agent for the other family members and that only she would have been able to sue for breach of contract. The Supreme Court held that a cause of action for breach of contract would exist if Maria could show that the breach had so "damaged" the funeral as to constitute a breach of contract entitling Maria to damages. The Supreme Court did affirm the lower court's ruling that Maria was not acting as an agent for the rest of the family in contracting with the mortuary. Therefore, only she could sue on the contract. Contreraz v. Michelotti-Sawyers & Nordquist Mortuary, Inc., 271 M 300, 896 P2d 1118, 52 St. Rep. 454 (1995).

Agency Question of Fact: In a zoning variance controversy, plaintiffs claimed a city-county planning board and city board of adjustments granted the variance without proper notice, without a hearing, and without considering legal requirements. The District Court dismissed the claim as to defendant and granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed, saying the plaintiff may be able to show the planning board is directly liable to plaintiffs because of its acts through its agent. Borrowing on California precedent, the court held that allegations of agency are questions of fact and should not be decided on a motion for summary judgment. The court noted that in dealing with government entities this is not always true because a principal cannot delegate authority it does not possess. This can be determined by establishing the authority which, as a matter of public record, citizens are charged with knowing. The court also noted that while a government principal's authority may be limited by law, the principal may exceed that authority in its day-to-day activity, thereby existing in fact although precluded by law. The dismissal and summary judgment were reversed. Stillman v. Fergus County, 220 M 315, 715 P2d 43, 43 St. Rep. 396 (1986), followed in Sterrett v. Milk River Prod. Credit Ass'n, 234 M 459, 764 P2d 467, 45 St. Rep. 2048 (1988).

How Authority of Agent to Be Established:

An agency relationship is created only if a purported agent claims to be acting on behalf of a ratifying principal. In a suit involving a lease of machinery, the record was devoid of any claim or understanding by either the lessee or the supplier's representative that the supplier's representative was the agent of a second company, the leasing company. Doll v. Major Muffler Centers, Inc., 208 M 401, 687 P2d 48, 41 St. Rep. 429 (1984).

The authority of an agent and its nature and extent can only be established by tracing it to its source in some word or act of the alleged principal; the agent cannot confer authority upon himself. The relationship of principal and agent cannot be established by the declarations of the agent. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane v. Myhre, 110 M 416, 101 P2d 1017 (1940).

Agency may be created by precedent authorization or subsequent ratification and may be implied from conduct and shown by circumstantial evidence. Ratification may likewise be implied from the acts and conduct of the alleged principal. Freeman v. Withers, 104 M 166, 65 P2d 601 (1937).

Ratification by Payment: Defendant's voluntary contributions to union trust funds ratified the corporate general manager's act of signing the collective bargaining compliance agreements requiring contribution. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Elmo Road Corp., 175 M 533, 575 P2d 77 (1978).

Joint Checking Account: The plaintiff had her daughter look after her business affairs. The plaintiff, by opening a joint account and telling a bank officer she was placing her affairs in her daughter's hands, created an agency relationship. An agency such as that involved here may be granted orally or may be implied from the words and conduct of the parties and the circumstances of the particular case, notwithstanding a later denial by the alleged principal. Ludwig v. Mont. Bank & Trust Co., 109 M 477, 98 P2d 377 (1939).

How Agency Established — Lone Man Apparently in Charge of Elevator: Testimony of a bank cashier that one claimed by the bank in its action for the conversion of mortgaged grain to have been the agent of defendant elevator company was the only man at the elevator when he had an interview with him and that such person was running the elevator and went over the books of the concern with him, together with testimony of a Sheriff stating that such person was apparently in charge, has been held sufficient to establish agency. Exchange St. Bank v. Occident Elev. Co., 95 M 78, 24 P2d 126 (1933).

Attorney as Agent for Client: The rules of law applicable to principal and agent are in general applicable to the relation of attorney and client. An attorney is but the agent of his client for the management and conduct of such matters as are entrusted to him, and if he acts within the scope of his authority the client is bound. Bury v. Bury, 69 M 570, 223 P 502 (1924).

Fraudulent Purpose: An agreement between applicants for public lands, made by one of the parties for his wife and ratified by her, the purpose of the agreement being to stifle competition in bidding, is a fraud on the state and is not enforceable. State ex rel. Danaher v. Miller, 52 M 562, 160 P 513 (1916).

28-10-202. Consideration unnecessary.

Case Notes

Consent Necessary: Agency is founded upon consent, not consideration. St. v. Erlandson, 126 M 316, 249 P2d 794 (1952).

28-10-203. When written authorization necessary.

Transfer of Property for Creation of Trust Not Included in General Power of Attorney: Jameison appointed her granddaughter, Bolich, as "true and lawful attorney", granting her authority to generally act in Jameison's stead "in all matters affecting my business or property". Bolich created a trust agreement naming Jameison the income beneficiary for life and Bolich as trustee and designating Jameison's two daughters as income beneficiaries during their lives in the event that they survived Jameison. The trust agreement provided for distribution of the trust principal for the health, maintenance, and welfare of the income beneficiaries at the trustee's discretion, and upon the death of the last income beneficiary, the trust was to dissolve, with the remainder distributed to Bolich or her estate. The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to 28-10-211 by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208. Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Agency and Ratification to Be in Writing: The plaintiffs initiated a suit to have certain water rights distributed pursuant to the residuary clause of a will. The defendant argued that the rights had previously been assigned to him by a release that he signed as agent of the deceased and that the deceased had subsequently orally affirmed. The Supreme Court held that the original release had to be in writing because it called for payments for 32 years and therefore was subject to the statute of frauds. The court went on to hold that since the release had to be in writing, then the creation of an agency and the subsequent ratification also had to be in writing and that since they were not, the water rights passed under the will. Moore v. Adolph, 242 M 221, 789 P2d 1239, 47 St. Rep. 730 (1990).

Unenforceable Timber Sale by Agent Without Written Authority: Gebert Logging contracted in writing with Palin to remove timber from certain land. This was a contract under 30-2-107 of the U.C.C. for goods to be severed from realty. The contract price was over $500, so under 30-2-201 of the U.C.C., the contract had to be in writing. Under 28-10-203 relating to agency, authority to enter into a contract that the law requires to be written can only be given by an instrument that is itself written. Since Palin did not own the land and did not have written authority from his wife, the owner, to execute the contract as her agent, the contract was unenforceable because it was not signed by or with the written authority of the owner of the land. Gebert Logging was thus entitled to receive back its land damage bond, and Palin was not entitled to damages for alleged unrepaired injury to the land. The court denied Palin's claims that part performance took the contract out of the Statute of Frauds and that the contract should not be invalidated because he had altered his position to his detriment. The court also held that his wife could not retroactively ratify his acts without the consent of Gebert Logging, which was not given. Gebert Logging, Inc. v. Palin, 220 M 405, 716 P2d 200, 43 St. Rep. 481 (1986).

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. Jacobs, as secured party, repossessed the inventory and sold it to Snick Sports. Dirkson, who worked for K&M and then Snick, told Powers that Jacobs would guarantee Snick's payment of goods sold to Snick by Powers. There was disagreement as to whether Dirkson worked for Jacobs. For 2 years Powers mailed merchandise, statements, and invoices to Jacobs, who forwarded them to Snick, who paid the bills. When some bills went unpaid, Powers sued Jacobs when he failed to pay the bills on request. The mailings to Jacobs put him on reasonable notice that something was wrong. His failure to investigate and take action was want of ordinary care that caused or allowed Powers to believe an authorized agency existed between Jacobs and Dirkson. Thus, there was an ostensible agency and ostensible authority. For the same reason, a valid guaranty existed and Jacobs was estopped from defending against it on the basis of the Statute of Frauds. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Realtor Buying Property — Not Usual Course of Business: As part of a real estate transaction in which the buyers needed to sell a piece of property in order to purchase other property, the realtor acting on behalf of the buyers executed a memorandum stating that if the property was not sold by a set time, she would purchase the property at a stated price. The memorandum was not signed by the realtor's alleged partner. On appeal, he contended he could not be bound by the memorandum under the Statute of Frauds. The Supreme Court held that the realtor could not bind her ostensible partner since there was no written authority of agency and because the purchase of real estate was not the realtor's usual way of doing business. The alleged partner could not be bound to the contract evidenced by the memo absent his authorization thereunto in writing. McNabb v. Norine, 204 M 330, 664 P2d 927, 40 St. Rep. 878 (1983).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplement the Montana U.C.C., which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying this section, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Power of Attorney: A power of attorney is nothing more than an instrument in writing authorizing another to act as one's agent. The intention of the parties as it existed at the time of granting the power of attorney is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible, and that intention is to be given effect. McLaren Gold Mines v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1950).

Authority Granted Orally or Implied From Words and Conduct: Where mother opened joint bank account in both her own and daughter's names and told the cashier she was placing her affairs in the daughter's hands and wished her to have complete charge of the account without requiring the mother's presence, attention, or signature, the mother established the daughter's agency, under the rule that such authority may be granted orally or implied from the words and conduct of the parties and the circumstances of the particular case though denied by the alleged principal under this section. Ludwig v. Mont. Bank & Trust Co., 109 M 477, 98 P2d 377 (1939).

Corporation Agent Acting Without Written Authorization:

To make the rule that a corporation may be bound by an act of its agent in entering into a written contract not to be performed within 1 year without specific written authority on the part of the agent to act, required by this section, applicable, the evidence must show that such agent was the managing official of the corporation or that it had theretofore ratified the agent's acts in similar transactions. Elec. Prod. Consol. v. El Campo, Inc., 105 M 386, 73 P2d 199 (1937).

In an action for breach of a written contract entered into between an agent of defendant corporation and plaintiff, running over 3 years where agent's authority was not in writing as required by this section, it was held that trial court erred in directing a verdict for plaintiff in the absence of such written authority, the record, on the contrary, disclosing that the management of the corporation was vested in the board of directors—ratification or estoppel not entering into the case. Elec. Prod. Consol. v. El Campo, Inc., 105 M 386, 73 P2d 199 (1937).

Contract to Sell Land: The authority of an agent to contract to sell land before the adoption of this section was not required to be in writing, and could be shown by oral testimony, or any evidence tending to prove agency. Cobban v. Hecklen, 27 M 245, 70 P 805 (1902).

Case Notes

Ratification of Forged Deed Considered in Equity: Commercial property in Hamilton was transferred to multiple parties in successive transactions, resulting in competing claims to the property. Some of the transactions involved fraud or forgery. Plaintiff filed a complaint against numerous parties that were involved in the transactions and sought to quiet title to the property.

The District Court concluded that the documents of conveyance to three of the parties were forged and therefore void ab initio and that no rights were transferred to any of those parties. The court found that two of the parties had ratified the forged conveyances by their subsequent actions and that because plaintiff was the first to record a document of transfer, plaintiff was entitled to quiet title. One defendant appealed on grounds that a forged deed cannot be ratified, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A forged deed is void and transfers no rights, even if the subsequent purchaser is bona fide. Thus, the three deeds were void ab initio and plaintiff's interest in the property was not saved by 70-20-404, even though plaintiff parted with value, had no notice of the forgery, and duly recorded the appropriate transfer documents. However, in order to provide a legal remedy in the appropriate case, principles of equity and justice compel recognition of ratification, so a forged deed may be considered in equity. Erler v. Creative Fin. & Inv., LLC, 2009 MT 36, 349 M 207, 203 P3d 744 (2009), distinguishing Hames v. Polson, 123 M 469, 215 P2d 950 (1950), and In re Estate of Griffin, 248 M 472, 812 P2d 1256 (1991).

The trust was not created by one of the methods in 72-33-201 and was invalid. Bolich's argument that the trust was ratified pursuant to this section by Jameison's oral authorization also failed because ratification of a trust must be accomplished in writing pursuant to 72-33-208. Absent material facts regarding the validity of the trust, summary judgment invalidating the trust was proper. In re Trust of Jameison v. Principal Estopped From Denying Agency Relationship Because of Ratification of Ostensible Agent's Actions by Retention of Benefit of Third Party's Act: Hall argued that he did not have to pay for a road constructed by Youderian at Hill's direction because Hill was not his agent. The Supreme Court stated that Youderian had acted reasonably in assuming that Hill was Hall's agent based upon prior dealings among the three parties. The Supreme Court held that as a matter of law, an agency relationship had been created because Hall had ratified Hill's employment of Youderian by retaining the benefit of the improved road and that therefore Hall was estopped from denying Hill's ostensible authority. Youderian Constr., Inc. v. Hall, 285 M 1, 945 P2d 909, 54 St. Rep. 1012 (1997).

Agency and Ratification to Be in Writing: The plaintiffs initiated a suit to have certain water rights distributed pursuant to the residuary clause of a will. and that since they were not, the water rights passed under the will. Moore v. Adolph, 242 M 221, 789 P2d 1239, 47 St. Rep. 730 (1990).

Contract for Deed — Notifying Escrow Agent of Default: Seller under contract for deed did not have to notify the escrow agent as well as the buyers that payments were in default and the contract was terminated, because the contract only provided for notice to buyers and did not require notice to the escrow agent. More important, the contract gave buyers the right to pay the accelerated balance due within 90 days of receipt of the notice of default, the deed and other documents were held by and the payments were made to the escrow agent, and notice of default to the escrow agent would have prematurely closed the escrow account and denied the buyers the opportunity to pay off the contract within 90 days. Boles v. Ler, 222 M 28, 719 P2d 793, 43 St. Rep. 1035 (1986).

Contract for Deed — Seller's Right to Cancel After Accepting Late Payments to Escrow Agent: Buyers under contract for deed made three late payments to the escrow agent. The escrow agent's acceptance of the three checks was not acceptance by the seller under the theory that the escrow agent was the seller's agent and acceptance by the agent was acceptance by the principal, nor did seller's acceptance of the payments from the escrow agent ratify the agent's acceptance. Failure to promptly return the payments did not waive seller's right to cancel the contract. The contract gave buyers 90 days from notice of default to pay the balance due under the contract, and they could do so in more than one installment. Seller decided the three payments might be installments in an attempt to pay the balance due and decided to hold the checks until it became apparent that the buyers were either going to pay off the balance due or were attempting to induce seller to waive her right to cancel the contract. Seller returned the checks when she realized the latter was the motive. In addition, seller sent a second cancellation notice, making it clear what her intent was. Boles v. Ler, 222 M 28, 719 P2d 793, 43 St. Rep. 1035 (1986).

Attorney as Agent: Under the rulings of McGinley v. Md. Cas. of Baltimore, 85 M 1, 277 P 414 (1929), and Harris v. Root, 28 M 159, 72 P 429 (1903), appellant's knowledge of the terms of a settlement agreement and his acquiescence in the agreement for a period of nearly 2 years constitutes a ratification of the settlement. Webb v. First Nat'l Bank of Hinsdale, 219 M 160, 711 P2d 1352, 42 St. Rep. 1919 (1985).

Elements of Ratification: Ratification exists upon the concurrence of three elements: (1) acceptance by the principal of the benefit of the agent's act; (2) full knowledge of the facts; and (3) circumstances or an affirmative election indicating an intention to adopt the unauthorized arrangement. Safeco Ins. Co. v. Lovely Agency, 200 M 447, 652 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 1861 (1982), followed in Daniels v. Dean, 253 M 465, 833 P2d 1078, 49 St. Rep. 535 (1992), and in Erler v. Creative Fin. & Inv., LLC, 2009 MT 36, 349 M 207, 203 P3d 744 (2009).

Estopped From Applying Section: Where defendant's wife signed an agreement with the plaintiff concerning property covered by the Statute of Frauds and the defendant did not ratify the agreement in writing, he cannot rely on this section to avoid the agreement for equitable reasons in that the plaintiff made an irretrievable change in position or the defendant secured an unconscionable advantage or inflicted an unjust and unconscionable loss upon the plaintiff. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982).

Alleged Agent Taking No Action: When an alleged agent takes no action, there is nothing that can be ratified. Schulz v. Peake, 178 M 261, 583 P2d 425 (1978).

Ratification by Payment: Defendant's voluntary contributions to union trust funds ratified the corporate general manager's act of signing the collective bargaining compliance agreements requiring contribution. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Elmo Road Corp., 175 M 533, 575 P2d 77 (1978).

Sale of State Property by Employee — No Ratification: Ratification does not result from affirmance by alleged principal of a transaction had by an alleged agent with a third person unless the supposed agent purported to act on account of the reputed principal. Thus where an employee of the State Park Commission neither sold nor purported to sell a state road roller in the name of the state as principal or by himself as agent, the state did not ratify the sale, because the Attorney General had sued the employee and demanded that he account for the disposal of the roller as well as the proceeds and profits from the sale. State ex rel. Olsen v. Sundling, 128 M 596, 281 P2d 499 (1955).

Acceptance by Principal of Results of Act:

A conviction may be had of the owner of a tavern for the sale of beer to a minor although such sale was made by a barmaid who was not on the defendant's payroll but acted at times as bartender when the manager was gone. The owner by her silence and by accepting and retaining the benefits of the sales by the barmaid whom she knew was acting as a substitute bartender for her manager did ratify said acts. St. v. Erlandson, 126 M 316, 249 P2d 794 (1952).

Where a principal accepts a contract made by his agent he takes it as the agent made it and subject to all equities and defenses arising out of the conditions thereof, and the means and instrumentalities by which the agent procured it, even though the agent acted without authority or in excess of his powers. Bell v. Grimstad, 82 M 185, 266 P 394 (1928).

A principal who with knowledge accepts the benefits of a transaction conducted by an assumed agent is deemed to have ratified it in toto. Bell v. Grimstad, 82 M 185, 266 P 394 (1928).

Before a principal may be said to have ratified an unauthorized act of his agent, it must be shown that the former accepted the results of the act of the latter with the intent to ratify and with full knowledge of all the material circumstances. Outlook Farmers' Elev. Co. v. Am. Sur. Co., 70 M 8, 233 P 905 (1924). See also Renland v. First Nat'l Bank, 90 M 424, 4 P2d 488 (1931).

To constitute ratification of an agent's act there must be an acceptance by the principal of the results of the act with an intent to ratify and with full knowledge of all the material circumstances. Pew v. McLeish, 62 M 437, 205 P 235 (1922).

Disavowal of Agent's Acts: A principal who neglects promptly to disavow an act of his agent, by which the latter has transcended his authority, makes the act his own, since principal is bound to disavow act at the first moment that the act comes to his knowledge. McLaren Gold Mines v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1950).

Gambling Transactions: In an action by an elevator company against its former manager and his surety to recover for funds misappropriated by him in grain gambling transactions, refusal of the court to submit the question of ratification of the manager's acts by the company was proper, where it appeared that the gambling transactions were carried on under fictitious names with a commission house in Minneapolis which made reports to the manager so drawn as to conceal their real character, and that the directors of the company did not know of their existence until after the termination of the employment of the manager, who had informed them that he was not gambling. Outlook Farmers' Elev. Co. v. Am. Sur. Co., 70 M 8, 233 P 905 (1924).

Purchase of Lumber: In an action to recover for lumber furnished in the erection of a building the purchase of which was claimed by plaintiff to have been ratified by the defendant owner, by his subsequent promise to pay for it if it had actually been delivered, evidence tending to show ratification was held insufficient to meet the requirements of the rule above. Pew v. McLeish, 62 M 437, 205 P 235 (1922).

Knowledge of Facts: Ratification generally depends upon the intent of the principal. It is an essential element of ratification that the principal has full knowledge of all material facts unless he intentionally and deliberately ratifies knowing that he is not aware of all the facts. Carlson v. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co., 40 M 434, 107 P 419 (1909). See also Arnold v. Genzberger, 96 M 358, 31 P2d 296 (1934) (mechanics' lien, now construction lien); Alward v. Broadway Gold Min. Co., 94 M 45, 20 P2d 647 (1933) (stockholders); First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597 (1918) (bank cashier).

No Wrongful Discharge Claim When Employment for Specific Term: Plaintiff physician signed a 1-year employment contract with defendant medical center that provided that the employment terms could be extended or renewed by mutual agreement in writing. Although the initial contract expired, plaintiff continued to work by oral agreement for 2 more years. The parties then signed an addendum to the initial contract that set an employment expiration date 6 months later. Plaintiff received a letter 5 days before the expiration date, terminating the employment on the expiration date. Plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge suit, alleging that the termination was unlawful. Defendant moved for summary judgment on grounds that because the addendum provided a specific term of employment, plaintiff had no wrongful discharge claim. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A claim for relief that is predicated on discharge from employment is barred if the employment is for a specific term under a written contract and that term has expired. In this case, the addendum constituted a ratification of the original agreement that constituted a contract for a specific term of employment, and by executing the addendum, the parties ratified the original agreement calling for employment for a specific term. The fact that the termination date was stated in the contract recitals did not void the date, because the recitals were consideration for the agreement and the parties intended that the recitals be part of the agreement. Plaintiff's argument that because he did not read the addendum he should not be held to its terms was also without merit because one who executes a contract is presumed to know its contents. Stowers v. Community Medical Center, Inc., 2007 MT 309, 340 M 116, 172 P3d 1252 (2007).

Acceptance of Benefits:

Where a landowner claimed the benefit of an attorney's action in clearing title by paying part of a tax claim as part of a settlement, the landowner ratified other stipulations entered into by the attorney as a part of the same settlement and embodied in the same decree. Purcell v. Gibbs, 133 M 481, 326 P2d 679 (1958).

Where a manufacturer accepts a contract containing ambiguous terms executed by his agent for the sale of goods and acts upon it by shipping them to the dealer, he is not in position to urge that the agent was without authority to make it; ratification by him of a part of an indivisible contract is ratification of the whole. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Songer, 91 M 127, 7 P2d 238 (1931).

Where at the solicitation of the agent of a bank defendant executed a promissory note, transferred personal property as collateral, and then entered into a written agreement with the agent that the maker should not be held liable on the note, the three contracts constituted but a single transaction, by accepting the benefits flowing from a portion of which the bank under this section ratified the whole thereof and was not in a position to assert that in agreeing to relieve defendant from liability on the note the agent exceeded his authority. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Chappell, 71 M 553, 230 P 1084 (1924).

Unauthorized Act: If a principal ratifies a part of his agent's unauthorized act he ratifies it in its entirety. Arnold v. Genzberger, 96 M 358, 31 P2d 296 (1934).

28-10-213. Ratification not to prejudice third persons.

Case Notes

Ratification of Void Deeds — Authority of Agent to Convey Property — Title Properly Quieted: Defendant third party raised three challenges to a District Court's conclusion that deeds voided by forgery during transfer were nevertheless ratified by subsequent actions of the parties and contended that the court erred by quieting title to plaintiff. The first argument dealt with the fact that one of the parties never received proper written authority to convey the property to plaintiff, so ratification was voided under the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court noted that an agreement to sell an interest in property must be in writing and that an agent's authority to sell property must also be in writing. However, the agency relationship may arise either by precedent authorization or by subsequent ratification. In this case, the warranty deeds constituted subsequent written authority for conveyance of the property, so the statute of frauds was not violated for want of written authorization. The second argument was that the criteria for ratification were not satisfied, but after examining the chain of title, the Supreme Court found that the personal actions of the principal ratified the deed and that the criteria for ratification were satisfied. The third argument was that defendant was prejudiced as a third party by ratification, but that argument did not prevail because defendant could not have been prejudiced since defendant's interest in the property was invalid both prior to and after ratification and defendant could have become aware of the void deeds by conducting a title check and avoiding the problem. Lastly, title was properly quieted in plaintiff because defendants with prior interests in the property stipulated that they no longer claimed any right, title, or interest in the property. Plaintiff's deed was superior because it was the first to be recorded and had been ratified, and plaintiff was therefore entitled to have quiet title to the property. The District Court was affirmed. Erler v. Creative Fin. & Inv., LLC, 2009 MT 36, 349 M 207, 203 P3d 744 (2009). See also U.S. v. Heinszen, 206 US 370 (1907), Audit Serv., Inc. v. Francis Tindall Constr., 183 M 474, 600 P2d 811 (1979), Safeco Ins. Co. v. Lovely Agency, 200 M 447, 652 P2d 1160 (1982), and Moore v. Adolph, 242 M 221, 789 P2d 1239 (1990).

Unenforceable Timber Sale by Agent Without Written Authority: Gebert Logging contracted in writing with Palin to remove timber from certain land. This was a contract under 30-2-107 of the U.C.C. for goods to be severed from realty. The contract price was over $500, so under 30-2-201 of the U.C.C., the contract had to be in writing. Under 28-10-203 relating to agency, authority to enter into a contract that the law requires to be written can only be given by an instrument that is itself written. Since Palin did not own the land and did not have written authority from his wife, the owner, to execute the contract as her agent, the contract was unenforceable because it was not signed by or with the written authority of the owner of the land. Gebert Logging was thus entitled to receive back its land damage bond, and Palin was not entitled to damages for alleged unrepaired injury to the land. The court denied Palin's claims that part performance took the contract out of the Statute of Frauds and that the contract should not be invalidated because he had altered his position to his detriment. The court also held that his wife could not retroactively ratify his acts without the consent of Gebert Logging, which was not given. Gebert Logging, Inc. v. Palin, 220 M 405, 716 P2d 200, 43 St. Rep. 481 (1986).

Contract Between Promoters: A contract between promoters under the terms of which one of them agreed to sell, at par less a certain commission, expenses, etc., shares of stock to be issued by a corporation after its organization did not ipso facto by its incorporation become the contract of the company since, to bind it, formal action by its board of directors looking to its assumption or adoption was necessary, and a corporation cannot be bound by contracts made in its behalf before it comes into existence. Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 M 469, 197 P 1005, 17 ALR 441 (1921).

Deposit of County Funds Without Security: A county, not having authority to empower its Treasurer to make a general deposit of its funds without requiring security as provided by statute, cannot ratify the Treasurer's wrongful act in doing so. Yellowstone County v. First Trust & Sav. Bank, 46 M 439, 128 P 596 (1912).

Unauthorized Act: By the terms of this section it is essential, in order that the ratification of an unauthorized act of an agent be valid, that the principal have full knowledge of all material facts relative to the transaction at the time of the ratification. Broker-Buyer's Duty to Disclose: Plaintiff employed defendant to sell his ranch. Defendant produced some willing buyers who were rejected by the plaintiff. Defendant then found a purchaser willing to buy the machinery and cattle but not the land. Defendant contacted several neighbors, each of whom were willing to buy a portion of the ranch. Defendant did not disclose this to plaintiff. Defendant then made an offer in conjunction with the buyer of the machinery and cattle in anticipation of selling the ranch, in parcels, to the neighbors. Defendant did not disclose that he was one of the offerors. The court held that the defendant had a duty of full disclosure until he was legally bound to buy the property, the day on which the offer was accepted. It was improper to grant defendant summary judgment in this situation. First Trust Co. of Mont. v. McKenna, 188 M 534, 614 P2d 1027, 37 St. Rep. 1026 (1980).

Authority of Agent

Part Case Notes

How Authority Shown: The acts or declarations of an agent testified to by third persons are not admissible against his principal to prove the authority of the agent or the scope or extent thereof, unless they were done or made in the presence of the principal or were within his knowledge, or authorized or ratified by him, or there is other evidence of such authority. The direct testimony of an agent on the witness stand is however admissible to prove his authority where his powers and duties have not been reduced to writing. Phelps v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 105 M 195, 71 P2d 887 (1937), followed in Estate of Pruyn v. Axmen Propane, Inc., 2009 MT 448, 354 M 208, 223 P3d 845 (2009).

Agent's Testimony on Authority: The testimony of one who had general supervision of mine guards during a strike prior to their being sworn in as a posse comitatus to suppress a riot, as to what orders he gave the men under him, what his purpose was in giving them, in what capacity the men under him acted and the nature of their duties, was properly admitted over the objection that the questions called for conclusions by the witness, since an agent is a competent witness on the question of his authority as such. McCarthy v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., 70 M 309, 225 P 391 (1924).

Obligations of Escrow Holder — Strict Adherence to Agreement: A bank acted as escrow agent in an agreement for the purchase of property. The escrow agreement provided that upon default, the seller was "entitled to the immediate return from the escrow agent of the contract for deed, warranty deeds and abstracts" in order to facilitate foreclosure. The agreement further held the escrow agent "liable only to account for the money received by it and for the delivery of the instruments and documents escrowed". The only obligation of the bank was to adhere strictly to the instructions in the agreement. The bank was not obligated to ascertain whether: (1) the demand for return of the documents was technically correct; (2) the notice of default to the buyer was legally sufficient; (3) performance of the contract was impossible; or (4) the contract and default notice were void for vagueness. Turbiville v. Hansen, 233 M 487, 761 P2d 389, 45 St. Rep. 1665 (1988).

No Authority to Contract — Contract Not to Be Ratified or Enforced: Defendants entered into an installment contract to buy land from plaintiffs. The contract was entered by directors of the corporation acting without authority who were defrauding the corporation at the time. When the rightful stockholders came into control, they brought an action to nullify the contract and were awarded summary judgment. Defendant contends that by its actions, plaintiff ratified the contract. A contract entered into without the power to contract cannot be ratified or enforced, and the incapacity to contract cannot be removed by estoppel. Larry C. Iverson, Inc. v. Bouma, 195 M 351, 639 P2d 47, 38 St. Rep. 1911 (1981).

Ostensible Authority: Retailer was entitled to rely on the ostensible authority of wholesaler to grant credit for return of steel grain bins, where wholesaler was the apparent agent of manufacturer, and representatives of the manufacturer had been present when wholesaler had agreed on the return of the bins, and manufacturer had previously given credit for return of other bins. Butler Mfg. Co. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975).

Failure to Make Authority Known: Authority of bank to apply funds from check endorsed in blank by debtor and delivered to bank by his wife was not measurable in terms of authority that debtor conferred upon his wife without regard to whether that authority or its limitations were made known to bank. Baker Nat'l Bank v. Lestar, 153 M 45, 453 P2d 774 (1969).

Conduct of Business: Employee of used car dealer who had been left on the sales lot with authority to show, demonstrate, quote prices, and make trade-in deals was clothed with sufficient power to conduct the business in the absence of his employer and was agent of the employer in dealing with the public and promoting sale of used cars on the sales lot of his employer. White v. Sorenson, 141 M 318, 377 P2d 364 (1963).

Waiver of Notice of Proof of Loss: Where the certificate of authority of a local fire insurance agent did not show that the agent was empowered to waive notice and proof of loss, and there was no proof of ostensible authority in him so to do, the agent was without authority to waive the conditions. Careve v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 67 M 236, 215 P 235 (1923).

Incur Obligations: It is not essential to the existence of the relationship of principal and agent that the agent be clothed with authority to incur obligations in the name of the principal. St. v. Tuffs, 54 M 20, 165 P 1107 (1917).

Claims Examiner Not Authorized to Make Final Workers' Compensation Settlement for State Fund: Claimant was injured at work in 1973. Her employer was enrolled under Workers' Compensation Plan No. 3. State fund accepted liability and paid some compensation to claimant. For 1 ½ years state fund negotiated with claimant to reach a final settlement of claimant's disability benefits. Claimant was represented by counsel, and the negotiations were conducted through a claims examiner with state fund who was supervised by the state fund bureau chief. In March 1981, the parties reached a tentative settlement. Claimant and her lawyer signed a petition for full and final compromise settlement. When the petition was presented to the state fund bureau chief, he rejected it as being excessive and beyond the liability of the state as an insurer. Claimant brought the matter to the Workers' Compensation Court where she claimed that she had entered into a binding final agreement with state fund. The Supreme Court affirmed the Workers' Compensation Court ruling that no binding contract was created because the state fund bureau chief had not consented to the terms and the claims examiner had neither actual nor ostensible authority to bind the state fund to a settlement contract. Christenson v. Billings Livestock Comm'n Co., 201 M 207, 653 P2d 492, 39 St. Rep. 2060 (1982).

28-10-403. Ostensible authority defined.

Case Notes

Ostensible Authority Not Provable by Alleged Agent's Statements to Third Party Can Be Proved by Direct Evidence of Alleged Agent as to Relationship With Purported Principal: Hall argued that he did not have to pay for a road constructed by a third party at the direction of Hill because Hill was not his agent and that Hill could not attempt to prove ostensible agency by testifying as to his statements to the third party, which may have been construed by the third party as establishing that Hill was acting as Hall's agent in ordering the road work. The Supreme Court held that although Hill could not establish ostensible agency by testifying as to his statements to the third party, he could establish agency by demonstrating the existence of the agency based on the conduct of the parties, notwithstanding a denial by the alleged principal. Youderian Constr., Inc. v. Hall, 285 M 1, 945 P2d 909, 54 St. Rep. 1012 (1997).

Reasonable Basis for Third Person's Belief That Agency Relationship Existed With Respect to Road Construction — No Basis to Believe Agency Relationship Existed With Respect to Other Construction: Hall argued that he did not have to pay for a road constructed by Youderian at Hill's direction because Hill was not his agent. The Supreme Court ruled that Youderian had acted reasonably in assuming that Hill was Hall's agent based upon prior dealings among the three parties. Hall also argued that another party, Klind, was the general contractor as to the construction of a cabin on the property and that Youderian's only recourse for other construction costs was against the general contractor. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that Klind was the general contractor with respect to the cabin's construction and that because Youderian had not filed a construction lien, his only recourse for reimbursement was against Klind. Youderian Constr., Inc. v. Hall, 285 M 1, 945 P2d 909, 54 St. Rep. 1012 (1997).

Establishment of Implied Agency by Principal's Omissions or Commissions: Ostensible agency may be established by principal's omissions as well as commissions, but failure to disclaim authority asserted by an agent usually concerns attempts of an agent to extend existing authority by his representations to a third party. NW. Polymeric, Inc. v. Farmers St. Bank, 236 M 175, 768 P2d 873, 46 St. Rep. 275 (1989).

Reliance Solely on Alleged Agent's Statements: A manufacturing company received a government contract to supply combat helmets based in part upon a letter supplied to the Department of Defense by Farmers State Bank stating that Farmers Bank, with the participation of First National Bank of Missoula, would provide financing. Neither bank funded the project, and the company brought suit for tort and contract damages. The Supreme Court affirmed a summary judgment in First National Bank's favor, ruling that Farmers Bank could not be construed to be First National's agent solely on the basis of statements made by Farmers Bank in its letter to the Department of Defense. NW. Polymeric, Inc. v. Farmers St. Bank, 236 M 175, 768 P2d 873 46 St. Rep. 275 (1989), followed in Estate of Pruyn v. Axmen Propane, Inc., 2009 MT 448, 354 M 208, 223 P3d 845 (2009).

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. Jacobs, as secured party, repossessed the inventory and sold it to Snick Sports. Dirkson, who worked for K&M and then Snick, told Powers that Jacobs would guarantee Snick's payment of goods sold to Snick by Powers. There was disagreement as to whether Dirkson worked for Jacobs. For 2 years Powers mailed merchandise, statements, and invoices to Jacobs, who forwarded them to Snick, who paid the bills. When some bills went unpaid, Powers sued Jacobs when he failed to pay the bills on request. The mailings to Jacobs put him on reasonable notice that something was wrong. His failure to investigate and take action was want of ordinary care that caused or allowed Powers to believe an authorized agency existed between Jacobs and Dirkson. Thus, there was an ostensible agency and ostensible authority. For the same reason, a valid guaranty existed and Jacobs was estopped from defending against it on the basis of the Statute of Frauds. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Claims Examiner Not Authorized to Make Final Workers' Compensation Settlement for State Fund: Claimant was injured at work in 1973. Her employer was enrolled under Workers' Compensation Plan No. 3. State fund accepted liability and paid some compensation to claimant. For 1 ½ years state fund negotiated with claimant to reach a final settlement of claimant's disability benefits. Christenson v. Billings Livestock Comm'n Co., 201 M 207, 653 P2d 492, 39 St. Rep. 2060 (1982).

Waiver of Time Limit by Superintendent: Because the board allowed plaintiff to believe that the superintendent had the authority to waive the statutory time limit of 20-4-204 for a hearing request, plaintiff was entitled to a hearing before the board concerning the termination of his contract, even though his request came after expiration of the time limit. Yanzick v. Bd. of Trustees, 177 M 459, 582 P2d 338 (1978).

Authority of General Manager to Contract: In an action to recover employer's contributions to union trust funds under collective bargaining compliance agreements, the court erred in finding that defendant's general manager had no authority to enter into such agreements, when the record showed that the general manager had implied an ostensible authority which was not affected by limitations contained in the regulations and bylaws of the defendant. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Elmo Road Corp., 175 M 533, 575 P2d 77 (1978).

Course of Dealing Establishing an Ostensible Agency: Where principal's conduct led third party to believe he was dealing with an agent and third party returned merchandise to agent under such belief, principal cannot hold third party liable for cost of returned merchandise as principal led third party to believe agent had apparent authority to accept return of merchandise. Butler Mfg. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975).

Service Upon Corporation — Proper Agent: The doctrine of ostensible agency appears to have no application when it becomes involved with the question whether service of process has been legally made upon a "managing or general agent". Further, service upon a former employee of a company was not service upon the company itself and default judgment was vacated and set aside. Kraus v. Treasure Belt Min. Co., 146 M 432, 408 P2d 151 (1965).

Permissive Use of Vehicle by Employee: The mere permissive use by a truck driver of his employer's truck for personal purposes did not make the owner of the truck liable for the driver's negligence under the doctrine of ostensible authority. Searle v. Great N. Ry., 189 F. Supp. 423 (D.C. Mont. 1960).

Acts and Statements Establishing Agency:

Ostensible authority of an agent to do an act may be created by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which reasonably interpreted causes a third person to believe that the principal consents to the doing of the act on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him. Coover v. Davis, 112 M 605, 121 P2d 985 (1941).

Evidence that a lien claimant who performed work on a defendant's building dealt with a brother of the attorney in fact of the owner, which brother was looking after the building at the request of the attorney in fact or of the owner and collected rents and endorsed rent checks received, was sufficient to sustain trial court's finding of agency, since the brother with whom the contract was made was at least the ostensible agent of the owner. Doney v. Elison, 103 M 591, 64 P2d 348 (1937).

Where a person is shown to have been the agent of another in a particular business and continues to act within the apparent scope of his prior authority it will be presumed that his authority still continues and his acts will bind his former principal even though the agent's authority has been revoked, if the persons dealing with him had no notice of the revocation and relied upon the continued existence of his agency. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Sibley, 72 M 338, 233 P 613 (1925).

To constitute one an ostensible agent, the party sought to be held as principal must by reason of some act or want of ordinary care on his part have led the other party to believe he was his agent even though not actually employed by him. Hartt v. Jahn, 59 M 173, 196 P 153 (1921).

Ostensible Versus Implied Agency: Where an ostensible agency is sought to be proved by other like prior transactions, knowledge of them by plaintiff is necessary, but in the case of an implied agency such knowledge is immaterial. Phelps v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 105 M 195, 71 P2d 887 (1937).

Estoppel: Under the doctrine of ostensible authority, where a principal makes it possible by his conduct for his agent to inflict injury upon a third person who dealt with him in good faith under his apparent authority, he is bound by the acts of the agent and estopped from denying the authority of the latter to act. Lindblom v. Employers' Liab. Assurance Corp., 88 M 488, 295 P 1007 (1930).

Knowledge of Extent of Authority: The president of a corporation is chargeable with knowledge of the extent of the authority of its secretary and therefore may not rely upon ostensible authority in the latter to enter into a contract with him (the president) for the performance of an act in behalf of the corporation which he knew the secretary had no power to make. Stanton v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 81 M 44, 261 P 620 (1927).

Question of Fact: The apparent authority of an agent to act as the representative of his principal must be gathered from all facts and circumstances in evidence and is ordinarily a question of fact. Campbell v. Oriental Trading Co., 58 M 520, 193 P 1112 (1920).

Acquiescence in Conduct: The directors of a bank allowed the cashier to conduct the affairs of the bank. This pattern gave the cashier the ostensible authority to renew a promissory note, at least as regards an innocent third party, even though the bank was defrauded by the act. First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597 (1918).

Authority to Contract: Authority to make a contract is inferred from authority to conduct a transaction if the making of such contract is incidental to the transaction or is reasonably necessary to accomplish it. Hence, where in an action to recover the amount of a premium of fire insurance, covering a store owned by defendants, the manager thereof, the father of one of the defendants, had arranged for the insurance with plaintiff for a given year, defendants paying the premium, the jury was justified in finding that he was their authorized agent in arranging for the insurance for the next year. Coover v. Davis, 112 M 605, 121 P2d 985 (1941).

Extent of Authority: An agent has authority "to do everything necessary and proper and usual, in the ordinary course of business, for effecting the purpose of his agency". Commercial Credit Co. v. Blair, 84 M 314, 275 P 748 (1929).

Implied Power to Pledge Credit: Where it appears that the agent of a telegraph company had full power to manage its business and make all contracts and arrangements to carry on its business, that the principal knew that the monthly receipts of the business were much less than the expenses, and that it was necessary for the agent to maintain a bank account in its name, the agent has the implied authority to borrow for the company an amount of money not disproportionate to the volume of business transacted. Helena Nat'l Bank v. Rocky Mtn. Tel. Co., 20 M 379, 51 P 829 (1898).

28-10-406. Interpretation of authority given partly in general and partly in specific terms.

Case Notes

Interpretation of Agency Agreement: Where the words used to create a principal and agent relationship are ambiguous in themselves, they are to be taken most strictly against the principal, and the agent in his dealings with a third person may bind the principal in accordance with usage or by any construction of the ambiguous words that is reasonable. The grant of powers is not to be frittered away by very nice and metaphysical distinctions when the general tenor of the instruments is in favor of what was done under the power and when the principal has reaped the benefit of it. McLaren Gold Mines v. Morton, 124 M 382, 224 P2d 975 (1950).

When Authority Implied: An agent with general authority to manage his principal's business has no implied authority to bind his principal by a promissory note. Such authority must be expressly conferred, or be necessarily implied from the exigencies and the general course of the particular employment, or the act must be ratified by the principal. Helena Nat'l Bank v. Rocky Mtn. Tel. Co., 20 M 379, 51 P 829 (1898).

Self-Dealing During Agency Relationship — Proof of Undue Influence and Constructive Fraud — Shift of Burden of Proof — Agent Prohibited From Acting as Trustee Would Have Been Prohibited: Alice, a good friend of Maggie, lived near her and undertook to manage Maggie's financial affairs when Maggie's health began failing. As Maggie became more afflicted with dementia, Alice moved in with Maggie to care for her and began writing all of Maggie's checks for her. Alice also began selling Maggie's securities, depositing the proceeds into her own account, and writing checks to herself for purposes that sometimes involved Maggie. During this time, Maggie's physician found her mental capacity to be steadily diminishing and urged Alice to take Maggie to a nursing home. After Alice had depleted Maggie's financial resources from approximately $200,000 to approximately $20,000, Maggie's sister, Ida, discovered that Maggie had been moved to a nursing home and discovered that her money had been spent by Alice. Maggie died shortly thereafter, and the personal representative brought an action against Alice for an accounting of Maggie's funds. The Supreme Court held that all of the criteria for proof of undue influence established in Christensen v. Britton, 240 M 393, 784 P2d 908 (1989), had been satisfied and that the District Court therefore erred in not shifting the burden of proof to Alice to prove that the financial transactions involving Alice were fair and voluntary. Likewise, the Supreme Court also held, because of the agency or fiduciary relationship between Alice and Maggie, that the District Court erred in placing the burden on the estate to prove constructive fraud. The Supreme Court held that under statutory provisions of agency law, Alice was not authorized to do any act that a trustee would be prohibited by Title 72, ch. 34, from doing and found that such a prohibition still existed under subsection (3) of this section, even though 72-20-208 had been repealed. The Supreme Court therefore remanded the case to the District Court for a new trial. Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Fiduciary Duty of Union Officers: It was proper to instruct the jury on the duty of fiduciary responsibility owed by union officers by comparing it to a trust relationship; stating that, as fiduciaries, the officers were required to act prudently; and allowing the jury to consider the duties, powers, and obligations in the union constitution and bylaws. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986).

Authority of Real Estate Broker: A real estate broker does not enjoy general authority but is only authorized to do what is specifically assigned in his contract of employment. Martin v. Vincent, 181 M 247, 593 P2d 45 (1979), following Diehl & Assoc., Inc. v. Houtchens, 173 M 372, 567 P2d 930 (1977), and followed in WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Fiduciary Duty of Union Officers: It was proper to instruct the jury on the duty of fiduciary responsibility owed by union officers by comparing it to a trust relationship; stating that, as fiduciaries, the officers were required to act prudently; and allowing the jury to consider the duties, powers, and obligations in the union constitution and bylaws. Sufficient Evidence Supporting Jury Verdict Against Union Officials for Misappropriation of Funds: A union sued former officers and business managers, alleging, among other things, misappropriation and conversion of union funds and constructive fraud. The union prevailed, and money damages were awarded to the union. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the evidence supported the award of money damages even though no one had testified at trial as to the specific amount of money defendants allegedly owed to the union. The jury heard evidence on mismanagement and self-dealing with regard to union property and on the financial losses of the union during defendant Bosh's administration. Testimony of the union indicated that defendants had not kept adequate financial records. The evidence may have contained contradictions, but it was substantial and adequate. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986).

Criminal Liability — Intentional Breach of Fiduciary Duty: Defendant entered a lease agreement with Town Pump, Incorporated to operate a gas station. Defendant was required to make daily deposits to Town Pump's bank account as payment for gasoline sold. A gasoline audit revealed defendant had failed to deposit $6,377 of proceeds due Town Pump. Defendant contended that a debtor-creditor relationship existed and that he only had a contractual duty to repay the debt, and that a breach of this civil obligation could not be the basis for criminal liability. The evidence showed Town Pump entrusted defendant with the gasoline it supplied with the understanding that its share of sale proceeds would be deposited to its account. The jury was presented with the factual question of when title to the gasoline passed. The jury concluded title did not pass upon delivery. Through the course of dealing in the months preceding the audit, defendant demonstrated his understanding of the entrustment and his responsibility. The deviation from this recognized fiduciary duty when he falsified accounting reports to the company clearly indicated an intent to purposely deprive Town Pump of its proceeds. The deliberate attempt to conceal retention of the proceeds is inconsistent with an ordinary debtor-creditor relationship. There was nothing in the record to show the parties' intent to create a debtor-creditor relationship. Defendant could not avoid criminal liability for taking money entrusted to him by calling it a loan. St. v. Frederick, 208 M 112, 676 P2d 213, 41 St. Rep. 207 (1984).

Acting in Dual Capacity: The general rule that knowledge of the agent is imputable to his principal has no application where the agent is acting in a dual capacity, as where he, though formally acting as such, is in reality acting in his own or another's interest and adversely to his principal. Potential Access Rights Merged With Deeds and Extinguished — Applicability of Contract Law Doctrine of Merger: Prior to Gehring's consent to sell 360 acres to APS Corporation (APS) in 1970, they entered an agreement that included a provision on access rights, whereby Gehring purported to grant future purchasers access to other land owned by Gehring for certain recreational purposes. After being told by the Gehring Ranch Corporation that they would not be allowed access to Gehring's land for recreation, the successors in interest to APS sought to enforce the agreement, alleging that they had been improperly excluded from the land and that the agreement created an easement over Gehring's land. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Gehring Ranch Corporation, noting that the agreement did not identify Gehring's other lands upon which an easement was purportedly created. The court also held that any agreement prior to execution of the deeds was merged with the deeds and that because the deeds transferring title did not provide for access, any access rights promised in the agreement were lost. The decision was appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The clause in the agreement was part of a larger agreement to transfer property in the future, and Gehring did not intend to create an easement, but at most intended to provide for potential access privileges if certain conditions, such as creation of a property owners' association and adoption of rules governing the use of the recreational privileges, were met. The Supreme Court cited Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714 (1998), in applying the contract law doctrine of merger, holding that the deeds contained all the rights of the parties and that because no access privileges were mentioned in the deeds, any potential access rights referred to in the agreement merged with the deeds and were lost. Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001).

Contract Provisions Merged Into Deed — Covenants Not Intended to Be Collateral Extinguished by Unrestricted Deed: A contract for the sale of property can contain a valid covenant running with the land, but generally, all provisions in a sale contract are merged into the warranty deed, founding the purchaser's rights in the deed covenants rather than in the executed contract, unless the parties intend for an agreement in a contract for sale to be collateral. Covenants relating to title, quantity, and possession of land are generally not collateral and thus merge into the deed. In the present case, the parties intended for the contract for deed and attendant restrictions to merge into the warranty deed, so the general rule of merger applied. The District Court did not err in refusing to enforce the covenants contained in the contract for deed. Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714, 55 St. Rep. 461 (1998), followed in Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001), and Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Broker-Buyer's Duty to Disclose: Plaintiff employed defendant to sell his ranch. Defendant produced some willing buyers who were rejected by the plaintiff. Defendant then found a purchaser willing to buy the machinery and cattle but not the land. Defendant contacted several neighbors, each of whom were willing to buy a portion of the ranch. Defendant did not disclose this to plaintiff. Defendant then made an offer in conjunction with the buyer of the machinery and cattle in anticipation of selling the ranch, in parcels, to the neighbors. Defendant did not disclose that he was one of the offerors. The court held that the defendant had a duty of full disclosure until he was legally bound to buy the property, the day on which the offer was accepted. It was improper to grant defendant summary judgment in this situation. First Trust Co. of Mont. v. McKenna, 188 M 534, 614 P2d 1027, 37 St. Rep. 1026 (1980).

Power of Attorney — Interests of Principal: An agent, under a general power of attorney, authorized to sell, convey, and mortgage the grantor's property may execute a trust deed conveying the grantor's individual property as security for the payment of a debt due from a firm of which he is partner so long as he acts in the interests of the principal. Signing of Insurance Policy:

Where the president of a bank acting as agent for a fire insurance company had determined a particular risk when a policy was first issued to the insured, he had the right to delegate to the cashier of the bank, who had for a considerable period of time handled much of the detail work in connection with issuing policies, the right to countersign a renewal policy. Altermatt v. Rocky Mtn. Fire Ins. Co., 85 M 419, 279 P 243 (1929).

Employment of Medical Assistance: Where an agent was authorized by a master to employ medical assistance for an injured servant, such agent had no authority to delegate to a physician employed authority to employ an assistant. Responsibility for Subagent's Actions: The ministerial work of a corporation may be delegated by the directors (agents of the corporation) to subordinate agents, and often must be. The details of a corporation's business necessitate this. If the directors act in good faith and with reasonable care and diligence in appointing and supervising such inferior agents, they are not personally responsible for damages occasioned by the agent's negligence, or even crimes. But a director cannot wholly escape his duty of supervision or transfer his authority to represent his principal, at least without the principal's consent. Cameron v. Part 6
Rights and Liabilities of Principal

Part Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence to Support Jury Verdict That Principal Breached Fiduciary Duty to Its Agent: An insured brought an action against Deonier, an insurance agent, and Paul Revere Life Insurance Company (Revere) to recover benefits and damages after the insured's claim was denied on grounds of a preexisting condition, despite the incontestability clause in the policy. The agent cross-claimed against the company for indemnity and breach of fiduciary duty, contending that there was a significant amount of evidence that Revere planned to assert the Forman defense in Montana (see Mass. Cas. Ins. Co. v. Forman, 516 F2d 425 (5th Cir. 1975), in which an insurer asserted a legal defense to the incontestability clause based on its definition of sickness as excluding disabilities that manifested themselves prior to the date of issue of the policy) and that Revere's failure to inform Deonier of its intention to invoke the defense was a clear breach of Revere's duty to inform its agents of a risk of pecuniary loss from potential lawsuits. Revere asserted that pursuant to Doettl v. Colonial Life & Accident Ins. Co., 505 F. Supp. 127 (D.C. Mont. 1981), in which a Montana federal District Court endorsed the Forman defense, it had no reason to believe that its policy interpretation might be in violation of Montana law and therefore did not breach its duty to inform its agents of risk of pecuniary loss. In the first Deonier case, Deonier & Associates v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 2000 MT 238, 301 M 347, 9 P3d 622 (2000), the Supreme Court reversed the lower court's summary judgment in favor of Revere that held that there had not been a breach of fiduciary duty and remanded the case back to the lower court for a jury trial on the issue of liability and damages. The jury found for Deonier and awarded her $150,000 in compensatory damages and $1 million in punitive damages, which the trial court reduced to $375,000. The trial court denied Revere's motion for judgment as a matter of law that it had not breached its fiduciary duty. The Supreme Court affirmed on the basis that Deonier had presented evidence that Revere knew it would assert the Forman defense and that such an action might lead to pecuniary damages for its agents, and therefore there existed a legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find that a breach of fiduciary duty had occurred. Deonier & Associates v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 2004 MT 297, 323 M 387, 101 P3d 742 (2004).

Indemnity of Insurance Agent for Defending Actions Performed on Insurer's Behalf in Solicitation of Application for Insurance: An insured brought a negligent misrepresentation action against Deonier, an insurance agent, and Paul Revere Life Insurance Company (Revere) to recover benefits and damages after the insured's claim was denied on grounds of a preexisting condition, despite the incontestability clause in the policy. Deonier cross-claimed against the company for indemnity, and the District Court required Revere to indemnify for damages that Deonier suffered as a result of the lawsuit. Revere appealed on grounds that Deonier was acting as an agent for the insured when recommending a disability policy, rather than as an agent for Revere, asserting that the fees that Deonier incurred were for defending the insured's claim that Deonier was actively negligent, defeating an indemnity claim. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because Revere admitted in its pleadings that there was no basis in law or fact for the negligent misrepresentation claim against Deonier, Revere implicitly conceded that Deonier's liability to the insured arose solely from the agency relationship between Deonier and Revere, a situation in which indemnity was required. Deonier & Associates v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 2000 MT 238, 301 M 347, 9 P3d 622, 57 St. Rep. 989 (2000). See also Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115 (1986), and Restatement (Second) of Agency 439 (1958).

Receipt of Asking Price and Licensing — Only Requirements for Commission: Defendants decided to sell their ranch and were contacted by plaintiff, a real estate salesperson. Defendants listed the ranch on a nonexclusive basis for $1.6 million and agreed to pay a 5% commission on the sale. Plaintiff presented offers from Semenza, which were rejected. Later, Semenza offered the asking price, and a contract to sell and purchase was executed, reciting that Semenza had paid $50,000 to plaintiff as earnest money. Semenza failed to obtain financing by the closing date, and it was determined he had never paid the earnest money to plaintiff. A new agreement to sell was executed, referencing the obtaining of long-term financing, at a meeting at which defendants were again represented by counsel. The transaction was closed, and defendants refused to pay plaintiff his commission, contending he was not a licensed broker as claimed at the time they entered the agreement and that he had actually represented the buyer. On appeal from a summary judgment, the Supreme Court found that under 37-51-401 a person need only be a licensed salesperson to receive a commission and that plaintiff was a licensed broker at the time the transaction closed. The defendants received their asking price through plaintiff's efforts, even though Semenza had to bring in a partner. There was no evidence defendants were damaged by the claimed conflict of interest. They ratified the entire transaction and were represented by competent counsel throughout. Deimler v. Ostler, 200 M 350, 651 P2d 41, 39 St. Rep. 1797 (1982).

Question of Material Fact Regarding Law Firm's Handling of Real Estate Contract — Summary Judgment Improperly Granted: Plaintiff sued its law firm for work performed in writing a contract for a real estate transaction. Plaintiff's expert opined that the firm violated the standard of care when it: (1) had a nonattorney with no contract drafting experience draft the initial agreement and insert an inaccurate legal description of the property obtained from plaintiff's own engineering firm; (2) used the phrase "more or less" to cure defects in the property description when the legal description was clearly deficient; (3) failed to include a provision that required the seller to sign future applications for a final plat; and (4) failed to execute proper escrow documents to prevent the seller from having veto power over any proposed development of the property. The law firm presented its own expert to refute the allegations. The District Court analyzed the allegations of negligence, applying the legal malpractice standards in Lorash v. Epstein, 236 M 21, 767 P2d 1335 (1989), and, finding no issues of material fact, granted the law firm's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed, finding that summary judgment was improper. The conflicting expert testimony itself raised a material issue of fact regarding the standard of care that required resolution by a trier of fact. Further, material questions remained concerning whether the law firm's independent failure to recognize a problem with the legal description contributed as a cause to plaintiff's damages, whether the firm followed the requisite standard of care in drafting the escrow agreement, and whether the purported terms of the escrow agreement satisfied the requisite standard of care. Babcock Place Ltd. Partnership v. Berg, Lilly, Andriolo, & Tollefsen, P.C., 2003 MT 111, 315 M 364, 69 P3d 1145 (2003).

Contract for Deed — Seller's Right to Cancel After Accepting Late Payments to Escrow Agent: Buyers under contract for deed made three late payments to the escrow agent. The escrow agent's acceptance of the three checks was not acceptance by the seller under the theory that the escrow agent was the seller's agent and acceptance by the agent was acceptance by the principal, nor did seller's acceptance of the payments from the escrow agent ratify the agent's acceptance. Failure to promptly return the payments did not waive seller's right to cancel the contract. The contract gave buyers 90 days from notice of default to pay the balance due under the contract, and they could do so in more than one installment. Seller decided the three payments might be installments in an attempt to pay the balance due and decided to hold the checks until it became apparent that the buyers were either going to pay off the balance due or were attempting to induce seller to waive her right to cancel the contract. Seller returned the checks when she realized the latter was the motive. In addition, seller sent a second cancellation notice, making it clear what her intent was. Boles v. Ler, 222 M 28, 719 P2d 793, 43 St. Rep. 1035 (1986).

Special Agent's Authority: One dealing with a special agent without acquainting himself with the strict extent of the agent's authority and governing himself accordingly, acts at his peril; he is not justified in relying upon any appearance of authority except that which is directly deductible from the nature of the authority actually conferred. Phelps v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 105 M 195, 71 P2d 887 (1937).

Attorney and Client: The rule that a principal is presumed to have notice of that of which the agent has notice and ought in good faith and the exercise of ordinary care to communicate to his principal, as applied to client (principal) and attorney (agent) does not pertain to facts acquired prior to the employment of the attorney or in the transaction of business for another client. Hansen v. Johnson, 90 M 597, 4 P2d 1088 (1931), explained in Cent. Bank & Trust Co. v. Lee C. Nelson, Inc., 221 F. Supp. 721 (D.C. Mont. 1963), which was followed, as to knowledge of the attorney imputed to the client, in Kaeding v. W.R. Grace & Co., 1998 MT 160, 289 M 343, 961 P2d 1256, 55 St. Rep. 640 (1998).

Sale of Land: Where the agency of one who was instrumental in making a sale of land was admitted by the seller (plaintiff), who made no contention that it had ever been terminated, the evidence on the contrary showing that such agent continued making sales of land for his principal in the same vicinity, the presumption obtains that the agency was still in being at a time thereafter when defendant notified the agent to so construct a ditch that water could be brought upon the land as agreed in the contract, and written notice to the agent was notice to the principal. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923).

Demonstration of Car: Where an automobile dealer's chauffeur was demonstrating a car for his employer and permitted the prospective buyer's daughter to drive the car and the girl lost control of the car, and the chauffeur then took hold of the wheel and steered the car upon the sidewalk striking a pedestrian, the chauffeur was acting within the scope of his employment and the employer was liable for the injuries suffered by the pedestrian. Hoffman v. Roehl, 61 M 290, 203 P 349, 20 ALR 189 (1921).

Liability of Principal for Goods Purchased: Where the evidence showed that among other things, it was the duty of the agent for a company engaged in furnishing crews for railroad track maintenance work to arrange for the needs of the crews, the principal was liable for goods purchased by him for that purpose. Campbell v. Oriental Trading Co., 58 M 520, 193 P 1112 (1920).

When Principal Bound: A principal is bound only by the authorized acts of his agent, and prior authority or subsequent ratification must be shown in order to render the principal answerable "ex contractu" for the conduct of his agent. Spelman v. Gold Coin Min. & Mill. Co., 26 M 76, 66 P 597 (1901).

Case Notes

Respondeat Superior Applicable to City Council Member Who Severely Criticized City Employee — Criticism Within Scope of Employment for Respondeat Superior but Not for Application of Legislative Immunity: Shoemaker, a member of the Thompson Falls City Council, severely criticized Denke, the city clerk and finance officer, in two letters to the editor and in a City Council meeting for her job performance that Shoemaker alleged caused the city to hire a CPA. Denke charged that Shoemaker's criticism was unlawful retaliatory conduct for her previous filing of a sexual harassment complaint against the Mayor. Following Kenyon v. Stillwater County, 254 M 142, 835 P2d 742 (1992), the Supreme Court held that Shoemaker was a city employee. The Supreme Court held that Shoemaker was acting as a member of the City Council when he signed the letters and that the city had admitted in an administrative hearing that Shoemaker was within the scope of his employment. The court held that: (1) Shoemaker didn't have to be Denke's supervisor for purposes of applying respondeat superior; (2) Shoemaker's unlawful retaliatory conduct was not within the official discharge of Shoemaker's duties for the purposes of legislative immunity under 27-1-804, but the conduct was within the scope of Shoemaker's employment for purposes of respondeat superior; and (3) the statement of the city in the Human Rights Commission administrative hearing that Shoemaker was acting as a member of the City Council constituted a judicial admission, was an "acknowledgment" under 2-9-305, and was binding upon the city for the purposes of its liability for retaliation. Denke v. Shoemaker, 2008 MT 418, 347 M 322, 198 P3d 284 (2008).

Attorney Agent Acting Within Scope of Employment Responsible to Principal and Not Third Party for Actions: Attorney Cresap was employed by Sorenson to prepare auction instructions for the sale of Sorenson's real property. The bidding instructions prepared by Cresap stated that Sorenson could reject all bids below $270,000 but did not disclose that that amount was the minimum acceptable price for the property. Crane Creek Ranch (Crane Creek) bid $248,000 on the property, was outbid by the Goss brothers, and was told that it could not raise its bid because it failed to meet the minimum bid of $270,000. After failing to purchase the property, Crane Creek sued Cresap and Sorenson for specific performance, fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and deceit, and after the District Court held for Cresap, the claims against Sorenson were stipulated to be dismissed with prejudice. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly granted summary judgment for Cresap on all counts of the complaint. The Supreme Court held that Cresap was known to Crane Creek as acting as Sorenson's attorney and, in that capacity and in accordance with Smith v. Fladstol, 248 M 18, 807 P2d 1361 (1991), and Rhode v. Adams, 1998 MT 73, 288 M 278, 957 P2d 1124 (1998), Cresap's duty of care ran to his principal, Sorenson, and not to any unrelated third party, such as Crane Creek. Any negligence on the part of Cresap is imputed to his principal, and any legal action against Cresap for actions taken by him within the scope of his agency employment must instead be brought against Cresap's principal, Sorenson. However, as the Supreme Court observed, the cause of action against Sorenson had been dismissed with prejudice under the stipulation with Crane Creek. Crane Creek Ranch, Inc. v. Cresap, 2004 MT 351, 324 M 366, 103 P3d 535 (2004). See also Redies v. Attorneys Liability Protection Soc'y, 2007 MT 9, 335 M 233, 150 P3d 930 (2007).

Joint and Several Liability — Corporations Owned by Same Person Acting as Agent: Lloyd Kimble was president of Hobble Diamond Cattle Company (Hobble) and Kimble Properties, Inc. (Kimble Properties), making him an agent of both companies. Hobble sold land to the buyers, and Kimble Properties sold them an irrigation system. The irrigation system was deficient, and part of the land lay in an old river channel. The buyers sued Kimble, Hobble, and Kimble Properties. The District Court assessed damages against Kimble and Hobble. On appeal, Kimble argued that Hobble was responsible for fraud, but he personally was not. The Supreme Court held that at the time that Kimble sold the irrigation equipment, which was subsequently damaged by erosion of the land, he was acting as an agent of Kimble Properties, not Hobble, so the District Court erred in assessing damages against Hobble rather than Kimble Properties. However, a principal is liable for wrongs committed by an agent while acting within the scope of employment, and a director or officer is individually liable for false representations, so Kimble was personally liable regardless of which of his companies was also liable. H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Respondeat Superior Applicable Only to Agent Acting Within Scope of Duty: The District Court correctly held that defendant employer was not vicariously liable for the negligent activity of an employee who was involved in personal, rather than business, activity at the time that the negligence occurred. The principle of respondeat superior applies only to an employee or agent who is acting within the scope of the duties owed to the employer or principal. Gentry v. Douglas Hereford Ranch, Inc., 1998 MT 182, 290 M 126, 962 P2d 1205, 55 St. Rep. 737 (1998). See also Hoffman v. Roehl, 61 M 290, 203 P 349 (1921), and Kornec v. Mike Horse Min. & Mill Co., 120 M 1, 180 P2d 252 (1947).

Employer Held Vicariously Liable for Damages Through Criminal Acts of Employee: The Blacks, who owned and managed a business selling carpet, sued a competitor, Carpet Barn, for damages, alleging that Carpet Barn was liable for damages arising from acts of vandalism committed by Huggins, a Carpet Barn employee. Carpet Barn argued that there was no evidence that the criminal conduct of Huggins was in furtherance of the employer, Carpet Barn. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and pointed out that Huggins met Susan Black through business, Huggins discussed the Blacks with the owner of Carpet Barn, some of the acts of vandalism occurred during Carpet Barn's business hours, and Huggins understood that his acts could harm the Blacks and their business. For these reasons, the Supreme Court affirmed the holding of the District Court. Rocky Mtn. Enterprises, Inc. v. Pierce Flooring, 286 M 282, 951 P2d 1326, 54 St. Rep. 1410 (1997).

Assault on Third Person:

Roberts was injured by an explosion caused by a passing truck and sued several mining employers, relying upon respondeat superior. The Supreme Court held that workers' compensation cases were inapplicable. Citing Kornec v. Mike Horse Min. Co., 120 M 1, 180 P2d 252 (1947), the Supreme Court also held that because the employer did not authorize or derive benefit from the assault, respondeat superior did not apply. The Supreme Court also noted that the defendants had no duty to provide security on the road where the assault happened. Roberts v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 273 M 266, 903 P2d 782, 52 St. Rep. 967 (1995).

When a servant in carrying out his assigned duties makes an assault on a third person as a result of a quarrel which arose as a consequence of his performance of the task imposed and at the time and place of performance of the duties he was employed to perform, then the master is liable. Kornec v. Mike Horse Min. & Mill. Co., 120 M 1, 180 P2d 252 (1947), followed in Roberts v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 273 M 266, 903 P2d 782, 52 St. Rep. 967 (1995).

Where controversy between plaintiff and defendant mining company was of long standing concerning right of latter to maintain dam and plaintiff had threatened workers at dam on a previous occasion, the company might reasonably have comprehended that servant sent to repair dam might become involved in altercation with plaintiff and servant assaulted plaintiff at the dam, whether servant in so doing was acting within scope of employment was for jury. Kornec v. Mike Horse Min. & Mill. Co., 120 M 1, 180 P2d 252 (1947), followed in Roberts v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 273 M 266, 903 P2d 782, 52 St. Rep. 967 (1995).

Act Within Scope of Employment and Authority — Summary Judgment Improper: Cloutier arranged to have a pickup truck owned by State Medical Oxygen & Supply, a company of which he was an officer and director, used to haul mattresses and employees of Cay Enterprises, a company of which he was also an officer and director. A Cay Enterprises employee who was injured in the move sought damages from State Medical Oxygen & Supply, alleging negligence in supplying the vehicle. The District Court dismissed the claim by summary judgment, improperly applying Restatement (Second) of Torts 390 (1965), which deals with supplying a chattel to a person incompetent to use it safely. The more proper application was Restatement (Second) of Torts 308 (1965), which deals with the use of a thing or engaging in an activity under the control of an actor if the actor knows that the use or activity might create an unreasonable risk of harm to others. Cloutier was operating within the course and scope of his employment with both companies, thus his knowledge as agent was imputed to the company as principal. That knowledge was a question of fact to be determined by a trier of fact. Summary judgment was improper given that issues of negligence remained to be decided. Williams v. St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc., 265 M 111, 874 P2d 1225, 51 St. Rep. 458 (1994).

Limited Application of Nondelegable Duty Exception to Respondeat Superior Doctrine: Application of the nondelegable duty exception to the respondeat superior doctrine is limited to instances of safety in which the subject matter is inherently dangerous. The Supreme Court declined to modify the presently accepted version of the doctrine by adopting the exception, set out in section 214 of Restatement (Second) of Agency, that a master or other principal who is under a duty to provide protection for or to have care used to protect others or their property and who confides the performance or duty to a servant or other person is subject to liability to others for harm caused to them by the failure of the agent to perform the duty. Noting that there are several reasons for and against extending the liability of an employer when an intentional tort is committed only because or by virtue of the employment situation, the court opted to leave adoption of such a major doctrinal change to the Legislature. Maguire v. St., 254 M 178, 835 P2d 755, 49 St. Rep. 688 (1992), followed in Estate of Strever v. Cline, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666, 53 St. Rep. 576 (1996).

State's Duty to Provide Institutional Care: The state has a duty under 53-20-142, not inconsistent with the theories of negligent hiring, negligent supervision, and agency, to provide proper care for persons admitted to a residential facility, and it was error for the District Court to refuse to instruct on those theories in a case in which that statutory duty was called into question. Maguire v. St., 254 M 178, 835 P2d 755, 49 St. Rep. 688 (1992).

Punitive Damages Not Contingent Upon Showing of Malice on Principal's Part: Defendant, Lake, argued that proving that he had ratified his agent's acts made him liable only for compensatory damages unless the plaintiff proved malice on his part. The Supreme Court held that this section does not limit liability to wrongs other than intentional and malicious acts resulting in an award of punitive damages. Daniels v. Dean, 253 M 465, 833 P2d 1078, 49 St. Rep. 535 (1992).

Neither School nor Adviser Owed Duty to Student Injured in Extracurricular Activity During Summer: The plaintiff, a high school student, sustained injuries while attending a privately sponsored summer cheerleading clinic. She sued her high school district as the party responsible for its students during extracurricular activities and as principal of its agent, the cheerleading adviser, for negligent supervision. In the plaintiff's appeal of summary judgment in favor of the school district, the Supreme Court held that a school does not owe a duty to a student for an extracurricular activity during the summer months when the activity is governed by independent parties. The cheerleading adviser's participation was too limited to owe a duty as a supervisor, and she was not acting as the school's agent. Rollins v. Blair, 235 M 343, 767 P2d 328, 46 St. Rep. 39 (1989).

Negligent Hiring and Negligent Entrustment: Insurer's agent participated in a Dillon rodeo, went to a barbecue at his Dillon home, and then went drinking in Dillon bars. While driving home in a vehicle he leased from a service company that was a wholly owned subsidiary of and had a common board of directors with insurer, he struck plaintiff, who sued insurer for negligent hiring and service company for negligent entrustment of the vehicle to agent. Insurer and service company sought summary judgment. That one to whom a vehicle is entrusted is licensed does not alone negate a finding of negligent entrustment. Since the record showed agent had at least once before been in an accident while intoxicated and it was alleged service company knew or should have known the agent had a propensity to drive while intoxicated, there was a material question of fact whether service company breached the duty not to entrust a vehicle to an incompetent driver, and summary judgment as to the service company was denied. Insurer's motion for summary judgment on the negligent hiring issue was denied, the court stating that it could find no Montana case on the negligent hiring doctrine. The questions of whether insurer should have foreseen that it was hiring a dangerous driver, that it was negligent in hiring the agent, and that the negligence proximately caused plaintiff's injuries were considered to be questions of fact not properly disposed of on summary judgment. The court also indicated that whether agent was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident was not an issue. Vollmer v. Bramlette, 594 F. Supp. 243, 41 St. Rep. 1964 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Respondeat Superior — Accident Caused by Insurance Agent: Defendant insurance company's agent participated in a Dillon rodeo, went to a barbecue at his Dillon home, and in the evening consumed alcohol at several Dillon bars. On the way home from the bars, he struck plaintiff while driving an auto the agent leased from insurer's wholly owned service company, which had a common board of directors with insurer. Plaintiff sued defendants under respondeat superior. There was evidence agent sold insurance as a result of participating in group recreational and social activities. Summary judgment for insurer was refused because there was a fact question as to whether agent's activities during the night in question were within the course and scope of his work as an insurance agent. However, summary judgment was granted in favor of the service company as there was no evidence that agent was acting as the agent of the service company at the time of the accident. Vollmer v. Bramlette, 594 F. Supp. 243, 41 St. Rep. 1964 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Independent Investigation Clause Not to Preclude Justifiable Reliance on Representations: Defendants owned property in Flathead County. Water for the property came from a neighbor's well for which they paid him $8 per month. No written agreement existed concerning the water supply. Defendants listed the property for sale with Tri-City Real Estate. Inserted in the listing contract in the printed space following "water" were the words "community $8/mo." Plaintiffs were interested in the land and looked at it. They asked both defendants and the realtor about the water supply and were told it came from a community well. Plaintiffs wanted written verification of the interest in the water system. The realtor told them he would obtain a copy of the register of the well for them. Plaintiffs continued asking for the register but never received it. Plaintiffs signed a contract for deed to buy the property which had been prepared by the realtor's attorney. The contract contained an "independent investigation" clause, which stated that plaintiffs had investigated the property and entered the contract based upon that investigation and that there were no other agreements or representations concerning the property. The neighbor stopped supplying water, and plaintiffs were forced to dig their own well. They sought recovery from defendants. It was held that defendants were responsible for the negligence of their agents in the sale as related to the community water interest. The Supreme Court held that the "independent investigation" clause did not preclude a holding that the plaintiffs justifiably relied on the representations of the realtor. Parkhill v. Fuselier, 194 M 415, 632 P2d 1132, 38 St. Rep. 1424 (1981), followed in Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

Principal Responsible — Agent Involved in Business of Agency: A principal is responsible for the negligence of the agent if the negligence of the agent is involved in the transaction of the business of the agency. Stewart v. Casey, 182 M 185, 595 P2d 1176 (1979).

Demonstration Automobile Used by Salesman in Personal Business: Where an automobile salesman was given use of a demonstrator automobile and was engaged in personal business, the benefit to the dealership of exposure of the automobile to the public was insufficient to warrant holding the dealership responsible for the employee's negligent operation of the vehicle. State ex rel. City Motor Co. v. District Court, 166 M 52, 530 P2d 486 (1975).

Good Faith: The bank contended that because its agency status was special or limited in nature it bore no fiduciary responsibility to defendant. The court held that in all transactions concerning or affecting the subject matter of the agency relationship, it is the duty of the agent to act with utmost good faith and loyalty for the furtherance of the principal's interest. First Nat'l Bank v. Sant, 161 M 376, 506 P2d 835 (1973).

Drunken Driver: United States was not liable for damages occasioned by the negligent driving by an army driver where such driver, in disobedience of his orders, went out of his way to a tavern where he drank, and then while driving an army vehicle back to base became involved in an accident. The deviation from the master's business and orders was so great as to show that the driver was on his own mission. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. U.S., 116 F. Supp. 51 (D.C. Mont. 1953).

Malicious Acts of Servant: Under the general rule that a master is liable for the torts of his servants if committed within the scope of his employment, willful and malicious acts of the servant are imputable to the master. Kornec v. Mike Horse Min. & Mill. Co., 120 M 1, 180 P2d 252 (1947), followed in Roberts v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 273 M 266, 903 P2d 782, 52 St. Rep. 967 (1995).

When Acting in Scope of Employment Presumed: In an action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered in an automobile collision caused by the negligence of the driver of the car, employed by a motor company as a salesman of secondhand cars working on a commission basis, the rebuttable presumption is that, where the ownership of the car is established and that the driver was in the employ of the owner, the driver was at the time acting within the scope of his employment. Eliason v. Geil, 114 M 97, 132 P2d 158 (1942).

Doctrine of Respondeat Superior: Where, in an action for slander brought by a customer of a chain store who was charged by the manager thereof with passing a bad check, obtaining change, and ordering a sack of flour sent to an address where there was no house, the rule is that the wrongs for which liability attaches to the principal include not only acts of negligence, but malicious, wanton, and willful acts as well, and the agent's deviation from express instructions or even act in utter disobedience thereof does not generally relieve the principal if the acts were in furtherance of or incidental to the agent's employment. Keller v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 111 M 28, 108 P2d 605 (1940).

Customer Tripping Over Crate: In action against foreign corporation and its resident employee, who was joined as John Doe, was not served with process, and did not appear, for injuries sustained by customer who tripped over orange crate which had been allegedly placed in aisle of corporation's store by employee, the test for removal of cause to federal court on diversity of citizenship was whether employee had any real connection with controversy; a resident citizen properly joined is not merely a nominal party who can be ignored because not served or has not appeared; it was held that corporation was not entitled to have action removed on ground of diversity of citizenship. Jensen v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 24 F. Supp. 585 (D.C. Mont. 1938).

Responsibility of Principal for Agent's Wrongs: Under this section where an employer is sought to be held responsible under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the decisive question is whether the agent or employee was acting within the scope of his employment. If he was acting independently of his employer or while on a mission of his own, the employer may not be held accountable in damages. Meinecke v. Intermountain Transp. Co., 101 M 315, 55 P2d 680 (1936).

Demonstration of Car: Where an automobile dealer's chauffeur was demonstrating a car for his employer and permitted the prospective buyer's daughter to drive the car and the girl lost control of the car, and the chauffeur then took hold of the wheel and steered the car upon the sidewalk striking a pedestrian, the chauffeur was acting within the scope of his employment and the employer was liable for the injuries suffered by the pedestrian. Hoffman v. Roehl, 61 M 290, 203 P 349, 20 ALR 189 (1921).

Obligation to Refund Payment for Gas Field Option: Plaintiff corporation rescinded a gas field option upon which it had paid $50,000 to defendant. After defendant failed to refund money due, plaintiff filed suit and was granted summary judgment for $71,320.55. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, based upon the exhibits, affidavits, and briefs before the lower court, there was no evidence of a genuine issue of material fact. The escrow agreement and release based upon plaintiff's rescission were supported by adequate consideration since release from contract obligations and forbearance to sue are both adequate consideration. Ayers Oil and Gas, Inc., was a party to both the option and the release agreements as evidenced by Ayers' signature as president. Devon Oil & Gas Co., Inc. v. Parol Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Bid Prepared Proper in Interpreting Uncertain Contract Provisions: Bid estimates on a road building project contained vague and ambiguous project requirements, and testimony at trial regarding the height of the finished road was conflicting. Thus, the District Court, in interpreting provisions of the contract that appeared ambiguous or uncertain, properly considered parol evidence of the circumstances under which the bid was prepared. The court found more credible the contractor's testimony that there was not agreement that a subroad would be constructed of pit run gravel 6 inches above field grade, and that determination was affirmed on appeal. DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999).

Consulting Physician Diagnosis and Notice to Counsel Binding on Plaintiff — Late Claim Properly Dismissed: In 1992, after consulting with several medical doctors, Kaeding hired Baiz as his attorney to pursue a claim for damages from asbestosis against his employer, W.R. Grace & Co. (Grace). Baiz employed Whitehouse as a consulting physician, and Whitehouse, after reviewing several x-rays, sent Baiz a letter stating that the appearance of the x-rays was consistent with asbestosis. In 1996, Kaeding filed suit against Grace, alleging Grace caused his medical condition. After dismissal of the suit by the District Court for failure to commence the action within the statute of limitations, the Supreme Court, distinguishing Hando v. PPG Indus., Inc., 236 M 493, 771 P2d 956 (1989), in which a diagnosis confirming the plaintiff's suspicions as to her medical condition was not received for some time, held that Kaeding had at least a preliminary diagnosis of asbestosis as early as 1983, when Grace sent Kaeding the results of a breathing test. Although Kaeding argued that he was unaware of the contents of the letter sent to Baiz by Dr. Whitehouse, the Supreme Court concluded that because the employment of an attorney creates an agency relationship between the attorney and the attorney's client, Kaeding knew or should have known no later than the time of Dr. Whitehouse's letter to Baiz that he, Kaeding, had contracted asbestosis. Because suit was not brought within the time required by the statute of limitations after the letter from Dr. Whitehouse, the District Court had properly dismissed the claim. Kaeding v. W.R. Grace & Co., 1998 MT 160, 289 M 343, 961 P2d 1256, 55 St. Rep. 640 (1998), followed in Chriske v. State ex rel. Dept. of Corrections, 2010 MT 149, 357 Mont. 28, 235 P.3d 588.

A Cay Enterprises employee who was injured in the move sought damages from State Medical Oxygen & Supply, alleging negligence in supplying the vehicle. The District Court dismissed the claim by summary judgment, improperly applying Restatement (Second) of Torts 390 (1965), which deals with supplying a chattel to a person incompetent to use it safely. The more proper application was Restatement (Second) of Torts 308 (1965), which deals with the use of a thing or engaging in an activity under the control of an actor if the actor knows that the use or activity might create an unreasonable risk of harm to others. Cloutier was operating within the course and scope of his employment with both companies, thus his knowledge as agent was imputed to the company as principal. St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc., 265 M 111, 874 P2d 1225, 51 St. Rep. 458 (1994), followed, as to knowledge of the agent imputed to the principal, in Kaeding v. W.R. Grace & Co., 1998 MT 160, 289 M 343, 961 P2d 1256, 55 St. Rep. 640 (1998).

Imputed Notice of False Representations — No Reliance in Claiming Fraud: The District Court held that the first mortgagee, Aetna Life Insurance Company (Aetna), had defrauded the second mortgagee, Shepherds, ruling that Shepherds did not have notice imputed to them through Ranch Mart, a realty agency employed by Shepherds to sell a ranch, and that even if Shepherds had such notice, it would not "serve as a shield for unfair dealing" by Aetna. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that Ranch Mart had notice of the size of the Aetna loan and resulting first mortgage before consummation of the sale, and therefore, under 28-10-604, Shepherds had notice imputed to them. Further, the court held that since the means were at hand for Shepherds to ascertain the truth of the false representations, they could not, as a matter of law, rely on those representations in claiming fraud. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. McElvain, 221 M 138, 717 P2d 1081, 43 St. Rep. 697 (1986).

Notice of On-Job Injury Through Employer's Agent, a Physician: Employer, a hospital, in a suit to recover workers' compensation benefits may be considered to have actual notice within the meaning of 39-71-603 when claimant, a nurse in the hospital, sought and was given treatment by a physician in the emergency room. The physician is an agent under 28-10-103, and the hospital may be considered to have notice under this section. The purpose of the notice requirement is to enable the employer to protect himself by prompt investigation of the claimed accident and prompt treatment of the injury involved with a view toward minimizing its effects by proper medical care. Where, as here, within 2 hours of the accident, the employer had notice and a diagnosis and its managing agent had prescribed treatment for the injury, the purpose of 39-71-603 is fulfilled. Harmon v. Deaconess Hosp., 191 M 285, 623 P2d 1372, 38 St. Rep 65 (1981).

Intent of Contracting Parties — Parol Evidence Admissible to Show Knowledge of Agent: In an action by the plaintiff contractor against the defendant motor carrier for breach of contract caused by the defendant's refusal to haul fabricated silo sections, the court did not err in finding that a memorandum of the agreement by the defendant's employee was sufficiently clear to form a valid contract. Parol evidence is admissible to apply the memorandum to the subject matter of the contract. The evidence showed that agents of the defendant knew the subject matter of the contract and that knowledge is imputed to the defendant and will be applied to the memorandum to determine the intent of the defendant as to the subject matter of the contract. Empire Steel Mfg. Co. v. Carlson, 191 M 189, 622 P2d 1016, 38 St. Rep. 101 (1981).

Notice or Knowledge of Attorney of Criminal Trial Date Not Conclusive as to Notice or Knowledge of Client in Criminal Prosecution: In the defendant's trial on a charge of bail-jumping, the jury was instructed that notice to an attorney of a trial date is notice to the client employing him and knowledge of an attorney is knowledge of his client. The Supreme Court found that this instruction had the effect of relieving the State of its burden to prove the mental state of the defendant. The case was remanded to the District Court. St. v. Blackbird, 187 M 270, 609 P2d 708 (1980), distinguished in St. v. Wereman, 273 M 245, 902 P2d 1009, 52 St. Rep. 958 (1995).

Insolvent Bank — Notice to Attorney: The Columbus State Bank became insolvent. Attorneys for plaintiff filed a claim with the Superintendent of Banks on some promissory notes. The Superintendent notified the attorneys that the claim would not receive preference. Challenge to the Superintendent's ruling was not brought within the statutory period. Plaintiff claimed it had not received notice. The Supreme Court said the general rule is that notice to an agent as to matters within the scope of his business is notice to the principal. The relation of attorney and client is one of agency. The attorneys were clearly agents acting on the matter of the claim, so that notice was sufficient. Caterpillar Tractor Co. v. Johnson, 99 M 269, 43 P2d 670 (1935).

Waiver of Condition: Where the agent of a fire insurance company knew before writing a policy that the property in question was mortgaged and that foreclosure proceedings were pending, and thereafter knew of its sale and that the insured was to remain in possession during the period of redemption, and upon inquiry by the latter assured him that the policy was all right without an endorsement relative to the sale, his knowledge was imputable to his principal and in an action on the policy to recover for loss under it the insurer must be held to have waived the condition relative to change of title without its consent. Baker v. Union Assurance Soc'y of London, Ltd., 81 M 281, 264 P 132 (1928).

Sale of Land: Where the agency of one who was instrumental in making a sale of land was admitted by the seller (plaintiff), who made no contention that it had ever been terminated, the evidence on the contrary showing that such agent continued making sales of land for his principal in the same vicinity, the presumption obtains that the agency was still in being at a time thereafter when defendant notified the agent to so construct a ditch that water could be brought upon the land as agreed in the contract, and written notice to the agent was notice to the principal. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923).

Assignment for Benefit of Creditors: Under this section, plaintiff corporation must be considered to have had notice of the facts known to its manager in entering into an agreement whereby its debtor was released from liabilities by his assignment for the benefit of creditors, and its voluntary acceptance of the benefits of the transactions was equivalent to a consent to it. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. v. Anderson, 66 M 64, 212 P 853 (1923).

Redemption of Property: One who joins through an agent, in the redemption of property sold at a judicial sale, is charged with all the knowledge that the agent possesses concerning the matter. Coombs v. Barker, 31 M 526, 79 P 1 (1905).

Binding Agreement: Where grain bins were returned to wholesale agency with the knowledge and apparent approval of the manufacturer, manufacturer could not later repudiate the agreement and hold retailer liable for the purchase price. Butler Mfg. Co. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975).

Notice of Repudiation: Reasonable promptness of the disavowal of ostensible agency was an open question of fact where representatives of the manufacturer were present when wholesale agent arranged with retailer for return of merchandise, but manufacturer did not repudiate agreement until retailer requested credit. Butler Mfg. Co. v. J & L Implement Co., 167 M 519, 540 P2d 962 (1975).

Service Upon Corporation: The doctrine of ostensible agency appears to have no application when it becomes involved with the question whether service of process has been legally made upon a "managing or general agent". Further service upon a former employee of a company was not service upon the company itself and default judgment was vacated and set aside. Kraus v. Treasure Belt Min. Description of Property — Filing of Lien as Notice to Third Parties: On September 27, 1977, plaintiff Mountain States Resources, Inc. (MSR) contracted with defendant to have him furnish and erect three steel buildings to be used in connection with the Gypsy-Highview Gathering System (GHGS) for natural gas. Monte Grand Exploration, Inc. (MGE) was an undisclosed principal of MSR. The buildings were completed, and at the request of MSR's supervisory agent, flashing was installed on two buildings, which flashing was not called for in the contract. On January 18, 1978, MSR paid the contract but refused to pay for the additional flashing. On March 8, 1978, defendant filed a lien against the proceeds of any gas MSR sold to Montana Power Company. MSR sued to set aside the lien and to recover for slander of title. Defendant joined MGE and sought to foreclose the lien. MSR claims that one of the leases listed as belonging to MSR actually belonged to MGE, and the lien therefore contained an improper description of the property and is invalid. MSR was the agent and project manager of the building project and is therefore liable to defendant. MGE was an undisclosed principal in the construction project and is therefore also liable. Regardless of which corporation held title at the time of the lien, filing the lien would give notice of the existence of the lien to interested third parties. As the successor in interest to MSR and MGE, GHGS had notice and was liable. The description was adequate to properly identify the property subject to the lien; consequently, the description and the lien are valid. Mtn. States Resources, Inc. v. Ehlert, 195 M 496, 636 P2d 868, 38 St. Rep. 2061 (1981).

Naming Undisclosed Principal in Original Lien: On September 27, 1977, plaintiff Mountain States Resources, Inc. (MSR) contracted with defendant to have him furnish and erect three steel buildings to be used in connection with the Gypsy-Highview Gathering System (GHGS) for natural gas. Monte Grand Exploration, Inc. (MGE) was an undisclosed principal of MSR. The buildings were completed, and at the request of MSR's supervisory agent, flashing was installed on two buildings, which flashing was not called for in the contract. On January 18, 1978, MSR paid the contract but refused to pay for the additional flashing. On March 8, 1978, defendant filed a lien against the proceeds of any gas MSR sold to Montana Power Company. MSR sued to set aside the lien and to recover for slander of title. Defendant joined MGE and sought to foreclose the lien. MGE contended the lien against it was invalid because it was not named in the original lien. MGE was not named in the lien as required by 71-3-1002, but the District Court found that there was an agent-undisclosed principal relationship between MSR and MGE. Defendant was unaware of this relationship until after he filed the lien. Consequently, defendant joined MGE in the suit when he filed his answer and counterclaim. The lien was valid. Mtn. States Resources, Inc. v. Ehlert, 195 M 496, 636 P2d 868, 38 St. Rep. 2061 (1981).

Oil and Gas Lien as Extending to Leaseholds of Undisclosed Principal: On September 27, 1977, plaintiff Mountain States Resources, Inc. (MSR) contracted with defendant to have him furnish and erect three steel buildings to be used in connection with the Gypsy-Highview Gathering System (GHGS) for natural gas. Monte Grand Exploration, Inc. (MGE) was an undisclosed principal of MSR. The buildings were completed, and at the request of MSR's supervisory agent, flashing was installed on two buildings, which flashing was not called for in the contract. On January 18, 1978, MSR paid the contract but refused to pay for the additional flashing. On March 8, 1978, defendant filed a lien against the proceeds of any gas MSR sold to Montana Power Company. MSR sued to set aside the lien and to recover for slander of title. Defendant joined MGE and sought to foreclose the lien. MSR contended the lien on the gathering system did not entitle him to a lien on the leaseholds served by the system. MSR claimed that MSR and MGE, which own the gas leases, are completely independent of GHGS, which owns the gathering system. Defendant contracted with MSR, and MSR served as agent and project manager for the building project. MGE was an undisclosed principal in the building project. GHGS was not an independent entity until after construction of the buildings started and did not obtain a lease for the land on which the buildings sit until after the lien was filed. Defendant contracted with MSR and MGE, and his lien extended to their leases and GHGS. Mtn. States Resources, Inc. v. Ehlert, 195 M 496, 636 P2d 868, 38 St. Rep. 2061 (1981).

Undisclosed Principal — Liability: DeMars entered a contract to sell land to Williams. Williams was acting as agent for defendant and assigned the contract to her. Williams' interest in the contract was attached for a debt. Plaintiff purchased Williams' interest in the land at a sheriff's sale. Plaintiff then brought an ejectment action, contending defendant was a principal for Williams in the land purchase. The Supreme Court quoted section 89 of Pomeroy on contracts, saying: "When the agreement is executed by the agent in his own name, he appearing to be the contracting party, the requisite as to party is complied with. The principal may maintain a suit and enforce the contract, and it is immaterial whether a principal is actually known during the transaction, or whether the other party supposes that he was dealing with the agent personally, entirely on his own behalf. Under the same circumstances, it is now the rule that a suit may be maintained, and the contract enforced against the principal, even though his name nowhere appears on the face of the writing, and even though he was undisclosed and unknown to the other party at the time of entering into the agreement, provided, of course, it was actually made on his behalf." Ejectment was improper, however, as plaintiff had no greater rights than DeMars and the contract was still being performed. Prosper v. Smith, 67 M 308, 215 P 649 (1923).

Mechanics' Lien (Now Construction Lien): Even assuming that a contractor making real estate improvements was acting as the agent of the property owner in purchasing material for the improvement, this section does not apply so as to require any notice from the materialman to the property owner, other than that required by the mechanics' lien (now construction lien) law, to perfect a materialmen's lien. Existence of Agency Not Disclosed — Agent Personally Liable: Rhines, an agent of Sound West, entered into an employment contract with Como but then breached the contract. In the absence of evidence of a disclosure that Rhines was acting as an agent of Sound West at the time the contract was entered into, the agent is personally liable. Como v. Motion to Dismiss a Complaint for Failure to State a Claim in the Face of a Specific Statute: Applying the rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief, a motion to dismiss a complaint for failure to state a claim was proper where third party plaintiff knew that third party defendant was an agent and that credit was not extended to him personally as 28-10-702 specifies credit must be given to the agent personally to hold him responsible to third persons as a principal. Sufficient Evidence to Sustain Claims Against Individual Defendants Acting as Corporate Agents: Plaintiffs presented claims for breach of contract, bad faith breach of contract, tortious interference with contract, abuse of process, and malicious prosecution against defendant corporation and against individual members of the corporation. The individual members moved for their dismissal from the case on grounds that as employees and officers of the corporation they could not be held personally liable for the acts of the corporation. The District Court denied dismissal, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Review of the record demonstrated that there was sufficient evidence to submit plaintiffs' claims of tortious interference with contract, abuse of process, and malicious prosecution against the individual members. From this evidence the jury could have concluded that the individual members' conduct was tortious and was directed at plaintiffs or that the evidence did not support that conclusion, but in either case the evidence was sufficient to survive the dismissal motion. The fact that the jury found the individual members not liable for tortious interference with contract or punitive damages showed that the jury did not simply lump the individual members in with the acts of the corporate defendant, but instead individually considered the individual members' actions in relation to each claim based on the evidence. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the jury's conclusions. Ammondson v. NW. Corp., 2009 MT 331, 353 M 28, 220 P3d 1 (2009).

Attorney Agent Acting Within Scope of Employment Responsible to Principal and Not Third Party for Actions: Attorney Cresap was employed by Sorenson to prepare auction instructions for the sale of Sorenson's real property. The bidding instructions prepared by Cresap stated that Sorenson could reject all bids below $270,000 but did not disclose that that amount was the minimum acceptable price for the property. Crane Creek Ranch (Crane Creek) bid $248,000 on the property, was outbid by the Goss brothers, and was told that it could not raise its bid because it failed to meet the minimum bid of $270,000. After failing to purchase the property, Crane

Creek sued Cresap and Sorenson for specific performance, fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and deceit, and after the District Court held for Cresap, the claims against Sorenson were stipulated to be dismissed with prejudice. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly granted summary judgment for Cresap on all counts of the complaint. The Supreme Court held that Cresap was known to Crane Creek as acting as Sorenson's attorney and, in that capacity and in accordance with Smith v. Fladstol, 248 M 18, 807 P2d 1361 (1991), and Rhode v. Adams, 1998 MT 73, 288 M 278, 957 P2d 1124 (1998), Cresap's duty of care ran to his principal, Sorenson, and not to any unrelated third party, such as Crane Creek. Any negligence on the part of Cresap is imputed to his principal, and any legal action against Cresap for actions taken by him within the scope of his agency employment must instead be brought against Cresap's principal, Sorenson. However, as the Supreme Court observed, the cause of action against Sorenson had been dismissed with prejudice under the stipulation with Crane Creek. Crane Creek Ranch, Inc. v. Cresap, 2004 MT 351, 324 M 366, 103 P3d 535 (2004). See also Redies v. Attorneys Liability Protection Soc'y, 2007 MT 9, 335 M 233, 150 P3d 930 (2007).

Joint and Several Liability — Corporations Owned by Same Person Acting as Agent: Lloyd Kimble was president of Hobble Diamond Cattle Company (Hobble) and Kimble Properties, Inc. (Kimble Properties), making him an agent of both companies. Hobble sold land to the buyers, and Kimble Properties sold them an irrigation system. The irrigation system was deficient, and part of the land lay in an old river channel. The buyers sued Kimble, Hobble, and Kimble Properties. The District Court assessed damages against Kimble and Hobble. On appeal, Kimble argued that Hobble was responsible for fraud, but he personally was not. The Supreme Court held that at the time that Kimble sold the irrigation equipment, which was subsequently damaged by erosion of the land, he was acting as an agent of Kimble Properties, not Hobble, so the District Court erred in assessing damages against Hobble rather than Kimble Properties. However, a principal is liable for wrongs committed by an agent while acting within the scope of employment, and a director or officer is individually liable for false representations, so Kimble was personally liable regardless of which of his companies was also liable. H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Ambiguity in Insurance Policy as to Submission of Claims Resolved in Favor of Insured: Golt worked as a civilian employee of the Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) until he was discharged from employment in 1994 for cause. Thirty days after termination, Golt died of carbon monoxide poisoning. As a benefit of employment, Golt was covered by an accident insurance policy issued by General American Life Insurance Company (General) and also by Aetna Life Insurance Company (Aetna) under a group life and accident and health insurance policy. AAFES transmitted the Aetna claim, but did not transmit the General claim. A subsequent request for benefits from General was denied because the claim was not submitted within 20 days after the covered loss occurred. Golt's wife asserted that by tendering the claim to AAFES within the 20-day period, she satisfied the notice requirements of the General policy, while General contended that the policy plainly informed both Mrs. Golt and her attorneys that notice of claim and proof of loss were to be sent to the National Accident Insurance Underwriters (NAIU) or one of General's agents and that AAFES was the policyholder, not a General agent. The Supreme Court held that the notice provision in the policy was ambiguous because it gave an invalid address for NAIU and did not list any acceptable General agents. However, the notice did allow claims to be submitted through the policyholder/employer. For purposes of this case, when accepting or processing claims, AAFES, with the express permission of General, was performing a function of the insurer and was properly considered an agent of the insurer. Mrs. Golt's claim was thus timely submitted. Golt v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 2000 MT 155, 300 M 142, 2 P3d 841, 57 St. Rep. 613 (2000).

Salesman Personally Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation: Plaintiffs purchased a subdivision parcel from defendant and subsequently contracted with defendant, a sales agent for a home center, to purchase a modular home to be placed on the parcel. Relying on defendant's advice and assurance that the property would be properly prepared, plaintiffs installed the home on concrete piers instead of a full foundation. Upon learning from engineering reports that extensive water damage to the home was caused by foundation instability, plaintiffs filed an action, alleging that the defendant had falsely misrepresented that the land had been properly prepared prior to installation of the home. Affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the defendant was personally liable for selling property as appropriate for a modular home and for unreasonably representing to plaintiffs that the home was suitable for the pier-type foundation. Williams v. DeVinney, 259 M 354, 856 P2d 546, 50 St. Rep. 831 (1993).

Duty of Insurance Broker With Respect to Insured or Insurer: The insureds asked First National Insurance, Inc., to cancel the policy that First National had obtained for them from Nautilus Insurance Company. First National informed Nautilus of the cancellation, but the policy was to remain in effect for 3 months because of Nautilus's practice of retaining a portion of the paid premium. During that time, the insureds suffered a loss and Nautilus paid the claim. Nautilus then sued First National, alleging that First National as Nautilus's agent had a duty to take additional steps on Nautilus's behalf. The Supreme Court held that there was no duty because the broker acted as agent with respect to an insured and an insurer on the basis of which party requested an action to be taken. In the present case, the insureds had requested the cancellation and the broker was therefore acting on their behalf. Nautilus Ins. Co. v. First Nat'l Ins., Inc., 254 M 296, 837 P2d 409, 49 St. Rep. 802 (1992).

Negligent Misrepresentation — Agent Jointly and Severally Liable: In case relating to the failure of commercial trout farm, trial court refused to hold agent liable with bank for breach of fiduciary duty and fraudulent misrepresentation. Upon appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that an agent cannot be shielded from personal liability upon a finding that the agent was personally negligent or his actions tortious in nature. An agent is jointly and severally liable with his principal to third parties for wrongful acts committed in the course of his agency. Crystal Springs Trout Co. v. First State Bank of Froid, 225 M 122, 732 P2d 819, 44 St. Rep. 90 (1987), followed in Sherner v. Nat'l Loss Control Serv. Corp., 2005 MT 284, 329 M 247, 124 P3d 150 (2005).

Dismissal of Claim Against Agent for Lack of Evidence: In an action for damages arising from sale of a defective modular home, a motion to dismiss corporate seller's president as a party defendant should have been granted where there was no evidence of negligence or other tortious action on his part. He was not present when the home was installed on the foundation, at which time the defects were apparently caused; he had not been made aware of any errors in the installation; he had a representative of the corporation make a service call each time the buyer made a complaint; and there was no evidence that he knew of any negligent construction or participated in the actual construction process. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Piercing Corporate Veil Doctrine — Refusal to Apply: The doctrine of piercing the corporate veil to avoid fraud or injustice was not applied in a suit for damages arising from defects in a modular home manufactured and installed by defendant where there was no evidence that the corporation was defectively formed or formed to avoid personal liability on the part of the officers. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Public Policy Against Personal Liability of Agent: As a matter of public policy, the officers and agents of a corporation must be shielded from personal liability for acts they take on behalf of the corporation in furtherance of corporate goals, policies, and business interests. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Liability of Seller for Negligent Misrepresentation by Real Estate Agent — Disclaimer in Contract for Deed: Where the buyers and seller of certain real estate executed a contract for deed containing an acknowledgment that the buyers had inspected the property, were familiar with it, and that no representations concerning the property had been made by anyone on behalf of the seller and the buyers later discovered that the real estate agent had shown them and the buyers had executed a contract for deed on a lot other than the one purportedly sold to the buyers, the acknowledgment of the buyers applied to the wrong lot and the seller was responsible for the misrepresentation of the real estate agent because under 28-10-602, a principal is responsible for the negligence of his agent. McCarty v. Lincoln Green, Inc., 190 M 306, 620 P2d 1221, 37 St. Rep. 2007 (1980).

Standard of Care of Real Estate Agent — Improper Identification of Real Property: Where the defendant real estate agent improperly identified certain real estate to prospective purchasers with the result that the buyers purchased property they had not intended to buy and suffered damages for which the seller became liable, it was not error for the court to find that the agent had breached his duty of care even though there was no evidence presented to the court on the standard of care of real estate agents in Montana. No standard of care could be countenanced by the real estate broker's profession, accepting as a reasonable standard of care the showing of the wrong property on behalf of a seller to a prospective purchaser. McCarty v. Lincoln Green, Inc., 190 M 306, 620 P2d 1221, 37 St. Rep. 2007 (1980).

Insurance Agency Not Responsible as Principal: A finance and insurance agency that sells disability insurance as an agent for an insurance company is not precluded from recovering money lent to a customer on the grounds that the insurance company denied coverage to the customer and the agency is a beneficiary because this section contains the only provisions where the agency may be held liable as the principal and none of these conditions were met. Budget Ins. & Fin. v. Leighty, 186 M 368, 607 P2d 1125 (1980).

Attorney: In action by sheriff to recover warehouse storage fees, attorney of judgment creditor was not liable as agent of his client since he was known to be only an agent and credit had not been extended to him personally. Hasbrouck v. Krsul, 168 M 270, 541 P2d 1197 (1975).

Personal Liability on Contract:

Where seller at auction sale required assurances from principal before it would accept the agent's drafts on principal in payment for cattle purchased, the seller could not hold the agent personally liable on the contract even though it permitted the agent to bid in at the auction without disclosing his principal. Yellowstone Livestock Comm'n v. Dupuis, 133 M 454, 325 P2d 691 (1958).

Where plaintiffs, in their suit to foreclose a mechanics' lien (now construction lien), proceeded upon the theory that one of the three defendants was the agent of the other two (owners of the property), and the agent was not shown to have done anything to make himself personally liable (this section) for the work done, entry of judgment against him was error. Arnold v. Genzberger, 96 M 358, 31 P2d 296 (1934).

An agent is not personally liable on a contract entered into by him on behalf of his principal if he disclosed the identity of the latter and made the engagement for him. This section embodies in principle the same rule. Farr v. Stein, 54 M 529, 172 P 135 (1918).

Trust Estate: The effect of 72-23-307 (now repealed) declaring in substance that a trustee is a general agent for the trust property to the same extent as the acts of an agent bind his principal, viewed in connection with this section, is either that the trust estate is to be considered an entity chargeable as a principal for the acts of the trustee, its agent, or that the legal incidents of the trustee's authorized acts, so far as the parties are concerned, are the same as those which would attach to an agent's authorized transactions for his principal. Tuttle v. Union Bank & Trust Co., 112 M 568, 119 P2d 884, 139 ALR 127 (1941).

Proof of Scope: Defendant was manager of an opera company, which was having a dispute with plaintiff. Hirsch, who acted as agent for defendant in some matters, offered to pay plaintiff's expenses to go to Butte to negotiate with defendant. At trial where plaintiff claimed the trip as an item of damages, it was held that there was no proof that Hirsch acted within the scope of his agency or that he attempted to bind anyone other than himself. Defendant was not bound by Hirsch's promise. Ming v. Pratt, 22 M 262, 56 P 279 (1899).

GUARANTY, INDEMNITY, AND SURETYSHIP

Part 1
Guaranty — General Provisions

28-11-101. Guaranty defined.

Case Notes

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. Jacobs, as secured party, repossessed the inventory and sold it to Snick Sports. Dirkson, who worked for K&M and then Snick, told Powers that Jacobs would guarantee Snick's payment of goods sold to Snick by Powers. There was disagreement as to whether Dirkson worked for Jacobs. For 2 years Powers mailed merchandise, statements, and invoices to Jacobs, who forwarded them to Snick, who paid the bills. When some bills went unpaid, Powers sued Jacobs when he failed to pay the bills on request. The mailings to Jacobs put him on reasonable notice that something was wrong. His failure to investigate and take action was want of ordinary care that caused or allowed Powers to believe an authorized agency existed between Jacobs and Dirkson. Thus, there was an ostensible agency and ostensible authority. For the same reason, a valid guaranty existed and Jacobs was estopped from defending against it on the basis of the Statute of Frauds. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Corporation Owners' Personal Guarantee of Corporation's Contract Obligation: Defendant corporation purchased plaintiff's business under a contract which provided that the inventory of the business would not be reduced in value below the amount still owed plaintiff under the contract. When plaintiff became worried about corporation's plan to carry out such a reduction, the owners of the corporation personally guaranteed payment of that part of the sale price still due plaintiff. There was consideration for the guarantee, in that plaintiff, in return for the guarantee, relinquished various legal rights of action which he would otherwise have had upon reduction of the value of the inventory. Therefore, the guarantee was not void for lack of consideration. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982), followed, with regard to sufficiency of mutual promises as valid consideration, in Kephart v. Portmann, 259 M 232, 855 P2d 120, 50 St. Rep. 771 (1993).

Guaranty for Repayment of Money Loaned: A guaranty for repayment of money loaned was not a suretyship within the meaning of 28-11-401. Stensvad v. Miners and Merchants Bank of Roundup, 183 M 160, 598 P2d 1083 (1979).

Letter of Credit: Letter of credit from bank to debtor stating "We are willing to guarantee these funds to whomever you purchase this engine from . . ." constituted a guaranty of the purchase price of the engine. Miller v. Walter, 165 M 221, 527 P2d 240 (1974).

Distinction Between "Special" and "General" Guaranty: A special guaranty is one addressed to a particular person who alone can take advantage of it and to whom only the guarantor can be held responsible; a general guaranty is for acceptance by the public generally. Austin v. New Brunswick Fire Ins. Co., 111 M 192, 108 P2d 1036 (1940).

Stockholder Liability Is in Nature a Guaranty:

The statutory liability imposed upon holders of bank stock by section 6036, R.C.M. 1921 (since repealed), for debts of a bank, is in the nature of a guaranty—not primary, but secondary—and, within the meaning of 27-2-211, providing that actions to recover on such liability must be brought within 3 years after the liability "was created", the liability was created, not when the statute imposing it was enacted, nor when the relation of debtor and creditor between the bank and plaintiff first arose, but when the bank became insolvent; therefore the complaint in such an action showing on its face that it was commenced within the 3-year period was sufficient as against a general demurrer. Mitchell v. Banking Corp. of Mont., 83 M 581, 273 P 1055 (1929).

The double liability to the creditors of an insolvent state bank imposed by section 6036, R.C.M. 1921 (since repealed), as amended by Ch. 9, L. 1923, upon a holder of stock in such bank, is in the nature of a guaranty, and therefore will not support an attachment as upon a contract for the direct payment of money in an action by the receiver to collect an assessment levied upon the stock of a delinquent stockholder. Muri v. Young, 75 M 213, 245 P 956 (1926).

Distinction Between Indemnity and Guaranty: When for the purpose of inducing the purchase of corporate stock the seller gave the buyer a promissory note payable in 3 years, the back of which bore the endorsement that when the stock had paid dividends to the amount of the purchase price, the note should be void, the agreement was one of indemnity and not of guaranty. Peterson v. Nelson, 77 M 539, 252 P 368 (1926).

Distinction Between Surety and Guarantor:

A contract of guaranty "is a promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person". But it is distinguishable from one of surety, in that the former is a separate contract whereby the promisor is bound independently of the person for whose benefit it is made, while the latter is a contract whereby the promisor is bound jointly with the principal on the same contract. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926); Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co. v. Raugstad, 65 M 297, 211 P 305 (1922).

Under a contract of guaranty the promisor is bound independently of the person for whose benefit it is made, his engagement being a collateral undertaking; hence there being neither privity of contract, mutuality, nor joint liability between the principal debtor and the guarantor, they cannot be joined as defendants; under that of suretyship the surety is bound as an original promisor and the creditor may bring his action jointly against him and the debtor. Butte Mach. Co. v. Carbonate Hill Mill. Co., 75 M 167, 242 P 956 (1926).

A bond in which the sureties unconditionally agreed to indemnify a County Treasurer for failure of a bank to pay over to him on demand any funds he might have on deposit therein was a contract of surety and not of guaranty. State ex rel. Barnett v. Reynolds, 68 M 572, 220 P 525 (1923).

A surety is bound with the principal as an original promisor on the same contract, while a guarantor makes his own separate contract; a surety makes his contract primarily for the principal, while a guarantor makes his contract mainly for his own benefit. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Morton, 24 M 58, 60 P 587 (1900).

Nature of Contract of Guaranty: Although the contract of guaranty is collateral to the contract of the principal debtor, the two are distinct and independent, there being, as to the contract of guaranty, no privity, mutuality, or joint liability between the principal debtor and his guarantor. Baroch v. Greater Mont. Oil Co., 70 M 93, 225 P 800 (1924).

Distinction Between Accommodation Maker and Guarantor: When defendant signed a renewal note taking the place of a note signed by her husband and another, at the request of the husband for the purpose of lending her name to him as comaker, she was an accommodation maker within the meaning of 30-3-415, and not a guarantor. Mulany v. Murray, 68 M 245, 216 P 1105 (1923).

Case Notes

Consideration for Renewal of Guaranty: Where defendants, after executing a contract of guaranty for the payment of merchandise under which goods were furnished but not paid for, upon its expiration entered into a contract of renewal thereof, agreeing to pay not only for future deliveries but reassuming liability for past indebtedness, the promise of the guarantee to furnish more goods was a good consideration for the contract, irrespective of the fact that no more goods were called for. W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Miller, 105 M 456, 73 P2d 552 (1937).

Sufficiency of Consideration:

Before plaintiff manufacturing company would enter into a renewal contract with a distributor of its goods, it required him to furnish a written contract of guaranty signed by responsible parties agreeing to pay the company on termination of the renewal contract the amount due it from the distributor at the time of the execution of the guaranty or what might become due thereafter; in consideration it promised to furnish the distributor with more goods. The guaranty was furnished, no further goods, however, being thereafter ordered. In an action to recover on the guaranty, extension of time of payment was sufficient consideration. W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Washburn, 80 M 308, 260 P 1039 (1927).

If a contract of guaranty is made for the benefit of the guarantor at the same time as the original obligation, no other consideration need exist. Lyon v. Featherman, 80 M 504, 261 P 268 (1927).

Forbearance to enforce a legal right is a sufficient consideration to support a contract. Doorly v. Goodman, 71 M 529, 230 P 779 (1924).

Simultaneous Delivery of Instruments: When a promissory note was not accepted until a guaranty was produced and the two instruments were delivered together, plaintiff in an action on the guaranty was not required to show independent consideration for it; a showing of consideration for the note was sufficient. Schauer v. Morgan, 67 M 455, 216 P 347 (1923).

Suretyship Distinguished: The codes preserve the general distinction between suretyship and guaranty, which is that a surety is bound with the principal as an original promisor on the same contract, while the guarantor makes his own separate contract. This section was enacted with regard to this distinction. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Morton, 24 M 58, 60 P 587 (1900).

28-11-104. Guaranty generally to be in writing — form.

Case Notes

Guaranty Imposed by Law Need Not Be in Writing: When a liability in the nature of a guaranty is imposed by law it does not fall within the provision of this section requiring a contract of guaranty to be in writing. Muri v. Young, 75 M 213, 245 P 956 (1926).

28-11-105. When guaranty considered original obligation and need not be in writing.

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Original Promise Within the Meaning of This Section:

When a merchant would not sell merchandise to a grower unless plaintiff bank promised to pay therefor, its promise to do so made it the principal debtor and constituted an "original obligation" within the meaning of this section, not required to be in writing. First Nat'l Bank v. Hergert, 94 M 197, 22 P2d 169 (1933).

When two directors of a corporation in need of financial aid orally agreed with each other that each would answer to the other for advances made by each to it, provided things could not be so arranged that both should be made whole by the corporation, neither became a principal debtor to the other. Bennighoff v. Robbins, 54 M 66, 166 P 687 (1917).

A promise to answer for the obligation of another is to be deemed the original obligation of the promisor when the creditor parts with value in terms, or under circumstances, such as put the promisor in the attitude of principal debtor, and the person he promises for in the attitude of surety. Such terms or circumstances do not appear when a person introduces strangers to a storekeeper and says, "If they don't pay, I will." Fortman v. Leggerini, 51 M 238, 152 P 33 (1915).

Oral Agreement by Husband to Pay Wife's Attorney to Bring About Reconciliation: An oral agreement between the husband and his wife's attorney to pay for the latter's services was an original undertaking within the meaning of this section, and not a guaranty, and therefore not void under the Statute of Frauds. Walker v. Hill, 90 M 111, 300 P 260 (1931).

Oral Obligation to Pay Antecedent Obligation of Another:

When a promise is made to pay the antecedent obligation of another upon the condition that the party receiving it will cancel the obligation, accepting the new promise in substitution therefor, it is an original undertaking or agreement and not a mere promise to answer for the debt of another within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds, and need not be in writing. Tannhauser v. Shea, 88 M 562, 295 P 268 (1930).

A promise by partners to pay an existing debt of a corporation to another in consideration of such other person giving them an agency for sale of his coal is an original obligation, which, under this section, need not be in writing. McCormick v. Johnson, 31 M 266, 78 P 500 (1904).

Consideration Necessary: The consideration which will convert a promise to answer for the obligation of a third person into an original obligation of the promisor, so as to take it out of the Statute of Frauds, must be one tangible at law. Bennighoff v. Robbins, 54 M 66, 166 P 687 (1917).

Oral Promise to Pay When Promisor Has Received Property: Where upon the winding up of a copartnership of which defendant was a member he retained certain partnership funds and agreed to pay plaintiff a debt due him for wages from the firm, defendant's promise was upon a consideration beneficial to himself and was valid though not in writing. Carlson v. Barker, 36 M 486, 93 P 646 (1907).

Independent Duty to Pay: When the original debt was antecedently contracted and subsists, the promise to pay it is original if founded upon a new consideration moving to the promisor, and beneficial to him, and such that the promisor thereby comes under an independent duty of payment irrespective of the liability of the principal debtor. McCormick v. Johnson, 31 M 266, 78 P 500 (1904).

Case Notes

Reasonable Notice of Acceptance: Notice of acceptance of bank's offer of guaranty on price of an engine was reasonable and timely when made at time of bank's repossession of truck (3 months after actual acceptance) and nearly 3 months before truck was resold. Miller v. Walter, 165 M 221, 527 P2d 240 (1974).

Letter: A letter written by plaintiff to defendant was a sufficient acceptance of an offer of guaranty. Davis v. McEwen, 193 F 305 (C.C.A. Mont. 1912).

28-11-107. When guaranty considered unconditional.

Case Notes

Lack of Notice to Guarantor of Alteration of Note — Basis for Release: When a lending bank brought an action to recover under a continuing and unconditional contract of guaranty, the guarantor established that the lender failed to notify the guarantor of changes in the underlying note which materially increased the guarantor's risk. The lending bank has a duty to notify a guarantor that it has not totally discharged a note upon receipt of the collateral. The bank's failure to give such notice releases the guarantor from his obligation. The Supreme Court approved the use of a test from the Restatement of Security sec. 124(1) (1941), for when a creditor has a duty, at the outset of an obligation, to disclose facts it knows about the debtor to the surety to determine whether the surety should be released. Sec. Bank v. Mudd, 215 M 242, 696 P2d 458, 42 St. Rep. 323 (1985).

Conditional Sale Contract: A guaranty on a conditional sale contract, guaranteeing full performance and stating any settlement or compromise with parties would not release guarantor, was an absolute guaranty, and the guarantor was not relieved by plaintiff recovering and selling the mining equipment involved. Gen. Fin. Co. v. Powell, 114 M 473, 138 P2d 255 (1943).

Guarantor Owes Pro Rata Share: Appellant and four other shareholders in company executed continuing guaranties for promissory notes on behalf of their shared business. Appellant subsequently signed away his share in company and left the business. Although the court considered appellant's equitable defense that he was not liable for his pro rata share of the notes because the other four guarantors personally profited from the sale of the business after appellant departed, he remains liable for his pro rata share. He signed the guaranty knowing the lender could sue him directly on the notes. All five shareholders shared equal liability on the promissory notes, and appellant is required to contribute his one-fifth pro rata share. Citizens St. Bank v. Part 2
Guaranty — Liability and Exoneration of Guarantor

Part Case Notes

Condition Required by Guaranty Held Satisfied by Proceeding Against Debtor in Bankruptcy: Based on a contract executed in 1990, Western supplied material to Chicago Mining Corporation (CMC) for its tailings pond in Pony. CMC failed to make contract payments, and Western filed a construction lien. In 1991, the guarantors individually executed personal guaranties that included language authorizing Western to collect against each guarantor "with the necessity of first proceeding against [CMC]". Later, Western and CMC stipulated to a judgment against CMC, a final judgment was entered, and Western arranged for a Sheriff's sale of certain CMC property, but CMC filed a petition for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. In 1995, Western brought a motion for summary judgment that was granted by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the guaranty was conditional because it established the necessity for action against CMC as a condition precedent to action against the guarantors to collect CMC's debt. The Supreme Court held that the condition was satisfied because Western had brought an action against CMC, filed a stipulated judgment against CMC, had attempted to enforce the judgment, and had taken various steps to participate in the bankruptcy proceedings, including the conversion of those proceedings from a Chapter 11 proceeding to a Chapter 7 proceeding. W. Indus., Inc. v. Chicago Min. Corp., 279 M 105, 926 P2d 737, 53 St. Rep. 1071 (1996).

28-11-201. Obligation of guarantor not to exceed that of principal.

Case Notes

Stipulated Judgment as Basis for Debt of Guarantors — Vesting Date of Right to Interest — Prejudgment and Postjudgment Interest Awarded: Chicago Mining Corporation (CMC) made a contract with Western for the purchase of mining equipment, and when CMC did not make payments as required by the contract, Western filed a construction lien to collect the amount of $232,730.04. In January 1991, individuals acting as guarantors executed personal guaranties for that amount, and Western promised that it would not institute foreclosure proceedings to enforce its lien until February 1, 1991. In 1994, Western and the guarantors stipulated to entry of judgment in the amount of $196,849.72, and judgment was entered for that amount. Following a bankruptcy proceeding and pursuant to a motion for summary judgment, the District Court awarded Western $232,730.04 and prejudgment interest from February 1, 1991, to February 22, 1996. The Supreme Court held that the stipulated judgment conclusively established CMC's obligation and that because the obligation of guarantors cannot exceed the obligation of the principal debtor, the amount of the stipulated judgment is also the amount owed by the guarantors. The Supreme Court also held that because Western's right to recover from the guarantors vested on February 1, 1991, the day CMC failed to make payments and the date upon which the guarantors agreed to make payment, that date is the date upon which prejudgment interest was due and that postjudgment interest was due from the date of the judgment to the date upon which the judgment is satisfied. W. Indus., Inc. v. Chicago Min. Corp., 279 M 105, 926 P2d 737, 53 St. Rep. 1071 (1996).

Letter of Credit — Guaranty Distinguished: Plaintiff agreed to lend Prospect Associates, Inc. (Prospect) money to finance construction of a subdivision. As part of the security for the loan, Prospect was required to obtain a letter of credit with plaintiff as beneficiary. Prospect defaulted on the promissory note evidencing the loan. Defendant refused payment on the letter of credit, contending it was a guaranty on which it was not primarily liable. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision, saying the document was clearly entitled a letter of credit and its intent was to hold the bank primarily liable upon nonperformance of one of the named instruments, as opposed to secondarily liable as under a guaranty. Sherwood & Roberts, Inc. v. First Security Bank, 209 M 402, 682 P2d 149, 41 St. Rep. 787 (1984).

Effect of Impossibility of Performance of Contract by Principal: Although contract was void because the impossibility of performance due to the nature of the thing the contracting company undertook to do, the contractor was entitled to a recovery on the quantum meruit. His bond did not permit recovery of damages. A collateral promise in the contract consisting of warranty was invalid and would not support action for breach of warranty. Contractor's lien was supported by the implied contract. Smith Eng'r Co. v. Rice, 102 F2d 492 (9th Cir. 1938).

Conditional Sales Contract — No Release by Assignment: A guaranty endorsed on a conditional sales contract by the seller guaranteeing full performance of the contract and prompt payment of all sums due thereunder is a separate and distinct agreement between him and the assignee thereof, and does not give rise to any contractual relation between the assignee and the vendee named in the contract. A guaranty such as this which in addition stated that any settlement or compromise which the holder of the conditional sales contract assigned may make with the parties to it shall not release the guarantor was an absolute guaranty from liability under which he was not relieved by the assignee's recovery and sale of the machinery involved. Gen. Fin. Co. v. Powell, 114 M 473, 138 P2d 255 (1943).

Subrogation of Guarantor: The guarantor of a mortgage debt can be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee only by payment of the entire debt secured and not merely by payment of the interest coupons of the mortgage as here. NW. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Pollard, 74 M 142, 238 P 594 (1925).

Accelerated Payments Provision: Where a purchase-money mortgage of farm machinery provided that on default of the purchaser in payment of any part of the principal of the notes given by him, the seller was authorized to take possession of the machinery and sell it at public auction without further demand, or at a private sale with or without notice, the liability of the guarantors of the notes became fixed when the buyer failed to make payment at maturity of the notes. Alteration of Original Terms of Guaranty — Exoneration From Personal Guaranty: Defendant signed a guaranty for a personal loan from the plaintiff bank. During the period of the loan, the bank materially altered the terms of the original guaranty by changing the underlying obligation from a line of credit to a term loan, which extended defendant's exposure as a guarantor. The jury exonerated the defendant from liability under the guaranty, and the bank appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Defendant presented sufficient evidence of the bank's change in the original obligation to warrant the jury's exoneration of the defendant from the guaranty. First Citizens Bank v. Sullivan, 2008 MT 428, 347 M 452, 200 P3d 39 (2008).

Principal's Impairment or Suspension of Rights of Guarantor — Exoneration of Guarantor Proper: Ace Leasing, Inc. (Ace), funded a lease to O'Neill for $45,000 for business equipment. Boustead was guarantor of the lease agreement. If O'Neill failed to perform, the lease provided that Ace could proceed directly against Boustead. O'Neill failed to make timely payments. Ace canceled the lease. O'Neill and Ace then discussed the matter, and O'Neill explained that the late payments were the result of the late arrival of the ordered equipment. Ace agreed to accept several late payments, but Boustead was not part of the negotiations. O'Neill again missed several payments, and Ace requested that Boustead pay off the lease. Boustead refused to pay on grounds that the cancellation letter and acceptance of late payments without Boustead's knowledge, as well as the method of purchasing the equipment, constituted a material change in the agreement and in Boustead's obligations as guarantor. The District Court agreed and exonerated Boustead as guarantor under this section. The court also held that Boustead's risk was increased because Ace did not own the equipment, so the transaction between Ace and O'Neill constituted a loan rather than a lease. Ace appealed the findings regarding ownership and alteration of the agreement. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under 30-2-401, the title of goods passes to the buyer at the time that and place at which the seller completes performance with reference to physical delivery of the goods, unless the agreement provides otherwise. Here, neither Ace nor O'Neill conformed to the purchase provision of the agreement. Because Ace failed to obtain title, Ace could not assume the role of lessor and, while retaining title and ownership, transfer to O'Neill merely the right of possession and use of the equipment, so the transaction effectively became a loan agreement between the parties with O'Neill holding title to the equipment according to the default provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. Further, Ace's actions in accepting late payments after canceling the agreement and in failing to comply with the terms of the lease requiring Ace to purchase the equipment and retain ownership to secure its interest were a material alteration in the agreement as affecting Boustead. Ace impaired or suspended its rights and remedies against O'Neill and, without Boustead's consent, impaired or suspended Boustead's rights as well, which was sufficient to exonerate Boustead as guarantor under this section. Ace Leasing, Inc. v. Boustead, 2002 MT 213, 311 M 285, 55 P3d 371 (2002).

Guarantor's Obligation Not Barred by Statute of Limitations as to Obligation of Principal: A creditor's claim against a guarantor is not exonerated by the running of the statute of limitations as against the principal. Mercury Marine v. Monty's Enterprises, Inc., 270 M 413, 892 P2d 568, 52 St. Rep. 255 (1995). See also Dupree v. Jordan, 252 P 67 (Okla. 1927), Bloom v. Bender, 313 P2d 568 (Calif. 1957), and Restatement of Security 130 (1941), Comment a on subsection (1) and illustration 2.

Guarantor Discharged From Guaranty if Bank Impaired Remedy: The Supreme Court remanded for a determination of whether attorneys for the estate knew of bank's claim and represented that a creditor's claim need not be filed. If determined that the bank did indeed fail to file a required creditor's claim, it impaired its remedy against the principal without authorization of the guarantor. Therefore, guarantor would be discharged of any responsibility under her guaranty. NW. Bank of Lewistown v. Estate of Coppedge, 219 M 473, 713 P2d 523, 43 St. Rep. 102 (1986).

Lack of Notice to Guarantor of Alteration of Note — Basis for Release: When a lending bank brought an action to recover under a continuing and unconditional contract of guaranty, the guarantor established that the lender failed to notify the guarantor of changes in the underlying note which materially increased the guarantor's risk. The lending bank has a duty to notify a guarantor that it has not totally discharged a note upon receipt of the collateral. The bank's failure to give such notice releases the guarantor from his obligation. The Supreme Court approved the use of a test from the Restatement of Security sec. 124(1) (1941), for when a creditor has a duty, at the outset of an obligation, to disclose facts it knows about the debtor to the surety to determine whether the surety should be released. Sec. Bank v. Mudd, 215 M 242, 696 P2d 458, 42 St. Rep. 323 (1985).

Exoneration by Death of Surety: Where deceased had previously cosigned a promissory note for the purpose of lending his name to another party, he became an accommodation maker. As such he is primarily responsible for the payment of the note, without necessity of resort to the principal, and it was error for the District Court to disallow the holder's claim against the deceased's estate. In re Estate of Harbaugh, 196 M 274, 639 P2d 495, 39 St. Rep. 84 (1982).

Alteration of Remedies or Rights of Creditor: An alteration or elimination of debtor's remedy did not result in exoneration of the guarantor; elimination of right of redemption of debtor corporations which owned real property subject to security interest by secured party's action in forcing transfer of pledged stock certificates did not exonerate guarantor. Stensvad v. Miners & Merchants Bank of Roundup, 163 M 409, 517 P2d 715 (1973).

Execution and Delivery of Note as Evidence: Debtor's execution and delivery to creditor of note as evidence of debt rather than as payment thereof did not exonerate debtor's surety in the absence of prejudice to the surety. Falls Implement Co. v. Gen. Ins. Co. of Am., 152 M 250, 448 P2d 675 (1968).

Rescission of Contract by Creditor: When vendees of real estate abandoned premises with the knowledge of vendors, who repossessed by permitting another party to occupy and served a notice of cancellation of the contract for sale upon vendees, vendors by such rescission of contract lost their right to bring action against vendees' guarantor for unpaid purchase price. Scott v. Kyhl, 141 M 523, 379 P2d 803 (1963).

Actual Injury to Surety Not Necessary: If a creditor without the consent of the surety does any act which in contemplation of law alters the surety's liability, increases his risk, or deprives him even for a moment of the right to pay the debt and assume the position of the creditor, or of his right to seek indemnity, the surety is discharged and the fact that he may not have been actually injured is immaterial. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Burns, 90 M 402, 4 P2d 703 (1931).

Alteration of Contract Releasing Surety: Where the grantor of mortgaged real property conveys it, the grantee assuming the mortgage (the grantor thus becoming a surety and the grantee the principal debtor), and thereafter the mortgagee enters into a written agreement with the grantee under which he relinquishes his right to receive the gross revenues from the property as provided for under the mortgage contract, requires the grantee to pay only what is left after paying operating expenses and waives default in the payment of taxes as well as his right to foreclose the mortgage because of defaults in paying monthly installments of rent, the original obligation is so materially altered as to release the surety under 28-11-412 and this section. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Burns, 90 M 402, 4 P2d 703 (1931).

Extension of Time for Payment as Release: When a mortgagee granted a purchaser of the mortgaged property who had assumed the debt an extension within which to make payment at a higher rate of interest than that originally provided for, without the consent of his grantor, thus materially altering the terms of the obligation to pay debt, the grantor (surety) was released from liability and therefore the mortgagee was not entitled to a deficiency judgment against him in his action to foreclose. Shipman v. Terrill, 84 M 322, 276 P 21 (1929).

Amendment of Complaint as Release: The surety on an undertaking to secure the release of property from attachment enters into the obligation with reference to the cause as it then stands; and if the plaintiff in the action in which the attachment was levied, without the consent of the surety, subsequently changes his pleading so as to state another and different cause of action, it is such a change as will work a release of the surety. Gilna v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 83 M 231, 272 P 540 (1928).

Compromise of Claim as Release: A guarantor of the payment of a note is relieved from liability when the cashier of the holder, with the knowledge of the holder, accepts as payment from the principal debtor a conveyance of land, cancels the note, and executes a note to the holder for the amount of the debt of the principal debtor. Standford v. Coram, 26 M 285, 67 P 1005 (1902).

Indemnity

Part Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence to Support Jury Verdict That Principal Breached Fiduciary Duty to Its Agent: An insured brought an action against Deonier, an insurance agent, and Paul Revere Life Insurance Company (Revere) to recover benefits and damages after the insured's claim was denied on grounds of a preexisting condition, despite the incontestability clause in the policy. The agent cross-claimed against the company for indemnity and breach of fiduciary duty, contending that there was a significant amount of evidence that Revere planned to assert the Forman defense in Montana (see Mass. Cas. Ins. Co. v. Forman, 516 F2d 425 (5th Cir. 1975), in which an insurer asserted a legal defense to the incontestability clause based on its definition of sickness as excluding disabilities that manifested themselves prior to the date of issue of the policy) and that Revere's failure to inform Deonier of its intention to invoke the defense was a clear breach of Revere's duty to inform its agents of a risk of pecuniary loss from potential lawsuits. Revere asserted that pursuant to Doettl v. Colonial Life & Accident Ins. Co., 505 F. Supp. 127 (D.C. Mont. 1981), in which a Montana federal District Court endorsed the Forman defense, it had no reason to believe that its policy interpretation might be in violation of Montana law and therefore did not breach its duty to inform its agents of risk of pecuniary loss. In the first Deonier case, Deonier & Associates v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 2000 MT 238, 301 M 347, 9 P3d 622 (2000), the Supreme Court reversed the lower court's summary judgment in favor of Revere that held that there had not been a breach of fiduciary duty and remanded the case back to the lower court for a jury trial on the issue of liability and damages. The jury found for Deonier and awarded her $150,000 in compensatory damages and $1 million in punitive damages, which the trial court reduced to $375,000. The trial court denied Revere's motion for judgment as a matter of law that it had not breached its fiduciary duty. The Supreme Court affirmed on the basis that Deonier had presented evidence that Revere knew it would assert the Forman defense and that such an action might lead to pecuniary damages for its agents, and therefore there existed a legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find that a breach of fiduciary duty had occurred. Deonier & Associates v. Paul Revere Life Ins. Co., 2004 MT 297, 323 M 387, 101 P3d 742 (2004).

Indemnity of Insurance Agent for Defending Actions Performed on Insurer's Behalf in Solicitation of Application for Insurance: An insured brought a negligent misrepresentation action against Deonier, an insurance agent, and Paul Revere Life Insurance Company (Revere) to recover benefits and damages after the insured's claim was denied on grounds of a preexisting condition, despite the incontestability clause in the policy. Deonier cross-claimed against the company for indemnity, and the District Court required Revere to indemnify for damages that Deonier suffered as a result of the lawsuit. Revere appealed on grounds that Deonier was acting as an agent for the insured when recommending a disability policy, rather than as an agent for Revere, asserting that the fees that Deonier incurred were for defending the insured's claim that Deonier was actively negligent, defeating an indemnity claim. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because Revere admitted in its pleadings that there was no basis in law or fact for the negligent misrepresentation claim against Deonier, Revere implicitly conceded that Deonier's liability to the insured arose solely from the agency relationship between Deonier and Revere, a situation in which indemnity was required. No Agreement to Indemnify Third Parties in Contract for Sale of Ski Resort: In 1976, Big Sky of Montana, Inc., sold the Big Sky ski resort. The resort eventually came under the ownership of Boyne U.S.A., Inc. Big Sky of Montana, Inc., agreed to indemnify Boyne against liability claims arising out of Big Sky's business affairs prior to the sale. In 1976, structural defects were found in condominiums owned by the plaintiffs, and after a lawsuit, Big Sky's successor in interest, Big Sky of Montana Realty, Inc., made repairs to the buildings. In 1981, the plaintiffs suffered two fires that destroyed parts of their condominiums. The plaintiffs sued Big Sky of Montana Realty, Inc., claiming that the plaintiffs were entitled to indemnity for their loss under the sales contract. The District Court found that no indemnity agreement existed. The Supreme Court found that on the record, Big Sky of Montana Realty, Inc., made no indemnity payment to the plaintiffs for settlement of the structural defects and that there was no other evidence before the Supreme Court of an indemnity agreement. The District Court therefore properly found that the 1976 sale was not an indemnity agreement in favor of the plaintiffs. Ass'n of Unit Owners of Deer Lodge Condominium v. Big Sky of Mont., Inc., 245 M 64, 798 P2d 1018, 47 St. Rep. 1814 (1990).

Accepted Work Rule Doctrine — Contractor Nonliability: The District Court properly granted summary judgment in favor of a contractor on the issue of negligence based on the accepted work rule doctrine. The doctrine, first recognized in Ulmen v. Schwieger, 92 M 331, 12 P2d 856 (1932), is based on the rule that an independent contractor is not liable to third parties for injuries that occur after the work has been completed and turned over to and accepted by the employer. Instead, the person employing the contractor is substituted as the responsible party. The Supreme Court affirmed the doctrine by refusing to extend contractor liability to foreseeable injury caused by negligent construction. Harrington v. LaBelle's of Colo., Inc., 235 M 80, 765 P2d 732, 45 St. Rep. 2176 (1988), overruled in Pierce v. ALSC Architects, P.S., 270 M 97, 890 P2d 1254, 52 St. Rep. 93 (1995).

Products Liability — "Upstream" Indemnification From Manufacturer of Defective Component: The federal District Court, noting the Montana Supreme Court decision in Brandenburger v. Toyota Motor Sales, 162 M 506, 513 P2d 268 (1973), adopted as a general proposition the rule that allows the manufacturer/assembler of a finished product to seek indemnification from the manufacturer of a component part that was defective at the time it left the component manufacturer's hand and that was integrated as part of the finished product. Jones v. Aero-Chem Corp., 680 F. Supp. 338, 45 St. Rep. 360 (D.C. Mont. 1987).

No Right to Third-Party Indemnity or Contribution in RICO Action: In a Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) action there is no right to indemnification or contribution from a third party. Jacobson v. W. Mont. Prod. Credit Ass'n, 643 F. Supp. 391, 43 St. Rep. 1598 (D.C. Mont. 1986), citing Seminole Elec. Co-op, Inc. v. Anthony Tanner, No. 85-1286-Civ-T-13 (M.D. Fla. 1986).

Indemnity — Refusal to Instruct on Active/Passive Negligence Not Reversible Error: Where the plaintiff supplier of certain air pollution control equipment brought an action against the defendant manufacturing company for breach of warranty, the District Court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury on the active/passive negligence of the plaintiff. The record in this case shows that there was no active negligence on the part of the plaintiff and he therefore did not lose his right to indemnity under the rationale of Town Pump, Inc. v. Diteman, 191 M 98, 622 P2d 212, 38 St. Rep. 54 (1981). Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Liability of Indemnitor Upon Settlement of Original Claim — Standard for Liability: Where the plaintiff equipment supplier sued the defendant manufacturing company in a third-party action for breach of warranty, after giving the defendant an opportunity to defend or approve a settlement of the original case, the plaintiff sustained its burden of proof by proving potential liability in the original action. Because the defendant was given the opportunity to either defend the plaintiff or approve a settlement and declined to do either, the plaintiff needed only to show potential rather than actual liability in the original action in order to recover from the defendant, and there was sufficient evidence in the record of potential liability. Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Indemnification for Amount of Settlement Under Specific Contract Provisions: When under the terms of a contract between two interstate trucking firms the appellant agreed to provide workers' compensation coverage and to save the appellee's carrier harmless from any liability arising out of the relationship between the appellant and his employees, the appellee's carrier was entitled to be indemnified for an amount paid in settlement of a workers' compensation claim. Indus. Indem. Co. v. McIntosh, 185 M 158, 604 P2d 1233 (1980).

Products Liability — Indemnity — Third-Party Actions: Plaintiff was injured when a pickup truck in which he was riding rolled over. Plaintiff sued General Motors and also the manufacturer of the pants he was wearing. Plaintiff alleged the pants were defective and increased the severity of his injuries by melting onto his skin. The pants manufacturer filed a third-party complaint against Burlington Industries who had manufactured the pants material and supplied it to Corbin, Ltd., the maker of the pants. Burlington moved for dismissal of the third-party complaint, saying that indemnity for tort liability cannot be sought in a third-party action when the primary complaint sounds in strict products liability, indemnity being antithetical to and inapplicable in strict liability actions. Corbin argued that such indemnity is permissible through a process of weighing the comparative fault of two potentially liable parties, despite the fact the action was in strict liability, not in negligence. The U.S. District Court agreed with the Burlington arguments, observing that Corbin offered little supporting authority while Burlington cited ample authority. The court also noted that Montana has adopted Section 402A of the Restatement of Torts, including the conclusion that the doctrine of strict liability was evolved to place liability on the party primarily responsible for the injury occurring, that is, the manufacturer of the defective product, a position based on public policy arguments. The question in Montana is the condition of the product in the hands of the injured party, not the ultimate fault of any given defendant arising from such defendant's conduct. Kelly v. Gen. Motors Corp., 487 F. Supp. 1041, 37 St. Rep. 805 (D.C. Mont. 1980), distinguished in Jones v. Aero-Chem Corp., 680 F. Supp. 338, 45 St. Rep 360 (D.C. Mont. 1987).

Implied Right of Indemnity Not Applicable: Plaintiffs sued defendant airline company for injuries sustained by the airline's negligent maintenance of the runway apron, and the defendant's third-party complaint alleging an implied right of indemnity by the city maintaining the airport was dismissed. Because indemnity operates to shift the entire loss from one party compelled to bear it to the shoulders of another who should bear it instead, indemnity is not applicable where active negligence on the part of one party has been proven. The city's motion for summary judgment dismissing the third-party complaint was properly granted. Rogers v. W. Airlines, 184 M 170, 602 P2d 171 (1979).

28-11-301. Indemnity defined.

Additional Insured Endorsement in Primary Policy — Duty to Defend: An employee of a subcontractor was injured while installing fireproofing in a building. The general contractor's liability insurer (defendant insurer) tendered a defense to the subcontractor under the indemnity clause in the subcontract and to the general contractor's insurer (plaintiff insurer) under the commercial general liability policy, so the question arose whether plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend pursuant to the commercial liability under which the general contractor qualified as an additional insured. Plaintiff insurer argued that because the general contractor could not shift responsibility to the subcontractor for the general contractor's statutory duty to maintain general job site safety, plaintiff insurer had no duty to defend or cover the loss. The District Court disagreed and granted summary judgment to defendant insurer pursuant to the additional insured endorsement. Plaintiff insurer appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court examined the indemnity provision in the subcontract and determined that the indemnity provision was not sufficiently clear and unequivocal in its intent to indemnify the general contractor for its own negligence, so the court then turned to the language of the additional insured endorsement. The general contractor was clearly named as an additional insured on a primary noncontributing basis, so plaintiff insurer's policy was clearly intended to be primary. Because plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend the general contractor, the District Court did not err in granting defendant insurer's motion for summary judgment and holding that plaintiff insurer breached its duty to defend. United Nat'l Ins. Co. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2009 MT 269, 352 M 105, 214 P3d 1260 (2009), following Slater v. Cent. Indemnification Required for Medical Expenses Incurred Through Insurance Lapse — Payment of Expenses Proper Absent Evidence of Expenses Beyond Indemnification: The parties' dissolution decree required the mother to provide medical insurance for their children and to pay uninsured medical expenses, and the father was required to pay child support and dental and ocular expenses. The mother subsequently lost her medical insurance but failed to notify the father. The mother later sought to hold the father in contempt for failing to provide child support and for unpaid medical expenses. The father asserted that because the mother failed to maintain the required insurance or provide written notice, he was entitled to indemnity from the medical care expenses pursuant to 40-5-822(4). The District Court held that indemnity did not apply and ordered the father to pay 4 months of disputed child support and his portion of uncovered medical expenses, plus the mother's attorney fees. The Supreme Court held that the mother was required by 40-5-822(4) to indemnify the father for health care costs unless she satisfied one of the exemptions in subsection (4) because she permitted the insurance to lapse without securing comparable insurance. Because the written notice required by 40-5-822(4)(b) was not given, the District Court erred as a matter of law in concluding that the mother was not required to indemnify the father for expenses incurred as a result of the failure to maintain insurance. However, the father's argument that he was not obligated to pay any medical expenses following the insurance lapse failed. Section 40-5-822(4) did not require that the mother pay all the medical costs, but only that the father be indemnified, or made whole. Upon proof of the amount owed, the mother was required to pay the father for any additional medical costs incurred to the extent that those expenses were in excess of what the father's obligation would have been if the mother had maintained insurance coverage. The father presented no evidence of such expenses, while the mother presented evidence showing to the penny how much the father was obligated to pay. Thus, the District Court had nothing from which to determine an amount that should be deducted, so the court did not err in ordering the father to pay his share of the medical expenses. In re Marriage of Crone, 2003 MT 238, 317 M 256, 77 P3d 167 (2003).

Judgment — Setoff Based on Stipulation: Plaintiff received a judgment against defendant. Defendant appealed, and the appeal was dismissed with prejudice when defendant advised the court that defendant did not wish to proceed with it. Defendant then filed a motion for a setoff of an amount that plaintiff and defendant were both liable to pay to a third party. Defendant's attorney and plaintiff's attorney had entered into a stipulation that plaintiff was primarily liable and defendant secondarily liable for that amount and that if defendant paid it, the payment would be set off against any judgment granted plaintiff against defendant. The lower court properly set off that amount as partial satisfaction of the judgment. Although the motion was not made within the time required by the rules, it was properly considered because the Clerk of Court did not give defendant notice of entry of the judgment against defendant; therefore, the time for filing the motion had not commenced to run, since the motion was to be made within a certain time from the notice of entry of judgment. AAR Constr., Inc. v. Fergus Elec. Co-op., Inc., 215 M 102, 695 P2d 819, 42 St. Rep. 214 (1985).

Subcontractor to Indemnify Contractor: The contract between Wright, the general contractor, and DeBeer, the subcontractor, contained an indemnity provision. An employee of DeBeer's was injured and recovered a judgment against Wright. Wright sued to enforce the indemnity clause. The Supreme Court found that the clause included not only the negligence of DeBeer but also that of Wright. It made no difference whether Wright was actively or passively negligent. Further, a covenant not to sue between the employee and DeBeer had no effect on the operation of the clause. Howard S. Wright Constr. Co. v. DeBeer Mechanical Constr. Co., 185 M 47, 604 P2d 323 (1979), distinguished in Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 275 M 266, 912 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 132 (1996).

Contractor's Indemnity to Subcontractor: When subcontractor was required to perform in accordance to contractor's deficient design and home owners had judgment against him, he had right to indemnification against contractor. Miller v. Melaney, 172 M 74, 560 P2d 902 (1977).

Dividend Guaranty Note: When for the purpose of inducing the purchase of corporate stock the seller gave the buyer a promissory note payable in 3 years, the back of which bore the endorsement that when the stock had paid dividends to the amount of the purchase price the note should be void, the agreement evidenced by the note and endorsement was one of indemnity within the meaning of this section and not of guaranty. Indemnity for All Injuries Not in Contravention of Law: Tenant's agreement to save the railroad, the landlord, harmless from all injuries due to the negligence of the railroad or its employees, and to maintain insurance protecting the railroad, did not contravene Montana law that all contracts for exempting anyone from responsibility for his own fraud, willful injury to personalty, or law violation are against public policy. Ryan Mercantile Co. v. Great N. Ry., 294 F2d 629 (9th Cir. 1961), followed in Sweet v. Colborn School Supply, 196 M 367, 639 P2d 521, 39 St. Rep. 168 (1982).

Implied Indemnity Agreement Sustained: A Sheriff attached furniture on instructions of attaching creditor. Later in conversion suit some of the furniture was held exempt and claimant awarded damages against Sheriff for its retention. In Sheriff's action to recover from attaching creditor on implied promise of indemnity the claim of the attaching creditor that officer knew his act was unlawful and the indemnity agreement was therefore void under this section was without merit. 1997 Amendment: Chapter 429 in exception clause inserted "and 27-1-705"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 429, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, efforts of the Legislature to amend the comparative negligence statute, which is premised on a modified joint and several liability scheme, have repeatedly been struck down by the Montana Supreme Court; and

WHEREAS, the Montana Supreme Court rulings prohibiting the consideration of fault attributable to nonparties impair the effectiveness of the current modified joint and several liability system in Montana; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature intends that the policy of the state should be a system of comparative fault in which persons are held responsible only to the extent to which they cause or contribute to the harm; and

WHEREAS, the current system of joint and several liability, which apportions all liability only among parties to the action, fails to apportion liability among all tortfeasors according to their equitable share of fault; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature recognizes that public policy favors fair settlements that accurately reflect the liability of settled or released parties; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature is concerned with the present inequitable results of solvent defendants having to pay for the liability of insolvent, immune, or settled parties; and

WHEREAS, the present system of joint and several liability for all tort actions does not reflect the state's policy of liability in proportion to fault; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature recognizes that joint and several liability should be retained for certain situations; and

WHEREAS, at least ten other states have abrogated the doctrine of joint and several liability, except for specific situations; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has the power to alter tort causes of action to promote legitimate state interests.

THEREFORE, the Legislature declares that the doctrine of joint and several liability is abolished, except for specific causes of action, and is replaced with a comparative fault system utilizing the principles of several liability."

Severability: Section 9, Ch. 429, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

1987 Amendment: At beginning inserted exception clause.

Indemnification Action — Defense of Contributory Negligence Unavailable: Contributory negligence is not available in Montana as a defense in an action for indemnification. Jones v. Aero-Chem Corp., 680 F. Supp. 338, 45 St. Rep. 360 (D.C. Mont. 1987).

Action Against Insurance Company Not Maintainable Until Liability of Insured Adjudicated: This section declaring that the insurer is jointly liable with the indemnitee does not operate prior to an adjudication of liability against the insured. Conley v. USF&G Co., 98 M 31, 37 P2d 565 (1934).

"An Act to Be Done": The phrase "an act to be done", as used in this section, with reference to which the indemnity exists, clearly implied an act the nature of which is known to the parties and one which is yet anticipated. It also strongly implies that the liability contemplated is to accrue from the doing of the act and not upon the contract of indemnity. Conley v. USF&G Co., 98 M 31, 37 P2d 565 (1934); Cummings v. Reins Copper Co., 40 M 599, 107 P 904 (1910).

Declaratory of the Common Law: This section is simply declaratory of the common law and has no application to a case in which one company has contracted to indemnify another employing company for damages to its employees; one of the companies, if answerable at all, is liable for contract; the other for a tort. Cummings v. Reins Copper Co., 40 M 599, 107 P 904 (1910).

General Import of Section: The import of this section is that the indemnitor gives a bond, in consideration of which the indemnitee agrees or is induced to act, or to refrain from acting, to the injury of a third person. Northam v. Cas. Co. of Am., 177 F 981 (9th Cir. 1909).

"To Be Done By": The phrase "to be done by", as used in this section, implies on the part of the indemnitee an agreement or obligation to commit the tort in question, as if the phrase were "an act required (or demanded or requested) to be done by" the indemnitee and, as so construed, the section is merely declaratory of the common law. Northam v. Cas. Co. of Am., 177 F 981 (9th Cir. 1909).

Contribution and Indemnity Among Tortfeasors, Franks, 31 Mont. L. Rev. 69 (1969).

28-11-313. Interpretation of contract of indemnity.

Case Notes

Liberal Interpretation: Indemnity clauses in contracts should be liberally construed in favor of the party intended to be indemnified. To indemnify a party against his own negligence, the indemnity must be expressed in clear and unequivocal terms. The indemnity provision in a contract between a highway contractor and the State Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) holding the contractor solely responsible in areas of high voltage electric cables was not for the benefit of the contractor's deceased employee. The widow of the employee sued the electric company for wrongful death. The company could not bring a third-party action against the contractor under the indemnity provisions of the contract. Lesofski v. Ravalli County Elec. Co-op, 151 M 104, 439 P2d 370 (1968), followed in Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 1999 MT 257, 297 M 7, 993 P2d 654, 56 St. Rep. 1023 (1999).

Indemnity — Construction of Lease: A clause in an instrument covering the lease of equipment provided that the lessee assumed all liability arising from the use of the equipment and growing out of any cause, including defective equipment. An injury was sustained by one of lessee's employees. Lessee's liability for the injury resulting from defective equipment was not limited to workers' compensation. The measure of damages was whatever lessor might properly pay in settlement of the action against it by the employee, plus interest and reasonable expenses. The indemnity clause was valid. W. Constr. Equip. Co. v. Mosby's, Inc., 146 M 313, 406 P2d 165 (1965), followed in Wash. Water Power Co. v. Morgan Elec. Co., 152 M 126, 448 P2d 683 (1968).

Agreement to Determine Scope: An agreement requiring the tenant to save the railroad (the landlord) harmless from any and all injuries, whether due to negligence of the railroad, its contractors, officers, agents, and employees, and to defend the railroad against any action because of such injuries, required the tenant to defend an action for injuries against the railroad based solely on the negligence of railroad employees at a place where the railroad had a duty under Montana law to provide safeguards. Ryan Mercantile Co. v. Great N. Ry., 294 F2d 629 (9th Cir. 1961).

Liberal Construction: An indemnity contract must be liberally construed in favor of the party intended to be indemnified, and so as to best effectuate and carry into operation the reasonable intention of the parties. The construction of the contract of indemnity here, which in effect permitted the contribution by one tortfeasor from his joint tortfeasor, contrary to the established rule which denied such right, was not contrary to public policy. Union Elec. Co. v. Lovell Livestock Co., 93 M 577, 20 P2d 255 (1933).

Case Notes

Failure to Notify of Challenge to Right to Indemnification Prior to Settlement — Indemnification for Wage Loss and Medical Benefits Required: Plaintiff's employee Salazar was injured while a passenger on defendant's transportation service, and Salazar's care was managed by plaintiff's federally approved wellness program. Salazar agreed to drop claims against plaintiff and the contractor that provided the transportation service, and plaintiff then cross-claimed for indemnification from the contractor. The contractor was subsequently ordered to indemnify plaintiff for part of the settlement, and the contractor appealed, seeking equitable relief. The Supreme Court affirmed. The program administrator failed to request an independent medical examination to separate the work-related claims from claims related to the accident, which arguably increased the contractor's risk of loss beyond what the contractor agreed to indemnify, but the contractor failed to notify plaintiff prior to settlement that the contractor would challenge plaintiff's right to indemnification, so the contractor did not come to court with clean hands and could not avail itself of the equitable relief of discharge from the obligation to indemnify plaintiff. Mont. Rail Link v. CUSA PRTS, LLC, 2009 MT 432, 354 M 101, 222 P3d 1021 (2009). See also Seifert v. Seifert, 173 M 501, 568 P2d 155 (1977), and Cowan v. Cowan, 2004 MT 68, 320 M 332, 87 P3d 443 (2004).

Indemnification Provisions — "Clear and Unequivocal" Standard: A contract provision that required the subcontractor to indemnify the general contractor for damages arising out of the subcontractor's negligence did not require the subcontractor to indemnify the general contractor for the general contractor's own negligence. Contractual provisions that indemnify a party for its own negligence must be "clear and unequivocal" to be enforceable. The general contractor was found negligent per se under Title 50, ch. 77, part 1, commonly known as the Montana Scaffolding Act. The general contractor could not use the indemnification clause of the contract in order to recover against the subcontractor. Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 275 M 266, 912 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 132 (1996). Following the 1996 decision (Slater I), the general contractor sought contribution from the subcontractor for that portion of liability attributable to the subcontractor. The District Court held that Slater I closed all the general contractor's doors of recovery from the subcontractor under any theory. However, the motion for partial summary judgment that gave rise to Slater I was based on the first claim of the general contractor's amended cross-claim and only precluded indemnification for the general contractor's own negligence under a breach of contract claim, but the general contractor was not precluded by the prohibition against splitting a cause of action or by the doctrine of res judicata from pursuing a separate claim for contribution under the second claim of its amended cross-claim. The issue of indemnity based on the subcontractor's negligence was not the same as the previously decided issues regarding whether there was an indemnity claim based on the general contractor's negligence or a breach of contract in relation to the safety provisions. Thus, the case was remanded for further proceedings on the remaining claims. Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 1999 MT 257, 297 M 7, 993 P2d 654, 56 St. Rep. 1023 (1999).

Liability Insurance — Recovery on Policy Not Defeated by Negligence of Insured: Insurer brought declaratory judgment action against insured for indemnity on basis that gasoline leakage was not covered by policy. In Town Pump, Inc. v. Diteman, 622 P2d 212, 38 St. Rep. 54 (1981), the insured had been denied indemnity coverage against its contractor for the same gasoline leakage because of the insured's own negligence. The District Court found insured 50% negligent and ordered recovery on that basis. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court decision and ordered full recovery for insured against insurer on the basis that mere negligence of a policyholder is not a defense to enforcement of a policy and full recovery by an insured is in order in the absence of a cooperation clause or allegations of intentional wrongdoing. Gen. Ins. Co. of Am. v. Town Pump, Inc., 214 M 27, 692 P2d 427, 41 St. Rep. 2292 (1984).

Finding a Partnership — Splitting of Profits, Advertising, and Merging of Resources and Talents — Lack of Intent Not Controlling: Father and son shared equipment as needed, stored seed potatoes together in son's warehouse, advertised under the name of "Wilbur Kimm and Son", and split profits in a joint account. Son's insurer sued father's insurer for contribution for claims paid that were filed by buyers against son for crop damages caused by seeds treated by son. District Court found no partnership existed, primarily based on father's and son's testimony that they did not intend for a partnership to exist. The Supreme Court reversed and ordered judgment granting plaintiff insurer's motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that splitting of profits, coupled with advertising under a joint name and the merging of resources and talents for the growing of the potatoes, preponderates against the District Court's finding of no partnership. Truck Ins. Exch. v. Indus. Indem. Co., 212 M 297, 688 P2d 1243, 41 St. Rep. 1835 (1984).

Indemnity for Own Negligent Act: An indemnity agreement for damages caused by negligent acts of the indemnitee must be in clear and unequivocal terms. Sweet v. Colborn School Supply, 196 M 367, 639 P2d 521, 39 St. Rep. 168 (1982), followed in Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 275 M 266, 912 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 132 (1996).

No Right of Indemnity Where Plaintiff Is Negligent: In an indemnity action the negligent conduct of plaintiff precludes recovery from the defendant, a construction contractor hired by plaintiff, of damages paid to a third party. The right of indemnity exists for the benefit of plaintiff if, without wrongful conduct on its part, it was liable to pay damages caused by the negligence of defendant and the liability to pay damages arose from the breach by defendant of an implied contractual duty owed to plaintiff. Town Pump v. Diteman, 180 M 358, 590 P2d 1126, 38 St. Rep. 54 (1981).

Consideration for and Enforcement of Implied Indemnity: Defendant, special administratrix of an estate, had a deposit as such in a bank, and Weisner, claiming to have been appointed special administrator, made demand for payment to him of the sum deposited. The bank notified defendant of this demand, and she requested it to refuse the demand and retain the deposit in her name until it could be ascertained who was entitled to it. The bank relied upon her implied promise to indemnify and save it harmless from all damage by reason of its compliance with her request, and refusal to comply with Weisner's demand. This constituted a good consideration for the implied promise, that is, a benefit conferred on Mrs. Nett and a prejudice suffered by the bank. Mrs. Nett was subsequently removed from her office and, after her removal, Weisner recovered judgment against the bank for the amount of the deposit with interest from the date of his demand. Mrs. Nett was not liable to reimburse the bank for the amount paid as interest, it having been the bank's duty without request to retain the deposit to meet its obligation to her. Murphy v. Nett, 51 M 82, 149 P 713 (1915).

No Award of Attorney Fees Absent Basis in Indemnification Provision: The District Court held that defendant was required to indemnify plaintiff for medical care and that plaintiff was entitled to attorney fees and costs pursuant to 28-11-315. Defendant appealed and the Supreme Court reversed in part. The indemnification provision did not specifically provide for an award of attorney fees, and the court declined to adopt an exception to the American Rule that allows attorney fees in contract actions only if specifically allowed by the contract. Additionally, 28-11-315 addresses only costs, not attorney fees, so the section did not provide a statutory basis for the award of attorney fees in the indemnification action. On remand, plaintiff was entitled to costs but not attorney fees. Mont. Rail Link v. CUSA PRTS, LLC, 2009 MT 432, 354 M 101, 222 P3d 1021 (2009).

Contractual Indemnity Clear — Costs and Attorney Fees for Defending Suit: A contract's indemnity provision stated that contractor indemnified client for costs and reasonable attorney fees arising in whole or in part from contractor's negligence and that client indemnified contractor for costs and reasonable attorney fees arising solely from client's negligence. In a suit against both of them, client's request that the contractor defend was refused. Client defended, and contractor was ordered to pay client's costs and reasonable attorney fees. For purposes of appeal, contractor admitted it was at least partially negligent. Contractor's claim that client was not indemnified for client's negligence was denied. If both were negligent or if contractor was solely negligent, client was entitled to recover its costs and reasonable attorney fees under the indemnity agreement. Amazi v. Atl. Richfield Co., 249 M 355, 816 P2d 431, 48 St. Rep. 737 (1991).

Right to Indemnity for Costs and Attorney Fees Incurred in Proving Right to Indemnity: A provision that contractor indemnified client, including indemnity for costs, attorney fees, judgments, settlements, and other similar or dissimilar related expenses, was merely one provision in a contract to perform geophysical exploration. Because client was not expressly indemnified for establishing the right to indemnification, client was not entitled to be indemnified for costs and attorney fees client incurred in proving client's right to indemnity under the contract. The court rejected client's claim that the indemnity provision was similar to a contract of insurance and that therefore client was entitled to costs and attorney fees for proving client's indemnity right. The court also rejected the claim that the "related expenses" clause should be liberally construed to require indemnity for costs and attorney fees incurred in proving the right to indemnity. Amazi v. Atl. Richfield Co., 249 M 355, 816 P2d 431, 48 St. Rep. 737 (1991).

Case Notes

Presence of Insurance Adjuster Rather Than Attorney at Prelitigation Mediation Conference Not Violative of Insurer's Duty to Defend: An insurer sent an insurance adjuster rather than an attorney to a prelitigation mediation conference. Defendant contended that this violated the insurer's statutory duty to defend under the policy. The District Court held that the insurer met its obligation by actively participating in the mediation, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the duty to defend encompasses functions that can only be fulfilled by a licensed attorney, but that insurance adjusters play a vital role in the resolution of claims prior to the initiation of litigation and further noted that public policy encourages settlements and avoiding unnecessary litigation. Requiring that counsel be retained for informal settlement conferences could hinder the negotiation process and contravene the policy of encouraging out-of-court settlements. The mediation was not part of any judicial proceeding, and the insurer did not violate its duty to defend by sending an insurance adjuster to mediation. The District Court was affirmed. Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Johnson, 2009 MT 442, 354 M 192, 224 P3d 613 (2009).

Additional Insured Endorsement in Primary Policy — Duty to Defend: An employee of a subcontractor was injured while installing fireproofing in a building. The general contractor's liability insurer (defendant insurer) tendered a defense to the subcontractor under the indemnity clause in the subcontract and to the general contractor's insurer (plaintiff insurer) under the commercial general liability policy, so the question arose whether plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend pursuant to the commercial liability under which the general contractor qualified as an additional insured. Plaintiff insurer argued that because the general contractor could not shift responsibility to the subcontractor for the general contractor's statutory duty to maintain general job site safety, plaintiff insurer had no duty to defend or cover the loss. The District Court disagreed and granted summary judgment to defendant insurer pursuant to the additional insured endorsement. Plaintiff insurer appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The court examined the indemnity provision in the subcontract and determined that the indemnity provision was not sufficiently clear and unequivocal in its intent to indemnify the general contractor for its own negligence, so the court then turned to the language of the additional insured endorsement. The general contractor was clearly named as an additional insured on a primary noncontributing basis, so plaintiff insurer's policy was clearly intended to be primary. Because plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend the general contractor, the District Court did not err in granting defendant insurer's motion for summary judgment and holding that plaintiff insurer breached its duty to defend. United Nat'l Ins. Co. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2009 MT 269, 352 M 105, 214 P3d 1260 (2009), following Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 275 M 266, 912 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 132 (1996). See also Staples v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 108, 321 M 99, 90 P3d 381 (2004).

No Duty of Insurer to Defend or Indemnify Contractor Protected From Liability: An employee of a subcontractor sued plaintiff for negligence, but plaintiff's insurers and the contractor's insurer refused to defend and indemnify against the claim. The District Court granted summary judgment to the contractor's insurer, and the employee appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. The contractor was protected from liability under 39-71-411. Because the contractor was not sued for its own negligence or found liable for any tortious conduct, its insurer had no duty to defend or indemnify plaintiff under the insurance policy or its endorsements. Plum Creek Marketing, Inc. v. Am. Economy Ins. Co., 2009 MT 264, 352 M 56, 214 P3d 1238 (2009).

Insurer Duty to Defend Against Subcontractor-Caused Damages From Faulty Product Provided by Subcontractor Under Policy Conditions: Defendant insurer contended that it had no duty to defend against subcontractor-caused damages. Generally, an insurer has no duty to defend the insured if there is no liability to the insured under the policy provisions. However, in this case plaintiff's subcontractor provided a faulty product that was passed on to and accepted by plaintiff before the defect was discovered. The insurer had knowledge of the subcontractor involvement even though it was not mentioned in the complaint. Under these circumstances, the policy provided coverage for the subcontractor-caused damages, and the insurer had a duty to defend and indemnify plaintiff. The District Court's holding that there was no duty to defend was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings. Revelation Indus., Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2009 MT 123, 350 M 184, 206 P3d 919 (2009). See also NW. Nat'l Cas. Co. v. Phalen, 182 M 448, 597 P2d 720 (1979), and Geraldine v. Mont. Municipal Ins. Authority, 2008 MT 411, 347 M 267, 198 P3d 796 (2008).

No Breach of Duty to Defend When Claim Excluded Under Policy's Breach of Contract Provision: Plaintiff town entered a contract with a drilling company. The mayor allegedly instructed the company to perform work beyond the scope of the contract and said the town would pay for the work. When the town refused to pay, the company sued for breach of contract. The town then contacted defendant insurer, requesting a defense and indemnification, but the insurer refused coverage. The District Court held that the insurer did not have a duty to defend or indemnify. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The policy contained exclusions for nonmonetary damages, punitive damages, breach of contract, and liability based on estimated probable costs or faulty bid specifications. The complaint against the town alleged breach of contract, negligent misrepresentation, and constructive fraud. Despite the town's assertion that legal theories and conclusory language in the complaint formed the basis for coverage, the basis for coverage is the acts giving rise to the complaint, and in this case the actions of the mayor were all grounded in contract and thus fell within the policy exclusions, so the insurer had no duty to defend. Additionally, the company's constructive fraud complaint failed to state fraudulent circumstances with particularity and thus was inadequately pleaded, so the insurer had no duty to defend the claim. Geraldine v. Mont. Municipal Ins. Authority, 2008 MT 411, 347 M 267, 198 P3d 796 (2008).

Claim Outside Policy Coverage — No Duty to Defend: The Twites, who built housing complexes, were sued for failure to construct a housing complex in conformity with state and federal requirements to provide equal use and access for persons with disabilities. The Twites had a commercial insurance policy that required the insurer to defend the Twites against lawsuits alleging bodily injury resulting from accidents. The insurer determined that the claim against the Twites did not involve an injury and refused to defend, so the Twites brought a state action to require the insurer to defend. The District Court examined the policy, found no duty to defend, and granted summary judgment for the insurer, so the Twites appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Liberally construing the policy in favor of finding an obligation to defend, the court nevertheless found that the policy covered only bodily injury caused by an accident, and here no accident occurred. The claim unequivocally fell outside the policy's coverage, so there was nothing for a court to construe and no reason to impose a duty to defend. The Twites failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact, and summary judgment for the insurer was affirmed. Twite Family Partnership v. Unitrin Multi Line Ins., 2008 MT 310, 346 M 42, 192 P3d 1156 (2008).

No Duty of Insurer to Defend for Damages Not Covered in Policy — Summary Judgment Proper: Rumph's insurance policy covered vehicle accidents resulting from garage operations. The insurer denied coverage for damages resulting from an accident in which Rumph's son drove the insured vehicle home after a party. The District Court granted summary judgment to the insurer because the accident was not incidental to garage operations and thus was not covered by the policy. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the insurer was not estopped from denying coverage and had no duty to defend when no reference in the complaint was made to anything remotely necessary or incidental to the garage business and that coverage unequivocally did not apply. No material facts precluded summary judgment, and because the accident was not covered, the insurer was not liable for breach of contract or unfair claims and settlement practices. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rumph, 2007 MT 249, 339 M 251, 170 P3d 934 (2007), followed in Geraldine v. Mont. Municipal Ins. Authority, 2008 MT 411, 347 M 267, 198 P3d 796 (2008).

Policy Limiting Coverage to Accidents Not Applicable to Damage From Intentional Act — No Duty of Insurer to Defend: Blair was sued by his subdivision's architectural control committee for violating a residential covenant by removing and selling gravel from Blair's subdivision property. Blair sought coverage from defendant insurer. The insurer declined coverage and declined to defend Blair in the suit because the policy covered only bodily and property injuries caused by an accident, so Blair sued the insurer. The District Court granted summary judgment to the insurer, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although an insurer has a duty to defend an insured when a complaint alleges facts representing a risk covered by the terms of a policy, in this case Blair deliberately moved gravel on his property, which unequivocally was not an accident, so coverage under Blair's policy did not apply and the insurer had no duty to defend. Blair v. Mid-Continent Cas. Co., 2007 MT 208, 339 M 8, 167 P3d 888 (2007), distinguishing NW. Nat'l Cas. Co. v. Phalen, 182 M 448, 597 P2d 720 (1979), and Lindsay Drilling v. USF&G, 208 M 91, 676 P2d 203 (1984), and followed in Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rumph, 2007 MT 249, 339 M 251, 170 P3d 934 (2007). See also Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Liss, 2000 MT 380, 303 M 519, 16 P3d 399 (2000), and Staples v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 108, 321 M 99, 90 P3d 381 (2004).

Improper Resolution of Disputed Issues of Material Fact Once Insurer's Duty to Defend Established — Reversible Error: A driver was injured when his vehicle struck a horse and filed a claim against Staples, who was allegedly pasturing the horse just prior to the accident. Staples then filed a third-party complaint against the horse owners, claiming that as the horse's custodian, he was an additional insured under the insurance policy of one owner and was entitled to a defense. Defendant insurer unilaterally decided that its insured was not the horse's owner and sought a declaration that it had no duty to defend or provide coverage to Staples. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court found that Staples might be an insured under the policy and that defendant had a duty to defend Staples, but then went on to conclude that because the policyholder did not own the horse at the time of the accident, Staples was not a third-party insured. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to the insurer. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Having correctly determined that the insurer had a duty to defend, the District Court should have ended the analysis and concluded that because the insurer breached that duty, it was estopped from denying coverage and that Staples was entitled to coverage. It was error for the District Court to then proceed to resolve disputed issues of fact in ruling on the summary judgment motion in favor of the insurer. Staples v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 108, 321 M 99, 90 P3d 381 (2004), following Independent Milk & Cream Co. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 68 M 152, 216 P 1109 (1923), Graber v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Contractual Indemnity Clear — Costs and Attorney Fees for Defending Suit: A contract's indemnity provision stated that contractor indemnified client for costs and reasonable attorney fees arising in whole or in part from contractor's negligence and that client indemnified contractor for costs and reasonable attorney fees arising solely from client's negligence. In a suit against both of them, client's request that the contractor defend was refused. Client defended, and contractor was ordered to pay client's costs and reasonable attorney fees. For purposes of appeal, contractor admitted it was at least partially negligent. Contractor's claim that client was not indemnified for client's negligence was denied. If both were negligent or if contractor was solely negligent, client was entitled to recover its costs and reasonable attorney fees under the indemnity agreement. Amazi v. Atl. Right to Indemnity for Costs and Attorney Fees Incurred in Proving Right to Indemnity: A provision that contractor indemnified client, including indemnity for costs, attorney fees, judgments, settlements, and other similar or dissimilar related expenses, was merely one provision in a contract to perform geophysical exploration. Because client was not expressly indemnified for establishing the right to indemnification, client was not entitled to be indemnified for costs and attorney fees client incurred in proving client's right to indemnity under the contract. Burden of Proof:

In an action on an indemnity policy, the burden is upon the insurer to rebut the presumption provided for by this section, that if after request the insurer neglects to defend the person indemnified, a recovery against the latter suffered by him in good faith is conclusive in his favor against the insurer. Independent Milk & Cream Co. v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 68 M 152, 216 P 1109

(1923), followed in Lee v. USAA Cas. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 54, 320 M 174, 86 P3d 562 (2004). See also Grindheim v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America, 908 F. Supp. 794 (D.C. Mont. 1995).

The burden is on the indemnifying person in a suit on the contract of indemnity to rebut the presumption raised by this section. Butte v. Cook, 29 M 88, 74 P 67 (1903).

Cosurety's Signature as Condition: When the names of two sureties appear in the body of an indemnifying bond, which is however signed by but one, the condition of the bond is notice to the obligee, so as to permit the defense, by the surety signing, that his liability was conditioned on obtaining the signature of his cosurety. Determination in First Proceeding Binding Upon Second: Where the driver and manufacturer of an automobile which overturned, killing the passenger, were first found jointly liable for damages for the passenger's death, and the driver's insurer thereafter instituted a second action against the manufacturer in which it sought indemnity for amounts paid to satisfy the judgment against the driver and the costs incurred in defending the first suit, the jury finding in the first suit that the driver had been grossly negligent was binding in the second action under the doctrine of res judicata and precluded the insurer from receiving indemnity from the manufacturer. Auto. Club Ins. Co. v. Toyota Motor Sales, Inc., 166 M 221, 531 P2d 1337 (1975).

Cosurety's Signature as Condition: Where the names of two sureties appear in the body of an indemnifying bond, which is however signed by but one, the condition of the bond is notice to the obligee, so as to permit the defense, by the surety signing, that his liability was conditioned on obtaining the signature of his cosurety. Setoffs Allowed Against Principal Also Allowed Against Surety: Where the surety of the principal, a subcontractor, was found by the court to be equitably liable for all the obligations of the principal, including a judgment against the principal in favor of another plaintiff in the same case, the Supreme Court held that the surety was subject to the same setoffs of its claim against a third-party defendant as the surety's principal was subject to. The Supreme Court based its holding upon a transfer by the principal of all its assets to the surety and the surety's ultimate responsibility to pay the judgment to the original plaintiff. Pioneer Concrete & Fuel, Inc. v. Apex Constr., Inc., 204 M 387, 664 P2d 938, 40 St. Rep. 956 (1983).

Statutory Requirement for at Least Two Sureties for Filing Valid Undertaking Not Met When One of Two Sureties Is Person Acting as Own Surety: Following a Justice's Court award of attorney fees and costs against Miller in a lease action, Miller filed an appeal and an undertaking in District Court. Under 25-33-201, two or more sureties are required to validate an undertaking. As defined in this section, a surety is one who becomes responsible for performance by another or hypothecates property as security for another; so by definition, a person may not act as surety for oneself. The undertaking in this case listed only Miller and another person as sureties. Therefore, the undertaking did not meet the requirement for two or more sureties and was deficient. The District Court did not have jurisdiction to consider the appeal because the undertaking was invalid, and the appeal was properly dismissed. Miller's contention that the provisions of 25-33-205 worked as an alternative to filing the undertaking on appeal also failed because there was no money that could be considered as a deposit filed within 10 days after notice of appeal. Red Lodging v. Miller, 2001 MT 135, 305 M 477, 29 P3d 477 (2001). See also Adams v. Crismore, 211 M 245, 683 P2d 497 (1984).

Clear Language of Surety Agreement Binds Surety — Impairment of Collateral: Plaintiff contended that he was entitled to discharge from his surety agreement under Montana statutes on the remedies and rights of a surety. He claimed that the creditor bank's unconsented release of collateral, which exposed plaintiff to increased liability, discharged him from the surety agreement. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff is not entitled to be discharged as an original obligor because the clear language of the surety agreement makes him liable and allows the creditor bank to realize on any collateral it held without obtaining plaintiff's consent. Mont. Bank of Livingston v. Old Saloon, Inc., 235 M 244, 766 P2d 878, 45 St. Rep. 2354 (1988).

Guaranty for Repayment of Money Loaned: A guaranty for repayment of money loaned was not a suretyship within the meaning of this section. Stensvad v. Miners and Merchants Bank of Roundup, 183 M 160, 598 P2d 1083 (1979).

Pledging Property as Surety for Obligation of Another — Pledgor a Surety: The owner of property who pledges it as security for the obligation of another person becomes a surety, and as such is discharged from liability when the creditor, without the pledgor's consent, alters the terms of the original obligation or in anywise impairs or suspends any remedies he may have against the principal. Vinson v. Pelletier, 78 M 254, 255 P 1067 (1927).

When Negotiable Instruments Act Supersedes the Law of Suretyship: The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act supersedes the law of suretyship (31-4-401 to 31-4-507) as theretofore applicable to negotiable instruments; therefore one who signed a note as maker bound himself absolutely to pay, though in fact but an accommodation maker, and could not escape liability to a holder in due course under a plea of having been a surety only. Merchants' Nat'l Bank v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523 (1921).

Distinction Between Surety and Guarantor: The codes preserve the general distinction between suretyship and guaranty, which is that a surety is bound with the principal as an original promisor on the same contract, while the guarantor makes his own separate contract. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Morton, 24 M 58, 60 P 587 (1900).

Surety in General: When part of an agreement creating an agency was a bond executed to plaintiff by the agent and the defendants, conditioned that if the agent failed to perform his duties and pay over to the plaintiff such sums as might be due him the defendants would pay such sum, the defendants were sureties within the meaning of this section. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Morton, 24 M 58, 60 P 587 (1900).

Vehicle Purchase Contract: In an action between the original parties to a contract, it is competent to show that the purchaser of an automobile was the principal and each of the other defendants a surety only. Stanhope v. Shambow, 54 M 360, 170 P 752 (1918).

Clear Breach of Bond: Though sureties are in a sense favorites in the law, such rule does not prevent a recovery when the facts are sufficient to show that the provisions of a bond given by them have been breached. Roper v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 98 M 76, 37 P2d 812 (1934).

Bond and Contract Together: In determining the liability of a surety, the courts must first determine the liability of the principal. In so doing, the court had to construe the contract entered by the principal and the bond together. The provision covering all damages from failure to perform did not include attorney fees, however. Fed. Sur. Co. v. Basin Constr. Co., 91 M 114, 5 P2d 775 (1931). See also Gary Hay & Grain Co. v. Carlson, 79 M 111, 255 P 722 (1927).

Contract Controls: The liability of a surety is controlled and governed by the contract and may not be extended to cover matters outside the contract. The surety was not liable for the sheriff's wrongful conversion of attached property, as that action was beyond the scope of the official bond. McGinley v. Md. Cas. Co., 85 M 1, 277 P 414 (1929).

Construction Against Surety: Surety bonds are regarded as contracts of insurance and are therefore construed most strongly against the party creating the document. The contract is construed against the surety and in favor of the indemnity that the obligee has reasonable grounds to expect. St. v. Am. Sur. Co. of N.Y., 78 M 504, 255 P 1063 (1927).

Official Bond: When the law defines the duties of a public officer, his sureties are responsible for the faithful performance of such duties only and not for acts not pertaining thereto. Butte v. Bennetts, 51 M 27, 149 P 92 (1915).

Failure of Principal to Sign: The surety on an official bond, joint and several in nature, is not released from liability because of the failure of the principal to sign the bond. Deer Lodge County v. USF&G Co., 42 M 315, 112 P 1060 (1910).

Stay of Execution Bond: Stay of execution being a consideration of great value, sureties who execute an undertaking therefor have a right to rely upon the letter of their bond and to stand upon the entirety of the expressed consideration therein, and their liability cannot be extended by implication. State ex rel. Reins v. District Court, 22 M 449, 57 P 89 (1899).

Guarantor Not Liable Until Intervening Act Occurs: Plaintiff stockholders' damage claims against a bank for fraud and negligent misrepresentation because of the bank's failure to monitor for misuse and misappropriation of corporate funds were speculative and premature because the bank had not instituted a collection or foreclosure action. A guarantor does not become liable until an intervening act occurs, such as a default of the original borrower. Kondelik v. First Fidelity Bank of Glendive, 259 M 446, 857 P2d 687, 50 St. Rep. 874 (1993).

Tort by Surety in Violation of Insurance Code — Liability Not Limited: This section does not limit the liability of a surety if the surety commits an independent tort in violation of provisions of the insurance code. K-W Indus. v. Nat'l Surety Corp., 231 M 461, 754 P2d 502, 45 St. Rep. 762 (1988).

Subcontractor's Surety Not Liable to Materialman — No Third-Party Provision in Bond: Where the defendant, surety on two bonds for a subcontractor, executed bonds providing for the indemnification of the general contractor against all losses sustained by the general contractor because of the subcontractor's failure to pay for labor and materials and was sued by a third-party materialman, the District Court did not err in holding that the defendant had no contractual obligation to indemnify that materialman as a creditor of the subcontractor. Under the rationale of Treasure St. Indus., Inc. v. Welch, 173 M 403, 567 P2d 947 (1977), the surety is not liable to third-party creditors of its principal unless the bond between surety and principal expressly so provides. Absent any such express agreement, a materialman like the plaintiff has no right of action to recover as a matter of contract law under the bonds. Pioneer Concrete & Fuel, Inc. v. Apex Constr., Inc., 204 M 387, 664 P2d 938, 40 St. Rep. 956 (1983).

Transfer of Principal's Assets to Surety — Equitable Duty of Surety to Pay Principal's Obligations: Where the defendant surety company entered into an agreement with its principal requiring the principal to reimburse the defendant for any costs incurred in the bonding of the principal, received assets from its principal that made it impossible for the principal to pay a judgment, and represented the interest of the principal in litigation, the Supreme Court upheld on equitable grounds a District Court judgment against the surety for the obligations of its principal. Even though there was no contractual liability for the surety to pay the precise kind of debts incurred by the principal, the evidence showed an intent that all the principal's obligations be paid by the defendant. Pioneer Concrete & Fuel, Inc. v. Apex Constr., Inc., 204 M 387, 664 P2d 938, 40 St. Rep. 956 (1983).

Bond Controls: A surety is entitled to stand upon the precise terms of its contract. Where the bond is limited to the duties of the principal, it cannot be extended. There cannot always be a recovery against the surety where there is recovery against the principal. The surety may assert nonliability under the terms of the bond. Swanberg v. Nat'l Sur. Co., 86 M 340, 283 P 761 (1930).

Official Bond: Where the law defines the duties of a public officer, his sureties are responsible for the faithful performance of such duties only, and not for acts not pertaining thereto; under this rule an action did not lie against the sureties on a County Assessor's bond to recover money improperly paid to him as compensation for the collection by him of certain city taxes, which is a duty imposed by law upon other officers. Butte v. Bennetts, 51 M 27, 149 P 92 (1915).

Stay of Execution Bond: Stay of execution being a consideration of great value, sureties who execute an undertaking therefor have a right to rely upon the letter of their bond, and to stand upon the entirety of the expressed consideration therein, and their liability cannot be extended by implication. This principle is formulated in this section and the next succeeding section. State ex rel. Reins v. District Court, 22 M 449, 57 P 89 (1899).

Case Notes

No Impairment of Collateral Used to Secure Loan — No Exoneration of Surety: Plaintiff read and signed a promissory note to secure a small business loan for a friend who subsequently went bankrupt. The promissory note provided that plaintiff would secure the friend's loan with logging equipment that plaintiff had used to secure his loan. After defendant bank foreclosed on the logging equipment, plaintiff claimed that the bank improperly impaired the collateral and improperly subordinated plaintiff's loan to his friend's loan without plaintiff's knowledge, thereby relieving plaintiff, as surety, of the obligation to repay the loan. The bank contended that plaintiff was fully informed of the loan structure and the requirement that plaintiff's loan was junior to the friend's small business loan. The trial court weighed the conflicting evidence and agreed that the bank had explained to plaintiff that proceeds from the sale of the collateral would be applied to the small business loan first and that plaintiff's loan was structured to limit plaintiff's potential exposure while ensuring that plaintiff would not have to provide cash up front to help the friend secure the small business loan. On appeal, the Supreme Court declined to second-guess the trial court's findings regarding the conflicting testimony, and the trial court was affirmed. Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 M 169, 142 P3d 797 (2006).

Clear Language of Surety Agreement Binds Surety — Impairment of Collateral: Plaintiff contended that he was entitled to discharge from his surety agreement under Montana statutes on the remedies and rights of a surety. He claimed that the creditor bank's unconsented release of collateral, which exposed plaintiff to increased liability, discharged him from the surety agreement. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff is not entitled to be discharged as an original obligor because the clear language of the surety agreement makes him liable and allows the creditor bank to realize on any collateral it held without obtaining plaintiff's consent. Mont. Bank of Livingston v. Old Saloon, Inc., 235 M 244, 766 P2d 878, 45 St. Rep. 2354 (1988).

Exoneration by Death of Surety: Where deceased had previously cosigned a promissory note for the purpose of lending his name to another party, he became an accommodation maker. As such he is primarily responsible for the payment of the note, without necessity of resort to the principal, and it was error for the District Court to disallow the holder's claim against the deceased's estate. In re Estate of Harbaugh, 196 M 274, 639 P2d 495, 39 St. Rep. 84 (1982).

Impairment of Remedies or Rights: A surety is discharged when his remedies or rights are impaired by an act of the creditor. U.S. v. Helena Office Supply Co., 256 F. Supp. 53 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

Prejudice of Surety Required for Release: This section and 31-4-502 relieve a surety in cases of omission or neglect, but only after a request by the surety that the creditor proceed. U.S. v. Helena Office Supply Co., 256 F. Supp. 53 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

Rescission of Contract by Creditor: When vendees of real estate abandoned premises with the knowledge of vendors, who repossessed by permitting another party to occupy and served a notice of cancellation of the contract for sale upon vendees, vendors, by such rescission of contract, lost their right to bring action against vendees' guarantor for unpaid purchase price. Scott v. Kyhl, 141 M 523, 379 P2d 803 (1963).

Effect of Impossibility of Performance of Contract by Principal: In holding a contract void because the impossibility preventing performance was due to the nature of the thing the contracting company undertook to do, the contractor was entitled to a recovery on the quantum meruit; his bond did not permit recovery of damages; a collateral promise in the contract consisting of warranty was invalid and would not support action for breach of warranty, and contractor's lien was supported by the implied contract. Smith Eng'r Co. v. Rice, 102 F2d 492 (9th Cir. 1958).

Release of Sureties in General:

When a creditor bank in an action against the receiver of an insolvent debtor bank compromised its claim against the latter thereon, thus discharging its obligation and suspending its rights and remedies against the principal, without the consent of the sureties, they were exonerated. First Nat'l Bank v. Holding, 90 M 529, 4 P2d 709 (1931).

The surety on an undertaking to secure the release of property from attachment enters into the obligation with reference to the cause as it then stands; and if the plaintiff in the action in which the attachment was levied, without the consent of the surety, subsequently changes his pleading so as to state another and different cause of action, it is such a change as will work a release of the surety. Gilna v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 83 M 231, 272 P 540 (1928).

Crystallization of Common Law: Section 28-11-414, providing that a surety has all the rights of a guarantor, and 28-11-211 and this section, declaring when a surety and a guarantor are exonerated, are but crystallizations of common-law principles, and therefore common-law rules must be followed in their interpretation unless otherwise provided by statute. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Burns, 90 M 402, 4 P2d 703 (1931).

Prejudice by Release of Other Surety: In an action on the official bond of a Sheriff to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of attached property, defendant surety company was not prejudiced by release of other sureties and therefore their release did not result in its exoneration to the extent of the alleged prejudice. McGinley v. Maryland Cas. Co., 85 M 1, 277 P 414 (1929).

Release of Surety Special Defense — Must Be Pleaded: Release of a surety is a special defense which must be pleaded; hence when it was not pleaded, refusal to permit defendant sureties to ask a witness for plaintiff whether plaintiff had not accepted a receiver's certificate in partial satisfaction of the obligation sued on, in an effort to establish that defense, was proper. Mut. Oil Co. v. Hamilton, 73 M 385, 236 P 545 (1925).

Negotiable Instruments: The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act supersedes the law of suretyship (31-4-401 to 31-4-507) as theretofore applicable to negotiable instruments; therefore, one who signed a note as maker bound himself absolutely to pay, though in fact but an accommodation maker, and could not escape liability to a holder in due course under a plea of having been a surety only. Merchants' Nat'l Bank v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523 (1921).

Premature Payments to Principal: A surety is not released by premature payments to his principal, whereby the surety could not be injured. Nat'l Sur. Co. v. Lincoln County, 238 F 705 (9th Cir. 1917), affirming Lincoln County v. Coast Bridge Co., 231 F 468 (1916).

When Assignment Exonerates Surety: A contract in its nature unassignable by one of the parties without the consent of the other and to which a bond was attached guaranteeing faithful performance by the latter was further incapable of assignment without the consent of the sureties. Standard Sewing Mach. Co. v. Smith, 51 M 245, 152 P 38 (1915).

Estoppel of Sureties by Implied Assent: When endorsers on a note knew of, and impliedly gave their assent to, sales of livestock mortgaged to secure it, they were estopped, on the theory that their liability was that of sureties only. Columbus St. Bank v. Erb, 50 M 442, 147 P 617 (1915).

Prejudice of Surety Required for Release: When a lease of real property provided that rent should be paid quarterly in advance, a bond being given to secure the payment of the rent, and the lessor voluntarily, and without consideration therefor, reduced the rent for one quarter, and at different times permitted the lessee to make payments at irregular intervals, and not as provided in the lease, the sureties on the bond were not released from liability under this section. Dodd v. Vucovich, 38 M 188, 99 P 296 (1909). See Nat'l Sur. Co. v. Lincoln County, 238 F 705 (9th Cir. 1917).

Contractual Waiver of Exoneration of Suretyship: Beginning in 1983, a corporation borrowed from and subsequently repaid money to a bank over a 3-year period, with defendant listed as surety and guarantor. In 1986, the corporation borrowed $293,000 more from the bank, but no surety or guaranty documents were executed contemporaneously with the loan. The corporation defaulted on the 1986 loan. Defendant contended that each surety was attached to a specific note and should be exonerated as a matter of law when each note was repaid and that because no surety agreement was executed on the 1986 loan, he was not personally responsible for the corporate default. However, earlier surety and guaranty agreements signed by defendant stated that no payments made upon borrower's indebtedness would discharge surety's obligation "for any and all remaining and succeeding indebtedness of Borrower to Bank". This constituted a valid express waiver of defendant's right to exoneration and a waiver of exoneration as a statutory defense available to him as a surety. It was proper for the District Court to rule that the surety and guaranty documents signed by defendant were in effect at the time of corporate default. Mont. Bank of Circle v. Ralph Meyers & Son, Inc., 236 M 236, 769 P2d 1208, 46 St. Rep. 324 (1989).

Withholding Distribution of Estate: Under this section an administratrix with the will annexed must withhold from the distributive share of a former executor (who was also a beneficiary under the will) any money for which such former executor became indebted to the estate during his administration thereof, when required by the surety of such former executor to do so, otherwise the surety will be exonerated to the extent that the distributive share will cover the indebtedness, since the surety as well as the estate of the former executor is liable for the indebtedness. Maryland Cas. Co. v. Walsh, 116 M 559, 155 P2d 759 (1945).

Agreement of Principal to Reimburse Surety — When Material: Since the principal is bound under this section to reimburse the surety for what he has disbursed, an agreement of principal to do so when applying for the bond becomes material only if it entitles the surety to indemnity without any part of the principal obligation having been satisfied. Maryland Cas. Co. v. Walsh, 116 M 559, 155 P2d 759 (1945).

Equitable Assignments — Procedure to Determine Heirship: Neither statutory nor contractual liability constitutes equitable assignment of principal's property; nor does plaintiff's claim have priority over all other claims. Maryland Cas. Co. v. Walsh, 116 M 559, 155 P2d 759 (1945).

Implied Contract of Cosureties to Contribute:

When one of several sureties is compelled to pay the principal debtor's obligation, the law implies a contract on the part of his cosureties to contribute their share, and such implied contract is one for the direct payment of money, warranting the issuance of a Writ of Attachment. Kipp v. Paul, 110 M 513, 103 P2d 675 (1940).

An action by a surety for contribution from his cosurety is one on an implied contract for money paid by the former for the use and benefit of the latter, which the latter unconditionally and absolutely is required to pay. Wall v. Brookman, 72 M 228, 232 P 774 (1925).

Judgment Against Surety Not Required: While it is the law that unless a surety is legally bound to make payment on behalf of his principal he is not entitled to reimbursement, and if he makes payment he is a volunteer-payer, it is not the law that he is legally bound only after judicial determination; if he can prove that he was legally bound to pay, he can recover in an action for reimbursement, under attachment. Kipp v. Paul, 110 M 513, 103 P2d 675 (1940).

Accommodation Paper: The relations between parties to accommodation paper are those of principal and surety and therefore the right of the accommodation party to recourse against the party accommodated is that of a surety against the principal debtor. Bielenberg v. Higgins, 85 M 69, 277 P 636 (1929).

Depository Bond Surety: When deposits of state funds are secured by a bond and the surety is compelled to pay the amount thereof upon failure of the bank, the right of the state passes by subrogation to the surety. Aetna Accident & Liab. Co. v. Miller, 54 M 377, 170 P 760 (1918).

Payment by Surety Not to Relieve Cosureties: A judgment against a principal and sureties was paid by one of the sureties who took an assignment of it to compel contribution from his cosureties. The judgment was at the request of the paying surety, satisfied of record to relieve the real estate of the paying surety from the lien. It was intended to have the record satisfied only as to the paying surety. Such satisfaction did not release the liability for contribution of the cosureties who paid no consideration for it. Merchants' Nat'l Bank v. Great Falls Opera House Co., 23 M 33, 57 P 445 (1899).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Clear Language of Surety Agreement Binds Surety — Impairment of Collateral: Plaintiff contended that he was entitled to discharge from his surety agreement under Montana statutes on the remedies and rights of a surety. He claimed that the creditor bank's unconsented release of collateral, which exposed plaintiff to increased liability, discharged him from the surety agreement. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff is not entitled to be discharged as an original obligor because the clear language of the surety agreement makes him liable and allows the creditor bank to realize on any collateral it held without obtaining plaintiff's consent. Mont. Bank of Livingston v. Old Saloon, Inc., 235 M 244, 766 P2d 878, 45 St. Rep. 2354 (1988).

Assignment as Chattel Mortgage: When a road construction contractor in his application for a surety company bond to secure the performance of his contract assigns his tools, equipment, etc., to the surety, the assignment to become of full force and effect upon his failure or inability to complete the work, the application constitutes a chattel mortgage upon the property as between him and the surety. Brown v. Fed. Sur. Co., 91 M 389, 8 P2d 647 (1932).

Surety's Rights as Against Assignee: Under 28-11-416 and this section, the surety on a bond of a road contractor given the State Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) pursuant to section 32-1608, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), acquired an equity in the earnings of the contractor remaining in the hands of the Commission, superior to that of a bank to which the contractor had made an assignment of money due him under the contract as security for loans extended, and was entitled to have the funds retained by the Commission applied in satisfaction of labor and material claims, payment of which was secured by the bond, before any portion of it was paid to the assignee. Lanstrum v. Zumwalt, 73 M 502, 237 P 205 (1925).

28-11-419. Creditor entitled to benefit of security held by surety.

Case Notes

Security Provided by Stranger: In an action to recover on an appeal bond, when it appeared that a stranger to the original action had deposited in bank a sum of money to indemnify the sureties on the bond, the principle of subrogation embodied in this section may not be invoked by the creditor. O'Neill v. St. Sav. Bank, 34 M 521, 87 P 970 (1906).

UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE

PREFATORY NOTE

I. Introduction

From its inception, the Article 1 Drafting Committee performed two related, but distinct, tasks - revision of the current text of Uniform Commercial Code Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] and harmonization of ongoing UCC projects. This draft represents the product of one of those tasks - revision of the provisions of Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. The other task entailed the Drafting Committee serving as a harmonization committee for the purpose of seeking to insure that the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] speaks with a single voice to the extent appropriate.

After lengthy analysis and discussion, the Drafting Committee decided to recommend a relatively small number of substantive changes to the law as it is currently set forth in Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. Those changes, concerning scope of the Article, applicability of supplemental principles of law, the concept of good faith, choice of law, the relevance of course of performance between the parties, and the existence of an independent statute of frauds, are described in some detail in Part II below. The changes with respect to choice of law are probably the most important changes in this draft and were the subject of more extensive Drafting Committee analysis and deliberation than any other topic.

In addition to these substantive changes, the Drafting Committee decided to make some structural changes to Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. These structural changes, intended to make this Article more closely fit with the drafting conventions of the more recently addressed Articles and to lessen some difficulties in interpretation, are described in Part III below. Other than these structural changes, the Drafting Committee generally decided to resist the temptation to make non-substantive changes to provisions that have not been a source of serious problems in the nearly four decades since the widespread enactment of the UCC. A few such changes should be noted, however. First, as in all of the other UCC Articles promulgated in the last decade, provisions have been reformulated in a gender-neutral fashion. Second, in a very small number of cases, minor changes in wording have been made when the current wording has proven confusing. Those changes are noted in the Preliminary Comments following each section but are not otherwise described in this Prefatory Note.

II. Substantive Issues

The following are significant substantive issues raised by changes from current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1], in the order of their appearance in the draft:

A. Scope

Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] contains a relatively small number of substantive rules, but those rules are of fundamental importance. Occasionally courts and commentators have expressed uncertainty as to which transactions are governed by the substantive rules. Section 1-102 [30-1-101(4)] expresses a point that is implicit in current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] - namely, that the substantive rules in Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] apply only to transactions within the scope of the other Articles [Title 30, chapters 2 through 5, 7, 8, and 9A].

B. Applicability of Supplemental Principles of Law

This draft merges subsections (1) and (2) of current Section 1-102 [30-1-102(1) and (2), 2003 MCA] (concerning the underlying purposes and policies of the UCC) and current Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA] (concerning the applicability of supplemental principles of law) into a revised Section 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103, 2005 MCA]. The provisions have been combined in this section [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103, 2005 MCA] to reflect the interrelationship between the Code's purposes and policies and the extent to which other law is available to supplement it. Except for changing the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], subsection (b) of this section [30-1-103, 2005 MCA] is identical to current Section

1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA]. The Preliminary Comments to this section [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103, 2005 MCA], though, give more helpful guidance as to the distinction between situations in which Code provisions preempt the application of other law and those in which such supplementation is permissible.

C. Good Faith

Section 1-201(19) [sic] [30-1-201(2)(u), 2005 MCA] replaces the current definition of "good faith" ("honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned") with the definition adopted by all but one of the recently revised UCC Articles as well as drafts of Revised Articles 2 and 2A [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A]- "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." The section explicitly provides, however, that its definition of "good faith" does not displace the narrower definition in UCC Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. In addition to centralizing the developments already taking place in other Articles, the new definition resolves any ambiguity as to the proper definition to apply to the general duty of good faith imposed by Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1].

D. Choice of Law

Section 1-301 [30-1-301, 2005 MCA] represents a significant rethinking of choice of law issues addressed in current UCC Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA, now repealed]. The new section [30-1-301, 2005 MCA] reexamines both the power of parties to select the jurisdiction whose law will govern their transaction and the determination of the governing law in the absence of such selection by the parties. With respect to the power to select governing law, the draft affords greater party autonomy, but with important safeguards protecting consumer interests and fundamental policies. While the Drafting Committee considered also addressing the related topic of forum selection clauses, it ultimately decided that it was not workable for the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] to govern such clauses.

1. Contractual Designation of Governing Law

Revised UCC Section 1-301 [30-1-301, 2005 MCA] addresses contractual designation of governing law somewhat differently than does current Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA, now repealed]. Current law allows the parties to any transaction to designate a jurisdiction whose law governs if the transaction bears a "reasonable relation" to that jurisdiction. Revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2005 MCA] deviates from this unified approach by providing different rules for consumer transactions than for "business to business" transactions.

In the context of consumer transactions, revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2005 MCA], unlike current law, protects consumers against the possibility of losing the protection of consumer protection laws of their home jurisdiction.

In the context of business-to-business transactions, revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2005 MCA] generally provides the parties with greater autonomy to designate a jurisdiction whose law will govern than does current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2003 MCA], but also provides some safeguards against abuse that do not appear in current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2003 MCA]. Following emerging international norms, greater autonomy is provided in subsections (b) and (c) [30-1-301(1) and (2)] by deleting the requirement that the transaction bear a "reasonable relation" to the jurisdiction designated in this non-consumer context. It should be noted in this regard that in the case of wholly domestic transactions the jurisdiction designated must be a State. An important safeguard not present in current law is provided in subsection (e) [not adopted]. Subsection (e) [not adopted] indicates that the designation of a jurisdiction's law is not effective (even if the transaction bears a reasonable relation to that jurisdiction) to the extent that application of that law would be contrary to a fundamental policy of the jurisdiction whose law would govern in the absence of contractual designation. Application of the law designated may be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern either because of the nature of the law designated or because of the "mandatory" nature of the law that would otherwise apply.

2. Choice of Law in the Absence of Contractual Designation of Governing Law

In the absence of an effective contractual designation of governing law, current UCC Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105, 2003 MCA, now repealed] directs the forum to apply its own law if the transaction bears "an appropriate relation to this state." This provision, however, is frequently ignored by courts. Revised UCC Section 1-301(b) [30-1-301(1)] provides simply that, in the absence of contractual designation, the court should apply the forum's choice of law principles.

E. Course of Performance

Section 1-304 [30-1-203, MCA] adds the concept of "course of performance," currently utilized only in Articles 2 and 2A [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A], to course of dealing and usage of trade as the contextual clues that a court may use to interpret a contract.

F. Statute of Frauds

The Statute of Frauds "for kinds of personal property not otherwise covered" that appears in current Section 1-206 [30-1-206, 2003 MCA, now repealed] has been deleted. The Drafting Committee noted that the other Articles of the Uniform Commercial Code make individual determinations as to writing requirements for transactions within their scope, so that the only effect of Section 1-206 [30-1-206, 2003 MCA, now repealed] was to impose a writing requirement on transactions not otherwise governed by the UCC. The Drafting Committee decided that it is inappropriate for Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] to impose that requirement.

III. Structural Issues

A. General Organization

Current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2003 MCA] is divided into two parts. Part 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, part 1, 2003 MCA] is entitled "Short Title, Construction, Application and Subject Matter of Act." Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 1, part 2, 2003 MCA] is entitled "General Definitions and Principles of Interpretation." The rationale for placement of particular sections in one part or the other is occasionally obscure. This draft reorganizes Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2005 MCA] into three parts. Part 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, part 1, 2005 MCA] - "General Provisions" - contains general rules about the UCC as a whole. Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 1, part 2, 2005 MCA] - "General Definitions and Principles of Interpretation" - contains the Code's major definitional section as well as additional rules of interpretation. Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 1, part 3, 2005 MCA] - "Territorial Applicability and General Rules" - contains substantive rules that apply to all transactions that are within the scope of the Code.

B. Relocation of Substantive Rules Embedded in Definitions

The Drafting Committee identified four cases in which definitions in Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA] were made unnecessarily complicated by substantive rules embedded within them. Extracting those substantive rules and placing them in separate sections enables those rules to be presented more effectively and is more consistent with current drafting principles in many States.

1. Notice and knowledge

The rules concerning notice and knowledge have been moved from their current location in three subsections of Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA] to a separate substantive section. The Drafting Committee believes that, with this reorganization, the concepts are more clearly articulated and more easily found.

2. Distinguishing leases from security interests

In current Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2003 MCA], the definition of "security interest" consists of a short paragraph elucidating a basic principle that resolves almost every issue, followed by over 50 lines of clarification and qualification that serve only one function - distinguishing "true leases" from transactions that are leases in form but security interests in substance. This extended rule even contains a nested definition of the term "present value," which it uses as part of drawing the distinction between true leases and security interests. The portion of the definition of "security interest" that distinguishes true leases from security interests has been moved to a separate substantive section. As a result, the remaining portion of the definition of "security interest" is shorter and clearer. The definition of "present value" is moved to its own definitional subsection [not adopted].

3. Value

Whether a person acquires rights "for value" is at present the subject of a definitional provision in current Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44), 2003 MCA]. Yet, as the NCCUSL Committee on Style correctly noted to the Drafting Committee, the provision is more appropriately articulated as a free-standing rule. It has been moved to Section 1-204 [30-1-212, 2005 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: Subsection (b) [subsection (3)] is new. It is added in order to make the structure of Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] parallel with that of the other Articles of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 2 through 5, 7, 8, and 9A].

1. Each other Article of the Uniform Commercial Code (except Articles 10 and 11) may also be cited by its own short title. See Sections 2-101 [30-2-101], 2A-101 [30-2A-101], 3-101 [30-3-101], 4-101 [30-4-101], 4A-101 [30-4A-101], 5-101 [30-5-101], 6-101 [30-6-101, now repealed], 7-101 [30-7-101], 8-101 [30-8-101], and 9-101 [30-9A-101].

1. [2.] [Subsection (4) is new.] This section [1-102, UCC] [subsection (4)] is intended to resolve confusion that has occasionally arisen as to the applicability of the substantive rules in this article [Title 30, chapter 1]. As this section [subsection (4)] makes clear, the rules in article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] apply to transactions to the extent that those transactions are governed by one of the other articles of the Uniform Commercial Code. This article [Title 30, chapter 1] does not apply to transactions to the extent that they are governed by other law. See Preliminary Comment 1 to Section 1-301 [30-1-301].

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in catchline inserted "scope of chapter"; inserted (3) giving cite to chapter; inserted (4) relating to application of chapter; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Changes From Former Law: This section is derived from subsections (1) and (2) of former Section 1-102 [30-1-102(1), (2), and (5), 2003 MCA] and from former Section 1-103 [30-1-103]. Subsection (a) of this section [30-1-102(1), 2005 MCA] combines subsections (1) and (2) of former Section 1-102 [30-1-102(1) and (2), 2003 MCA]. Except for changing the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] and minor stylistic changes, its language is the same as subsections (1) and (2) of former Section 1-102 [30-1-102(1) and (2), 2003 MCA]. Except for changing the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], subsection (b) of this section [30-1-103, 2005 MCA] is identical to former Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA]. The provisions have been combined in this section [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103, 2005 MCA] to reflect the interrelationship between them.

1. The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] is drawn to provide flexibility so that, since it is intended to be a semi-permanent piece of legislation, it will provide its own machinery for expansion of commercial practices. It is intended to make it possible for the law embodied in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] to be developed by the courts in the light of unforeseen and new circumstances and practices. However, the proper construction of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] requires that its interpretation and application be limited to its reason.

Even prior to the enactment of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], courts were careful to keep broad acts from being hampered in their effects by later acts of limited scope. [Pacific Wool Growers v. Draper & Co., 158 Or. 1, 73 P.2d 1391 (1937), and] compare Section 1-104 [30-1-104]. The courts recognized the policies embodied in an act as applicable in reason to subject-matter that was not expressly included in the language of the act, [Commercial Nat. Bank of New Orleans v. Canal-Louisiana Bank & Trust Co., 239 U.S. 520, 36 S.Ct. 194, 60 L.Ed. 417 (1916) (bona fide purchase policy of Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act extended to case not covered but of equivalent nature)] and did the same where reason and policy so required, even where the subject-matter had been intentionally excluded from the act in general. [Agar v. Orda, 264 N.Y. 248, 190 N.E. 479 (1934) (Uniform Sales Act change in seller's remedies applied to contract for sale of choses in action even though the general coverage of that Act was intentionally limited to goods "other than things in action.")] They implemented a statutory policy with liberal and useful remedies not provided in the statutory text. They disregarded a statutory limitation of remedy where the reason of the limitation did not apply. [Fiterman v. J. N. Johnson & Co., 156 Minn. 201, 194 N.W. 399 (1923) (requirement of return of the goods as a condition to rescission for breach of warranty; also, partial rescission allowed).] Nothing in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] stands in the way of the continuance of such action by the courts.

The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] should be construed in accordance with its underlying purposes and policies. The text of each section should be read in the light of the purpose and policy of the rule or principle in question, as also of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] as a whole, and the application of the language should be construed narrowly or broadly, as the case may be, in conformity with the purposes and policies involved.

Other than minor stylistic changes, this section [subsection (2)] is identical to former UCC Section 1-102(5) [30-1-102(5), 2003 MCA].

1. [2.] This section [subsection (2)] makes it clear that the use of singular or plural in the text of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] is generally only a matter of drafting style - singular words may be applied in the plural, and plural words may be applied in the singular. Only when it is clear from the statutory context that the use of the singular or plural does not include the other is this rule inapplicable. See, e.g., Section 9-322 [30-9A-322].

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in catchline at end deleted "variation by agreement"; deleted former (3) and (4) that read: "(3) The effect of provisions of this code may be varied by agreement, except as otherwise provided in this code and except that the obligations of good faith, diligence, reasonableness and care prescribed by this code may not be disclaimed by agreement but the parties may by agreement determine the standards by which the performance of such obligations are to be measured if such standards are not manifestly unreasonable.

(4) The presence in certain provisions of this code of the words "unless otherwise agreed" or words of similar import does not imply that the effect of other provisions may not be varied by agreement under subsection (3)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Case Notes

Applicability of Discovery Doctrine to Uniform Commercial Code Conversion Cases: Over a 2 ½-year period, one of plaintiff's employees forged signatures on more than 100 company checks and money orders, made them payable to herself, and deposited the proceeds in her personal account at defendant credit union. Plaintiff ultimately filed an action against the credit union, seeking damages in the amount of the checks and money orders and alleging unlawful conversion of negotiable instruments under 30-3-419 and breach of transfer warranties under 30-4-207. The credit union moved for summary judgment on grounds that the conversion action was barred by the statutes of limitations in 30-3-417(4) and 30-4-207(5). However, the statutes of limitations in 30-3-417(4) and 30-4-207(5) apply only to breach of warranty actions, not to conversion actions. The credit union then asserted that the discovery doctrine should apply. The doctrine is an equitable exception to the general rule that the statute of limitations begins to run as soon as the cause of action accrues, allowing instead that the applicable statute of limitations begins to run once plaintiff knew or should have known that a cause of action existed. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to apply the discovery doctrine to the Uniform Commercial Code conversion claim. Conversion actions are subject to the statute of limitations in 30-3-122(7), which requires commencement of a conversion action within 3 years of the action's accrual. The public would be poorly served by a rule that shifts the responsibility for careful bookkeeping and employee supervision away from those in the best position to monitor accounts and employees. Although predictably harsh in some cases, the 3-year statute of limitations will be strictly applied as best serving the goals of the Uniform Commercial Code. The facts regarding the date of the conversion and the filing of plaintiff's complaint were not in dispute, so the credit union was entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the conversion claim. Yarbro, Ltd. v. Missoula Fed. Credit Union, 2002 MT 152, 310 M 346, 50 P3d 158 (2002).

30-1-103. Supplementary general principles of law applicable.

Source: Former Section 1-102 (1)-(2) [30-1-102(1), (2), and (5), 2003 MCA]; Former Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law:

2.[1.] Applicability of supplemental principles of law. Subsection (b) [of section 1-103, UCC] [30-1-103] states the basic relationship of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] to supplemental bodies of law. The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] was drafted against the backdrop of existing bodies of law, including the common law and equity, and relies on those bodies of law to supplement it provisions in many important ways. At the same time, the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] is the primary source of commercial law rules in areas that it governs, and its rules represent choices made by its drafters and the enacting legislatures about the appropriate policies to be furthered in the transactions it covers. Therefore, while principles of common law and equity may supplement provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], they may not be used to supplant its provisions, including the purposes and policies those provisions reflect, unless a specific provision of the Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] provides otherwise. In the absence of such a provision, the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] preempts principles of common law and equity that are inconsistent with either its provisions, or its purposes and policies.

The language of subsection (b) [of section 1-103, UCC] [30-1-103] is intended to reflect both the concept of supplementation and the concept of preemption. Some courts, however, had difficulty in applying the identical language of former Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA] to determine when other law appropriately may be applied to supplement the Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], and when that law has been displaced by the Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. Some decisions applied other law in situations in which that application, while not inconsistent with the text of any particular provision of the Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], clearly was inconsistent with the underlying purposes and policies reflected in the relevant Code provisions [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. See, e.g., Sheerbonnet, Ltd. v. American Express Bank, Ltd., 951 F. Supp. 403 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). In part, this difficulty arose from Comment 1 to former Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA], which stated that "this section indicates the continued applicability to commercial contracts of all supplemental bodies of law except insofar as they are explicitly displaced by this Act." The "explicitly displaced" language of that Comment does not accurately reflect the proper scope of Code preemption, which extends to displacement of other law that is inconsistent with its purposes and policies as well as its text.

3.[2.] Application of subsection (b) to statutes. The primary focus of Section 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103, 2005 MCA] is on the relationship between the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] and principles of common law and equity as developed by the courts. State law, however, increasingly is statutory. Not only are there a growing number of state statutes addressing specific issues that come within the scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], but in some States many general principles of common law and equity have been codified. When the other law relating to a matter within the scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] is a statute, the principles of subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA] remain relevant to the court's analysis of the relationship between that statute and the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], but will be supplemented by other principles of statutory interpretation that specifically address the interrelationship between statutes. In some situations, the principles of subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA] still will be determinative. For example, the mere fact that an equitable principle is stated in statutory form rather than in judicial decisions should not change the court's analysis of whether the principle can be used to supplement the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] - under subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA], equitable principles may supplement provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] only if they are consistent with the purposes and policies of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] as well as its text. In other situations, however, other interpretive principles addressing the interrelationship between statutes may lead the court to conclude that the other statute is controlling, even though it conflicts with the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. This, for example, would be the result in a situation where the other statute was specifically intended to provide additional protection to a class of individuals engaging in transactions covered by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A].

4.[3.] Listing not exclusive. The list of sources of supplemental law in subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA] is intended to be merely illustrative of the other law that may supplement the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], and is not exclusive. No listing could be exhaustive. Further, the fact that a particular section of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] makes express reference to other law is not intended to suggest the negation of the general application of the principles of subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA]. Note also that the word "bankruptcy" in subsection (b) [30-1-103, 2005 MCA], continuing the use of that word from former Section 1-103 [30-1-103, 2003 MCA], should be understood not as a specific reference to federal bankruptcy law but, rather as a reference to general principles of insolvency, whether under federal or state law.

Case Notes

Bank's Charge-Back Right Terminated Only on Final Settlement of Check — Estoppel Verdict Inapplicable to Bank's Right to Charge Back Provisional Settlement Funds From Defendant's Account — Fees and Costs: Shupak sold a car to a buyer in Germany for $7,400. The German sent Shupak a check for $11,500 and asked Shupak to send the $4,100 difference to a "shipper" in Belgium. Because of the unusual nature of the check and the misspelling of Shupak's name on the check, Shupak inquired with plaintiff credit union before cashing the check, and plaintiff authorized cashing the check. Shupak placed $4,000 in his account, made a loan payment on a vehicle, and mailed $4,100 to Belgium. The check was subsequently returned as counterfeit and plaintiff charged back Shupak's account for $11,500, leaving the account overdrawn and the vehicle loan past due. After unsuccessful attempts to repossess Shupak's vehicles, plaintiff eventually sued Shupak to recover the outstanding balance, which at that point was $8,185.97. Shupak raised several defenses, including estoppel, and countersued for negligence, malicious prosecution, breach of the duty of good faith under the Uniform Commercial Code, breach of fair debt collection practices, and fraud. The District Court concluded that plaintiff had a statutory right to charge back the money given Shupak for the fraudulent check and granted plaintiff partial summary judgment on that issue, but reserved judgment against Shupak until the jury could determine whether Shupak was entitled to offset the amount because of plaintiff's alleged negligent misrepresentations regarding the validity of the check. The jury ultimately found that plaintiff was 77.5% negligent and Shupak was 22.5% negligent, that the negligence had caused $5,000 in damages, and that plaintiff was estopped from enforcing the provisions of its membership and loan liner agreements, but Shupak's fraud and punitive damage claims were rejected. Shupak was awarded $3,874 for plaintiff's negligence, which was subtracted from the $8,185.97 owed to plaintiff by reason of the charge-back right, resulting in a net judgment to plaintiff of $4,310.97. Both parties then sought attorney fees and costs. Shupak was determined to be the prevailing party because he had prevailed on the negligence claim, despite plaintiff prevailing on the charge-back issue and receiving a net judgment, and Shupak was awarded fees and costs of $49,918.65, for a net judgment of $44,606.88 in Shupak's favor. Plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court, citing Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006), concluded that plaintiff's charge-back right terminated only upon final settlement of the check, and the right was not affected by Shupak's use of the provisional settlement funds or by plaintiff's failure to exercise ordinary care in handling the check for settlement purposes. Until a check becomes final, a bank may charge back provisional settlement funds to the customer, and the risk of loss remains with the customer, so the charge-back right may not be equitably estopped. Additionally, the District Court erred in awarding Shupak's attorney fees and costs. Plaintiff was entitled to that portion of its attorney fees and costs related to enforcement of its statutory charge-back right as a matter of law. Because plaintiff prevailed on the charge-back claim and received a net judgment, plaintiff was considered the prevailing party and the award of attorney fees and costs to Shupak was reversed. Avanta Fed. Credit Union v. Shupak, 2009 MT 458, 354 M 372, 223 P3d 863 (2009).

Bank to Exercise Ordinary Care in Settling Checks — Common Law That Bank Exercise Ordinary Care in Processing Checks Preempted by Uniform Commercial Code: Hughes brought common-law claims against a bank for failing to exercise ordinary care in processing checks and for communications that the bank made regarding check processing. A bank that receives a check from a depositor must use ordinary care, as defined in the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.), in settling those checks. However, when a check is processed by automated means, reasonable commercial standards do not require the bank to examine the check, subject to certain exceptions. To the extent that common-law claims relate to processing checks, the specific provisions of the U.C.C. prevail, so Hughes' claims regarding the propriety of the bank's check processing were preempted. However, because the U.C.C. does not address misrepresentation in communications, Hughes' common-law and equitable claims for negligence were not preempted by the U.C.C., and the District Court committed reversible error by failing to consider whether common-law and equitable principles supplement the U.C.C.-defined duty of ordinary care with respect to the bank's representations about the check settlement process. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006).

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. Daniels-Sheridan Fed. Credit Union v. Bellanger, 2001 MT 235, 307 M 22, 36 P3d 397 (2001), following Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163 (1982), and distinguishing NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 M 310, 678 P2d 1138 (1984), and Ninth District Prod. Credit Ass'n v. Ed Duggan, Inc., 821 P2d 788 (Colo. 1991).

Merchant Pawnbroker Held to Good Faith Requirement: Defendant pawnshop operator who sold stolen property to plaintiff refused to give plaintiff a refund after the property was recovered by police. Defendant argued that he disclaimed any warranty of title to goods sold in his business by posting a sign alerting buyers that merchandise is sold "as is" and by writing the same notation on his sales slips. Defendant clearly breached the warranty of clear title under 30-2-312 when he sold stolen goods because neither a thief nor his successor pass clear title to stolen goods. It was irrelevant that defendant claimed he did not know the goods were stolen. With respect to breach of warranty, defendant as a merchant is held to a higher standard of dealing than ordinary consumers. In addition, he is held to the obligatory good faith required in the performance of every contract under the U.C.C., which is defined under 30-1-201 as "honesty in fact". Brokke v. Williams, 235 M 305, 766 P2d 1311, 46 St. Rep. 6 (1989).

Montana Forum for Settlement of Noncontractual Issues: Defendant argued that New York law should apply to a breach of contract action because a document giving plaintiffs authority to install phone systems expressly adopted New York law. However, the Supreme Court held Montana law applicable upon finding that the installation agreement did not relate to plaintiff's claims for relief based on purchase of goods, hands-on training, return policy, and exclusive dealership. Further, the injury occurred in Montana, plaintiff resided and did business in Montana, defendant solicited sales in Montana, and defendant visited Montana to check on plaintiffs and to solicit another distributor. Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Cancellation of Promissory Notes — Erases Security Interest: In fashioning judgment in a case involving fraud and misrepresentation, the District Court awarded the bank all of plaintiff's property and canceled all of the promissory notes from plaintiffs to the bank. The bank contended this violated its rights as a secured creditor. It contended it was entitled to a variety of options in enforcing its security interest and could not be forced to satisfy its claim by taking possession of the property. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the award. By finding the bank guilty of fraud and misrepresentation, the trial court could properly cancel the promissory notes. Canceling the notes erased the bank's specific security interests. Having canceled the notes, the trial court, sitting in equity, had a great deal of leeway in fashioning a remedy. The remedy allowed the bank to mitigate its losses and was proper. Crystal Springs Trout Co. v. First State Bank of Froid, 225 M 122, 732 P2d 819, 44 St. Rep. 90 (1987).

Sale of Front-End Loader — Applicable Parol Evidence Rule: Front-end loader that buyer purchased from seller was within the definition of "goods" set out in 30-2-105. Therefore, the sale was governed by the Montana Uniform Commercial Code, and any Code provisions addressing a parol evidence question controlled the answer to the question, with the contract law parol evidence rule of 28-2-904 being used only to supplement the Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Estoppel to Prevent Application of Statute of Frauds: In a contract action brought by the plaintiff buyer of seed potatoes against the seller, in which the evidence showed that the defendant had never signed a written contract for the potatoes, but by his active and passive conduct induced the plaintiff to change his position by agreeing to sell the potatoes that were the subject of the contract to other buyers, the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff had proved the elements of estoppel by silence or equitable estoppel and that the defendant would therefore be estopped in applying the Statute of Frauds to the oral contract. NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 M 310, 678 P2d 1138, 41 St. Rep. 362 (1984), followed, with regard to elements of estoppel, in CB&F Dev. Corp. v. Culbertson St. Bank, 256 M 1, 844 P2d 5, 49 St. Rep. 1122 (1992).

Joint Payee Conversion Suit Against Bank — Collateral Estoppel: Without his wife's knowledge or consent, husband deposited two checks made out to him and his wife in payment for property they jointly owned and then withdrew the money. He converted it and divorced her. Wife sued the depositary and payee banks for conversion of the checks, since they were paid despite the absence of any endorsement by husband or wife. Since the issues in the divorce and conversion proceedings were not the same and the conversion proceeding issues were not determined in the divorce proceeding, collateral estoppel did not bar wife's suit. Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 207 M 248, 675 P2d 83, 40 St. Rep. 2015 (1983).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplements the Montana U.C.C. which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

30-1-104. Construction against implicit repeal.

Changes From Former Law: Except for changing the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], this section is identical to former UCC Section 1-104 [30-1-104, 2003 MCA].

1. This section embodies the policy that an act that bears evidence of carefully considered permanent regulative intention should not lightly be regarded as impliedly repealed by subsequent legislation. The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], carefully integrated and intended as a uniform codification of permanent character covering an entire "field" of law, is to be regarded as particularly resistant to implied repeal.

30-1-106. Remedies to be liberally administered.

Changes From Former Law: Other than changes in the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], this section is identical to former UCC Section 1-106 [30-1-106, 2003 MCA].

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is intended to effect three propositions. The first is to negate the possibility of unduly narrow or technical interpretation of remedial provisions by providing that the remedies in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] are to be liberally administered to the end stated in this section. The second is to make it clear that compensatory damages are limited to compensation. They do not include consequential or special damages, or penal damages; and the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] elsewhere makes it clear that damages must be minimized. Cf. Sections 1-203 [30-1-211], 2-706(1) [30-2-706(1)], and 2-712(2) [30-2-712(2)]. The third purpose of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is to reject any doctrine that damages must be calculable with mathematical accuracy. Compensatory damages are often at best approximate: they have to be proved with whatever definiteness and accuracy the facts permit, but no more. Cf. Section 2-204(3) [30-2-204(3)].

2. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], any right or obligation described in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] is enforceable by action, even though no remedy may be expressly provided, unless a particular provision specifies a different and limited effect. Whether specific performance or other equitable relief is available is determined not by this section but by specific provisions and by supplementary principles. Cf. Sections 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103], 2-716 [30-2-716].

3. "Consequential" or "special" damages and "penal" damages are not defined in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]; rather, these terms are used in the sense in which they are used outside the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A].

Case Notes

No Award of Attorney Fees Absent Statutory or Contract Provisions: Under 30-1-106, remedies under the U.C.C. shall be liberally administered to the end that the aggrieved party may be put in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed, but neither consequential, special, nor penal damages may be had except as specifically provided in the U.C.C. or by other rule of law. Although 30-2-714 allows recovery of incidental and consequential damages when accepted goods are in issue, the definitions of incidental and consequential damages contained in 30-2-715 do not include the award of attorney fees. In this case, the District Court awarded damages for delivery of nonconforming goods, plus attorney fees. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of damages but reversed the award of attorney fees as costs or damages absent any statutory or contract provisions, citing Martin v. Crown Life Ins. Co., 202 M 461, 658 P2d 1099 (1983). Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Contract for Scrap Metal — Resale After Breach — Measure of Damages: Where plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby defendant was to purchase crushed auto bodies from plaintiff and where defendant refused to accept approximately one-half of the bodies at the agreed price, the plaintiff was entitled to damages representing the difference in price between what he actually received for the auto bodies upon resale, after the defendant refused to accept them, and what he would have received had the defendant not breached the contract. The plaintiff was not required to resell the bodies to the defendant. Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. Pepper, 480 F. Supp. 1364 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

30-1-107. Waiver or renunciation of claim or right after breach.

Official Comment

Source: Former Section 1-107 [30-1-107, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: This section changes former law in two respects. First, former Section 1-107 [30-1-107, 2003 MCA], requiring the "delivery" of a "written waiver or renunciation" merges the separate concepts of the aggrieved party's agreement to forego rights and the manifestation of that agreement. This section separates those concepts, and explicitly requires agreement of the aggrieved party. Second, the revised section reflects developments in electronic commerce by providing for memorialization in an authenticated record.

1. This section makes consideration unnecessary to the effective renunciation or waiver of rights or claims arising out of an alleged breach of a commercial contract where the agreement effecting such renunciation is memorialized in a record authenticated by the aggrieved party. Its provisions, however, must be read in conjunction with the section imposing an obligation of good faith. (Section 1-304) [30-1-203].

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 at end substituted "by agreement of the aggrieved party in an authenticated record" for "by a written waiver or renunciation signed and delivered by the aggrieved party"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

30-1-201. General definitions.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 1-201, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: For this section, in 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revisions to Article 7.]

Source: Former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: In order to make it clear that all definitions in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] - not just those in Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] - do not apply if the context otherwise requires, a new subsection (a) [subsection (1)] to that effect has been added. The reference to the "context" is intended to refer to the context in which the defined term is used in the UCC [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. In other words, the definition applies whenever the defined term is used unless the context in which the defined term is used in the statute indicates that the term was not used in its defined sense. Consider, for example, UCC §3-103(a)(9) [30-3-102(1)(i)] (defining "promise," in relevant part, as "a written undertaking to pay money signed by the person undertaking to pay") and 3-303(a)(1) [30-3-303(1)(a)] (indicating that an instrument is issued or transferred for value if "the instrument is issued or transferred for a promise of performance, to the extent that the promise has been performed." It is clear from the statutory context of the use of the word "promise" in Section 3-303(a)(1) [30-3-303(1)(a)] that the term was not used in the sense of its definition in Section 3-103(a)(9) [30-3-102(1)(i)]. Thus, the Section 3-103(a)(9) [30-3-102(1)(i)] definition should not be used to give meaning to the word "promise" in Section 3-303(a) [30-3-303(1)]. The remainder of former Section 1-201 [30-1-201], as revised, now appears as subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

Other than minor stylistic changes, the definitions in this draft are as in former Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1, 2003 MCA] (as amended, most recently, in conjunction with revisions to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]) except as noted below. It should be noted that numbering of existing definitions has been left constant even though some new definitions have been added to this section and some others have been moved to other sections.

1. [subsection (2)(a)] "Action." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA], which was derived from similar definitions in Section 191, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law; Section 76, Uniform Sales Act; Section 58, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 53, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

2. [subsection (2)(b)] "Aggrieved party." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

3. [subsection (2)(c)] "Agreement." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. As used in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] the word is intended to include full recognition of usage of trade, course of dealing, course of performance and the surrounding circumstances as effective parts thereof, and of any agreement permitted under the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] to displace a stated rule of law. Whether an agreement has legal consequences is determined by applicable provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] and, to the extent provided in Section 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103], by the law of contracts.

3a. [subsection (2)(d)] "Authenticate." This is the standard definition of the term used in acts prepared by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

4. [subsection (2)(e)] "Bank." Derived from Section 4A-104 [sic] [30-4A-105].

5. [subsection (2)(f)] "Bearer". Unchanged, except in one respect, from former section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA], which was derived from Section 191, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law. The term bearer applies to negotiable documents of title and has been broadened to include a person in control of an electronic negotiable document of title. Control in the context of an electronic document of title is defined in Article 7 (Section 7-106) [Title 30, chapter 7 (30-7-107)].

6. [subsection (2)(g)] "Bill of Lading". Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The reference to, and definition of, an "airbill" has been deleted as no longer necessary. A bill of lading is one type of document of title as defined in subsection (16) [subsection (2)(q)]. This definition should be read in conjunction with the definition of carrier in Article 7 (Section 7-102) [Title 30, chapter 7 (30-7-102)].

7. [subsection (2)(h)] "Branch." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

8. [subsection (2)(i)] "Burden of establishing a fact." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

9. [subsection (2)(j)] "Buyer in ordinary course of business." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA] (as amended in conjunction with the 1999 revisions to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]). The major significance of the phrase lies in Section 2-403 [30-2-403] and in the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9) [Title 30, chapter 9A].

The first sentence of paragraph (9) [subsection (2)(j)] makes clear that a buyer from a pawnbroker cannot be a buyer in ordinary course of business. The second sentence tracks Section 6-102(1)(m) [now repealed]. It explains what it means to buy "in the ordinary course." The penultimate sentence prevents a buyer that does not have the right to possession as against the seller from being a buyer in ordinary course of business. Concerning when a buyer obtains possessory rights, see Sections 2-502 [30-2-502] and 2-716 [30-2-716]. However, the penultimate sentence is not intended to affect a buyer's status as a buyer in ordinary course of business in cases (such as a "drop shipment") involving delivery by the seller to a person buying from the buyer or a donee from the buyer. The requirement relates to whether as against the seller the buyer or one taking through the buyer has possessory rights.

10. [subsection (2)(k)] "Conspicuous." Derived from Section 2-103(a)(10) [30-1-201(10), 2003 MCA]. It states the general standard that to be conspicuous a term ought to be noticed by a reasonable person. Whether a term is conspicuous is an issue for the court. Subparagraphs (A) and (B) [subsections (2)(k)(i) and (2)(k)(ii)] set out several methods for making a term conspicuous. Requiring that a term be conspicuous blends a notice function (the term ought to be noticed) and a planning function (giving guidance to the party relying on the term regarding how that result can be achieved). Although these paragraphs indicate some of the methods for making a term attention-calling, the test is whether attention can reasonably be expected to be called to it. The statutory language should not be construed to permit a result that is inconsistent with that test.

11. [subsection (2)(l)] "Consumer." Derived from Section 9-102(a)(25) [30-9A-102(1)(z)].

12. [subsection (2)(m)] "Contract." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

13. [subsection (2)(n)] "Creditor." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

14. [subsection (2)(o)] "Defendant." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA], which was derived from Section 76, Uniform Sales Act.

15. [subsection (2)(p)] "Delivery". Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The reference to certificated securities has been deleted in light of the more specific treatment of the matter in Section 8-301 [now repealed]. The definition has been revised to accommodate electronic documents of title. Control in the context of an electronic document of title is defined in Article 7 (Section 7-106) [Title 30, chapter 7 (30-7-107)].

16. [subsection (2)(q)] "Document of title". Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA], which was derived from Section 76, Uniform Sales Act. This definition makes explicit that the obligation or designation of a third party as "bailee" is essential to a document of title and clearly rejects any such result as obtained in Hixson v. Ward, 254 Ill.App. 505 (1929), which treated a conditional sales contract as a document of title. Also the definition is left open so that new types of documents may be included, including documents which gain commercial recognition in the international arena. See UNCITRAL Draft Instrument on Transport Law. It is unforeseeable what documents may one day serve the essential purpose now filled by warehouse receipts and bills of lading. The definition is stated in terms of the function of the documents with the intention that any document which gains commercial recognition as accomplishing the desired result shall be included within its scope. Fungible goods are adequately identified within the language of the definition by identification of the mass of which they are a part.

Dock warrants were within the Sales Act definition of document of title apparently for the purpose of recognizing a valid tender by means of such paper. In current commercial practice a dock warrant or receipt is a kind of interim certificate issued by shipping companies upon delivery of the goods at the dock, entitling a designated person to be issued a bill of lading. The receipt itself is invariably nonnegotiable in form although it may indicate that a negotiable bill is to be forthcoming. Such a document is not within the general compass of the definition, although trade usage may in some cases entitle such paper to be treated as a document of title. If the dock receipt actually represents a storage obligation undertaken by the shipping company, then it is a warehouse receipt within this Section regardless of the name given to the instrument.

The goods must be "described", but the description may be by marks or labels and may be qualified in such a way as to disclaim personal knowledge of the issuer regarding contents or condition. However, baggage and parcel checks and similar "tokens" of storage which identify stored goods only as those received in exchange for the token are not covered by this Article. The definition is broad enough to include an airway bill.

A document of title may be either tangible or electronic. Tangible documents of title should be construed to mean traditional paper documents. Electronic documents of title are documents that are stored in an electronic medium instead of in tangible form. The concept of an electronic medium should be construed liberally to include electronic, digital, magnetic, optical, electromagnetic, or any other current or similar emerging technologies. As to reissuing a document of title in an alternative medium, see Article 7, Section 7-105 [Title 30, chapter 7

(30-7-106)]. Control for electronic documents of title is defined in Article 7 (Section 7-106) [Title 30, chapter 7 (30-7-107)].

17. [subsection (2)(r)] "Fault." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. "Default" has been added to the list events constituting fault.

18. [subsection (2)(s)] "Fungible [goods]." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The definition has been reorganized and references to securities have been deleted because Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] no longer uses the term "fungible" to describe securities.

19. [subsection (2)(t)] "Genuine." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

20. [subsection (2)(u)] "Good faith." Former Section 1-201(19) [30-1-201(19), 2003 MCA] defined "good faith" simply as honesty in fact; the definition contained no element of commercial reasonableness. Initially, that definition applied throughout the Code with only one exception. Former Section 2-103(1)(b) [30-2-103(1)(b)] provided that "in this Article. . . good faith in the case of a merchant means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade." This alternative definition was limited in applicability in three ways. First, it applied only to transactions within the scope of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]. Second, it applied only to merchants. Third, strictly construed it applied only to uses of the phrase "good faith" in Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]; thus, so construed it would not define "good faith" for its most important use - the obligation of good faith imposed by former UCC Section 1-203 [sic] [30-2-103].

Over time, however, amendments to the UCC brought the Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] merchant concept of good faith (subjective honesty and objective reasonableness) into other Articles. First, Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] explicitly incorporated the Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] standard. See current UCC Section 2A-103(7) [30-2A-103]. Then, other Articles broadened the applicability of that standard by adopting it for all parties rather than just for merchants. See, e.g., UCC Sections 3-103(a)(4) [30-3-102(1)(d)], 4A-105(a)(6) [30-4A-105(1)(f)], 8-102(a)(10) [30-8-112(1)(j)], and 9-102(a)(43) [30-9A-102(1)(qq)]. See also Draft of Revised Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]. All of these definitions are comprised of two elements - honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing. Only revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] defines "good faith" solely in terms of subjective honesty, and only Article 6 [Title 30, chapter 6, now repealed] and Article 7 [Title 30, chapter 7] are without definitions of good faith. (It should be noted that, while revised Article 6 [Title 30, chapter 6, now repealed] did not define good faith, Comment 2 to revised UCC Section 6-102 states that "this Article adopts the definition of 'good faith' in Article 1 in all cases, even when the buyer is a merchant.") Given this near unanimity, it is appropriate to move the broader definition of "good faith" to Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. Of course, this definition is subject to the applicability of the narrower definition in revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5].

21. [subsection (2)(v)] "Holder". Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The definition has been reorganized for clarity and amended to provide for electronic negotiable documents of title.

22. [subsection (2)(w)] "Insolvency proceedings." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

23. [subsection (2)(x)] "Insolvent." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The three tests of insolvency - "generally ceased to pay debts in the ordinary course of business other than as a result of a bona fide dispute as to them," "unable to pay debts as they become due," and "insolvent within the meaning of the federal bankruptcy law" - are expressly set up as alternative tests and must be approached from a commercial standpoint.

24. [subsection (2)(y)] "Money." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The test is that of sanction of government, whether by authorization before issue or adoption afterward, which recognizes the circulating medium as a part of the official currency of that government. The narrow view that money is limited to legal tender is rejected.

25. [subsection (2)(z)] "Organization." The former definition of this word has been replaced with the standard definition used in acts prepared by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

26. [subsection (2)(aa)] "Party." Substantively identical to former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. Mention of a party includes, of course, a person acting through an agent. However, where an agent comes into opposition or contrast to the principal, particular account is taken of that situation.

27. [subsection (2)(bb)] "Person." The former definition of this word has been replaced with the standard definition used in acts prepared by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

28. [not adopted] "Present value." This definition was formerly contained within the definition of "security interest" in former Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA].

[28a.] [subsection (2)(cc)] "Presumption." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

29. [subsection (2)(dd)] "Purchase." Derived from former UCC Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The form of definition has been changed from "includes" to "means."

30. [subsection (2)(ee)] "Purchaser." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

31. [subsection (2)(ff)] "Record." Derived from Section 9-102(a)(69) [30-9A-102(1)([])].

32. [subsection (2)(gg)] "Remedy." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The purpose is to make it clear that both remedy and right (as defined) include those remedial rights of "self help" which are among the most important bodies of rights under the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], remedial rights being those to which an aggrieved party can resort on its own motion.

33. (2)(hh) "Representative." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. Reorganized, and form changed from "includes" to "means."

34. [subsection (2)(ii)] "Right." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

35. [subsection (2)(jj)] "Security Interest." The definition is the first paragraph of the definition of "security interest" in former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. The remaining portion has been moved to Section 1-203 [30-1-211]. Notice that in view of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] the term includes the interest of certain outright buyers of certain kinds of property.

36. [subsection (2)(kk)] "Send." New. Compare "notifies".

37. [subsection (2)(ll)] "Signed." Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA]. Former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA] referred to "intention to authenticate"; because authenticate is now a defined term, the language has been changed to "intention to adopt or accept." The latter formulation is derived from the definition of "authenticate," The definition of "signed" is to make clear that, as the term is used in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], a complete signature is not necessary. The symbol may be printed, stamped or written; it may be by initials or by thumbprint. It may be on any part of the document and in appropriate cases may be found in a billhead or letterhead. No catalog of possible situations can be complete and the court must use common sense and commercial experience in passing upon these matters. The question always is whether the symbol was executed or adopted by the party with present intention to adopt or accept the writing.

38. [not adopted] "State." This is the standard definition of the term used in acts prepared by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

39. [subsection (2)(mm)] "Surety." This definition makes it clear that "surety" includes all secondary obligors, not just those whose obligation refers to them person obligated as a surety. As to the nature of secondary obligations generally, see Restatement of Suretyship and Guaranty §1.

40. [subsection (2)(nn)] "Term." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

41. [subsection (2)(oo)] "Unauthorized signature." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

42. [subsection (2)(pp)] "Warehouse receipt". Derived from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA], which was derived from Section 76(1), Uniform Sales Act; Section 1, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act. Receipts issued by a field warehouse are included, provided the warehouseman and the depositor of the goods are different persons. The definition makes clear that the receipt must qualify as a document of title under subsection (16) [subsection (2)(q)].

43. [subsection (2)(qq)] "Written" or "writing." Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA].

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 inserted (1) establishing scope of definitions; in (2) in introductory clause at end deleted "and unless the context otherwise requires, in this code"; in definition of aggrieved party substituted "pursue" for "resort to"; in definition of agreement substituted "inferred" for "by implication", inserted "course of performance", and at end substituted "as provided in 30-1-205" for "or course of performance as provided in this code (30-1-205 and 30-2-208). Whether an agreement has legal consequences is determined by the provisions of this code, if applicable; otherwise by the law of contracts (30-1-103)"; inserted definition of authenticate; in definition of bank inserted "and includes a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union, and trust company"; in definition of bearer inserted "a person in control of a negotiable electronic document of title or a" and near middle substituted "of a negotiable instrument, negotiable tangible document" for "of an instrument, document"; in definition of bill of lading near beginning of (i) inserted "of title", near end inserted "directly or indirectly", and at end deleted "and includes an airbill. "Airbill" means a document serving for air transportation as a bill of lading does for marine or rail transportation, and includes an air consignment note or air waybill" and inserted (ii) relating to warehouse receipt; in definition of conspicuous near beginning of first sentence substituted "with reference to a term, means so written, displayed, or presented" for "A term or clause is conspicuous when it is so written", deleted former second, third, and fourth sentences that read: "A printed heading in capitals (as: Non-Negotiable Bill of Lading) is conspicuous. Language in the body of a form is "conspicuous" if it is in larger or other contrasting type or color. But in a telegram any stated term is "conspicuous"", in second sentence after "term" deleted "or clause", and inserted third sentence and (i) and (ii) regarding examples of conspicuous terms; inserted definition of consumer; in definition of contract near end inserted "as supplemented by"; in definition of defendant substituted "counterclaim or third-party claim" for "cross-action or counterclaim"; in definition of delivery inserted "an electronic document of title means voluntary transfer of control and with respect to", inserted "tangible", and after "paper" deleted "or certificated securities"; in definition of document of title in (i) at beginning substituted "means a record" for "includes bill of lading, dock warrant, dock receipt, warehouse receipt or order for the delivery of goods, and also any other document", in (i)(A) near middle after "possession" inserted "or control", after "receive" inserted "control", and near end substituted "record and the goods the record covers" for "document and the goods it covers", in (i)(B) substituted "that purports to be issued by or addressed to a bailee and to cover goods in the bailee's possession which are either identified or are fungible portions of an identified mass" for "To be a document of title a document must purport to be issued by or addressed to a bailee and purport to cover goods in the bailee's possession which are either identified or are fungible portions of an identified mass", and inserted (ii) relating to inclusions and electronic and tangible documents; in definition of fault at end inserted "or default"; substituted fungible goods for fungible as defined term and before "means" deleted "or securities", in (i) near beginning after "goods" deleted "or securities" and at end deleted "Goods which are not fungible shall be deemed fungible for the purposes of this code to the extent that under a particular", and in (ii) at beginning substituted "goods which by agreement" for "agreement or document unlike units"; in definition of good faith at beginning inserted exception clause and at end substituted "and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" for "in the conduct or transaction concerned"; in definition of holder in (i) at beginning deleted "negotiable instrument, means", after "possession" substituted "of a negotiable" for "if the", and near end substituted "payable either to bearer or to an identified person that is" for "payable to bearer or to", deleted former (b) that read: "(b) certified security, means the person in possession is the registered owner, the security has been indorsed to the person in possession by the registered owner, or the security is in bearer form", in (ii) at beginning substituted "a person in possession of a negotiable tangible document of title" for "document of title, means the person in possession" and after "deliverable" inserted "either", and inserted (iii) relating to person in control of electronic document; deleted definition of honor that read: "To "honor" is to pay or to accept and pay, or where a credit so engages to purchase or discount a draft complying with the terms of the credit"; in definition of insolvent in (i) at beginning substituted "having generally ceased" for "A person is "insolvent" who either has ceased" and at end inserted "other than as a result of bona fide dispute" and in (ii) at beginning substituted "unable to" for "cannot"; in definition of money in first sentence after "exchange" inserted "currently" and at beginning of second sentence inserted "The term includes a monetary unit of account established by an" and at end inserted "or by agreement between two or more countries"; deleted definition of notice that read: "A person has "notice" of a fact when:

(a) he has actual knowledge of it; or

(b) he has received a notice or notification of it; or

(c) from all the facts and circumstances known to him at the time in question he has reason to know that it exists. A person "knows" or has "knowledge" of a fact when he has actual knowledge of it. "Discover" or "learn" or a word or phrase of similar import refers to knowledge rather than to reason to know. The time and circumstances under which a notice or notification may cease to be effective are not determined by this code"; deleted definition of notifies or gives that read: "A person "notifies" or "gives" a notice or notification to another by taking such steps as may be reasonably required to inform the other in ordinary course whether or not such other actually comes to know of it. A person "receives" a notice or notification when:

(a) it comes to his attention; or

(b) it is duly delivered at the place of business through which the contract was made or at any other place held out by him as the place for receipt of such communications"; deleted definition of notice that read: "Notice, knowledge or a notice or notification received by an organization is effective for a particular transaction from the time when it is brought to the attention of the individual conducting that transaction, and in any event from the time when it would have been brought to his attention if the organization had exercised due diligence. An organization exercises due diligence if it maintains reasonable routines for communicating significant information to the person conducting the transaction and there is reasonable compliance with the routines. Due diligence does not require an individual acting for the organization to communicate information unless such communication is part of his regular duties or unless he has reason to know of the transaction and that the transaction would be materially affected by the information"; in definition of organization substituted "means a person other than an individual" for "includes a corporation, government or governmental subdivision or agency, business trust, estate, trust, partnership or association, two or more persons having a joint or common interest, or any other legal or commercial entity"; in definition of party after "agreement" substituted "subject to" for "within"; in definition of person substituted "means an individual, corporation, business trust, estate, trust, partnership, limited liability company, association, joint venture, government, governmental subdivision, agency, or instrumentality, public corporation, or any other legal or commercial entity" for "includes an individual or an organization"; in definition of purchase near beginning substituted "means taking by sale, lease" for "includes taking by sale"; inserted definition of record; in definition of security interest at end substituted "Whether a transaction in the form of a lease creates a "security interest" is determined pursuant to 30-1-211" for "Whether a transaction creates a lease or security interest is determined by the facts of each case; however, a transaction creates a security interest if the consideration the lessee is to pay the lessor for the right to possession and use of the goods is an obligation for the term of the lease not subject to termination by the lessee and:

(i) the original term of the lease is equal to or greater than the remaining economic life of the goods;

(ii) the lessee is bound to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods or is bound to become the owner of the goods;

(iii) the lessee has an option to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods for no additional consideration or nominal additional consideration upon compliance with the lease agreement; or

(iv) the lessee has an option to become the owner of the goods for no additional consideration or nominal additional consideration upon compliance with the lease agreement.

(b) A transaction does not create a security interest merely because it provides that:

(i) the present value of the consideration the lessee is obligated to pay the lessor for the right to possession and use of the goods is substantially equal to or is greater than the fair market value of the goods at the time the lease is entered into;

(ii) the lessee assumes risk of loss of the goods or agrees to pay taxes, insurance, filing, recording, or registration fees or service or maintenance costs with respect to the goods;

(iii) the lessee has an option to renew the lease or to become the owner of the goods;

(iv) the lessee has an option to renew the lease for a fixed rent that is equal to or greater than the reasonably predictable fair market value for the use of the goods for the term of the renewal at the time the option is to be performed; or

(v) the lessee has an option to become the owner of the goods for a fixed price that is equal to or greater than the reasonably predictable fair market value of the goods at the time the option is to be performed.

(c) For purposes of this subsection (37):

(i) additional consideration is not nominal if:

(A) when the option to renew the lease is granted to the lessee, the rent is stated to be the fair market rent for the use of the goods for the term of the renewal determined at the time the option is to be performed; or

(B) when the option to become the owner of the goods is granted to the lessee, the price is stated to be the fair market value of the goods determined at the time the option is to be performed;

(ii) additional consideration is nominal if it is less than the lessee's reasonably predictable cost of performing under the lease agreement if the option is not exercised;

(iii) "reasonably predictable" and "remaining economic life of the goods" are to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances at the time the transaction is entered into; and

(iv) "present value" means the amount as of a date certain of one or more sums payable in the future, discounted to the date certain. The discount is determined by the interest rate specified by the parties if the rate is not manifestly unreasonable at the time the transaction is entered into; otherwise, the discount is determined by a commercially reasonable rate that takes into account the facts and circumstances of each case at the time the transaction was entered into"; in definition of send in introductory clause after "writing" inserted "record", in (i) at end deleted "The receipt of any writing or notice within the time at which it would have arrived if properly sent has the effect of a proper sending", and inserted (ii) relating to timely arrival; in definition of signed after "adopted" deleted "by a party" and near end substituted "adopt or accept" for "authenticate"; in definition of surety at end inserted "or other secondary obligor"; deleted definition of telegram that read: ""Telegram" includes a message transmitted by radio, teletype, cable, any mechanical method of transmission, or the like"; deleted definition of value that read: ""Value". Except as otherwise provided with respect to negotiable instruments and bank collections (30-3-303, 30-4-208, and 30-4-209), a person gives "value" for rights if he acquires them:

(a) in return for a binding commitment to extend credit or for the extension of immediately available credit whether or not drawn upon and whether or not a charge-back is provided for in the event of difficulties in collection; or

(b) as security for or in total or partial satisfaction of a preexisting claim; or

(c) by accepting delivery pursuant to a preexisting contract for purchase; or

(d) generally, in return for any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract"; in definition of warehouse receipt substituted "document of title" for "receipt"; substituted writing for written or writing as defined term and inserted second sentence relating to "written"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 179 in definition of security interest at end of (a) inserted last sentence concerning determination by facts of each case, inserted (a)(i) through (a)(iv) concerning term of lease, option to renew lease, option to renew lease for nominal consideration, or option to become owner for nominal consideration, inserted (b) concerning when transaction does not create security interest, and inserted (c) specifying when additional consideration is or is not nominal and defining terms. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 substituted definition of buyer in ordinary course of business for former definition that read: ""Buyer in ordinary course of business" means a person who, in good faith and without knowledge that the sale to him is in violation of the ownership rights or security interest of a third party in the goods, buys in ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind, but does not include a pawnbroker. All persons who sell minerals or the like (including oil and gas) at wellhead or minehead shall be considered to be persons in the business of selling goods of that kind. "Buying" may be for cash or by exchange of other property or on secured or unsecured credit and includes receiving goods or documents of title under a preexisting contract for sale but does not include a transfer in bulk or as security for or in total or partial satisfaction of a money debt"; substituted definition of security interest for former definition that read: "(a) "Security interest" means an interest in personal property or fixtures that secures payment or performance of an obligation. The retention or reservation of title by a seller of goods notwithstanding shipment or delivery to the buyer (30-2-401) is limited in effect to a reservation of a "security interest". The term also includes any interest of a buyer of accounts or chattel paper that is subject to chapter 9. The special property interest of a buyer of goods on identification of those goods to a contract for sale under 30-2-401 is not a "security interest", but a buyer may also acquire a "security interest" by complying with chapter 9. Unless a consignment is intended as security, reservation of title thereunder is not a "security interest", but a consignment in any event is subject to the provisions on consignment sales (30-2-326). Whether a transaction creates a lease or security interest is determined by the facts of each case; however, a transaction creates a security interest if the consideration the lessee is to pay the lessor for the right to possession and use of the goods is an obligation for the term of the lease not subject to termination by the lessee and:

(i) the original term of the lease is equal to or greater than the remaining economic life of the goods;

(ii) the lessee is bound to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods or is bound to become the owner of the goods;

(iii) the lessee has an option to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods for no additional consideration or nominal additional consideration upon compliance with the lease agreement; or

(iv) the lessee has an option to become the owner of the goods for no additional consideration or nominal additional consideration upon compliance with the lease agreement.

(b) A transaction does not create a security interest merely because it provides that:

(i) the present value of the consideration the lessee is obligated to pay the lessor for the right to possession and use of the goods is substantially equal to or is greater than the fair market value of the goods at the time the lease is entered into;

(ii) the lessee assumes risk of loss of the goods or agrees to pay taxes, insurance, filing, recording, or registration fees or service or maintenance costs with respect to the goods;

(iii) the lessee has an option to renew the lease or to become the owner of the goods;

(iv) the lessee has an option to renew the lease for a fixed rent that is equal to or greater than the reasonably predictable fair market value for the use of the goods for the term of the renewal at the time the option is to be performed; or

(v) the lessee has an option to become the owner of the goods for a fixed price that is equal to or greater than the reasonably predictable fair market value of the goods at the time the option is to be performed.

(c) For purposes of this subsection (37):

(i) additional consideration is not nominal if:

(A) when the option to renew the lease is granted to the lessee, the rent is stated to be the fair market rent for the use of the goods for the term of the renewal determined at the time the option is to be performed; or

(B) when the option to become the owner of the goods is granted to the lessee, the price is stated to be the fair market value of the goods determined at the time the option is to be performed;

(ii) additional consideration is nominal if it is less than the lessee's reasonably predictable cost of performing under the lease agreement if the option is not exercised;

(iii) "reasonably predictable" and "remaining economic life of the goods" are to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances at the time the transaction is entered into; and

(iv) "present value" means the amount as of a date certain of one or more sums payable in the future, discounted to the date certain. The discount is determined by the interest rate specified by the parties if the rate is not manifestly unreasonable at the time the transaction is entered into; otherwise, the discount is determined by a commercially reasonable rate that takes into account the facts and circumstances of each case at the time the transaction was entered into"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1991 Amendment: Substituted definition of holder for former definition that read: ""Holder" means a person who is in possession of a document of title or an instrument or a certificated investment security drawn, issued, or endorsed to him or to his order or to bearer or in blank"; at end of definition of money substituted "or intergovernmental organization" for "as a part of its currency"; in definition of security interest, at end of (a), substituted language concerning creation of a lease or security interest and the tests contained in subsections (a)(i) through (a)(iv) for "Whether a lease is intended as security is to be determined by the facts of each case; however, (a) the inclusion of an option to purchase does not of itself make the lease one intended for security, and (b) an agreement that upon compliance with the terms of the lease the lessee shall become or has the option to become the owner of the property for no additional consideration or for a nominal consideration does make the lease one intended for security", inserted (b) concerning transactions that do not create, and inserted (c) concerning additional consideration; in definition of unauthorized, after "signature", deleted "or endorsement"; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: In (5), inserted "certificated" before "security"; in (9) inserted second sentence relating to minerals, oil, and gas; in (14) inserted "certificated" before "securities"; in (20) inserted "certificated" before "investment"; in (37) deleted "contract rights" before "which is subject to Chapter 9".

Source of 1983 Amendments: The source of the 1983 amendments was both the 1972 amendments to Article 9 and the 1977 amendments to Article 8 of the Uniform Commercial Code drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. The amendments are to section 1-201 of the Official Text of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Case Notes

No Standing to Recover Damages by Party Not Owner of Property — Fax Not Considered Valid Assignment of Damage Claim: Koelzer owned an inn by a mining and power generation site near Colstrip. Koelzer discovered that mining activity had damaged the inn and filed a complaint in 1994 against the mining and power generation companies, but did not pursue the damage claim. In 1996, Dale and Shawonda Lewis approached Koelzer about purchasing the inn, and the issue of the damages and Koelzer's claim came up. The Lewises inspected the inn and discovered additional damages, which led Koelzer to reassert the damage claim, but the claim was again unresolved. Nevertheless, the Lewises offered to buy the inn, and title was eventually conveyed to Dale's parents, who were able to secure financing. Koelzer notified the companies by fax that the inn had been sold and requested that the companies work with Dale on the structural damage discussed in the past. About 1 year later, Dale received an estimate of $91,000 to repair the damages and filed a complaint seeking compensation from the companies. Dale's parents eventually filed for bankruptcy, and the Lewises finally became the owners of record in 1998. When the companies discovered that the Lewises were not the owners of the inn at the time that the suit was filed, they moved for summary judgment, which was granted by the District Court on grounds that the Lewises had no standing to assert a claim for damages arising before they acquired title. On appeal, the Supreme Court cited the general rule that persons cannot recover for damages to property that they do not own. Further, even though property damage claims have long been recognized as assignable, the fax did not meet the statutory requirements of a valid assignment and was unenforceable. Thus, on the issue of prepurchase damages, no material question of fact existed regarding ownership or assignment, so the Lewises had no standing to bring a claim for damages prior to their ownership of the inn. Summary judgment was affirmed. Lewis v. Puget Sound Power & Light Co., 2001 MT 145, 306 M 37, 29 P3d 1028 (2001).

Commercial Reasonableness of Notification of Sale: It is not required that a debtor receive actual notice of a sale, only that the creditor take reasonable steps to assure that the debtor is notified. When a bank sent notice to defendant at his last-known address, the bank satisfied the statutory requirements for notice. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown v. Mork, 257 M 495, 850 P2d 954, 50 St. Rep. 379 (1993).

Seizure of Collateral by Bank Not Bad Faith: The plaintiffs sued the defendant bank for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The Supreme Court held that the relationship between the parties was contractual and that the plaintiffs' assertion that they only signed blank documents rather than documents pledging collateral to secure bank loans was not supported by the evidence. The court ruled that the bank did not act in bad faith in seizing the collateral when the plaintiffs defaulted on their loans. Stott v. Fox, 246 M 301, 805 P2d 1305, 47 St. Rep. 2040 (1990).

Merchant Pawnbroker Held to Good Faith Requirement: Defendant pawnshop operator who sold stolen property to plaintiff refused to give plaintiff a refund after the property was recovered by police. Defendant argued that he disclaimed any warranty of title to goods sold in his business by posting a sign alerting buyers that merchandise is sold "as is" and by writing the same notation on his sales slips. Defendant clearly breached the warranty of clear title under 30-2-312 when he sold stolen goods because neither a thief nor his successor pass clear title to stolen goods. It was irrelevant that defendant claimed he did not know the goods were stolen. With respect to breach of warranty, defendant as a merchant is held to a higher standard of dealing than ordinary consumers. In addition, he is held to the obligatory good faith required in the performance of every contract under the U.C.C., which is defined under this section as "honesty in fact". Brokke v. Williams, 235 M 305, 766 P2d 1311, 46 St. Rep. 6 (1989).

Transaction Constitutes Lease — Not Installment Sales Contract: The facts of this case indicate that the lessee did not have the option to obtain title to the property at no further charge at the termination of the lease. Therefore, the court found the characterization of the transaction was a lease of equipment and was not governed by the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) IFG Leasing Co. v. Schultz, 217 M 434, 705 P2d 576, 42 St. Rep. 1307 (1985), following Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Generally Worded After-Acquired Property Security Interest: Security interest covered all goods used in rental business, including but not limited to machinery, equipment, and inventory held for sale or rent "existing or hereafter acquired". Lower court's conclusion that a general description of items covered was insufficient and that trailers, hoppers, mixer, and loader used by renters to make, haul, and pour cement were not covered was erroneous. Further, the conclusion that there could be no security interest because those items were not financed by the holder of the security interest was also erroneous. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Oral Notice Sufficient: Plaintiff entered numerous financing arrangements with Tri-Mont. Plaintiff had blanket security interests in Tri-Mont's after-acquired assets. Defendant also financed acquisitions of inventory for Tri-Mont. Defendant filed a purchase money security interest in certain property. Although there was no formal agreement between the parties, they routinely contacted one another prior to financing an item. Upon Tri-Mont's filing a bankruptcy petition, a dispute arose as to whether the defendant's security interest had been properly noticed to plaintiff, thereby giving priority to defendant's interest. Under 30-9-312 [now repealed, see 30-9A-322 through 30-9A-324], prior to perfecting a purchase money security interest, notice must be given to known secured parties. Plaintiff contended this notice had to be in writing. It was held that under the definitions of "notice" and "notifies" in 30-1-201, notice may be given orally, as was the case here. The defendant's oral notification to plaintiff was sufficient to put plaintiff on notice of its intent to perfect a purchase money security interest. Credit Alliance Corp. v. First Nat'l Bank of Missoula, 40 St. Rep. 2095 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Reasonable Steps to Notify: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff contended that notice of the foreclosure was deficient because he had moved and had not received the letter. The Supreme Court held that a creditor must only take reasonable steps to notify the debtor. Plaintiff received notice when the letter was delivered to the address. The actions of defendant were those reasonably required to notify plaintiff. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983).

Lease as Installment Sale: The parties entered into an agreement for the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system that was termed a "lease agreement". Payments were to be made over a 5-year term at the expiration of which defendant had the option to renew for another 5-year term or to purchase the system for $1. The District Court found that the transaction was in effect a "sale". The Supreme Court affirmed, saying that in circumstances where the purported lease gives the lessee the option to purchase the goods upon expiration of the term of the lease for a nominal amount, the lease is commercially indistinguishable from an installment sales contract and the provisions of the U.C.C. apply. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Foreclosure of Mortgage Securing Note — Payment to Holder Required: The Dahls executed a note to Sythe and also executed a real estate mortgage in Sythe's favor. The note was placed in an escrow account in the Culbertson State Bank, and the bank was designated as the place where payment was to be made. Sythe assigned the note to the bank as security for a note obtained by him. Sythe later gave the bank a written assignment of the mortgage. Defendant Dahl was given written notice of this assignment. The bank did not receive any payments from Sythe on his notes or from Dahl on the note assigned to the bank. The bank brought an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage against Dahl. Dahl contended that the note was discharged because it was paid in full, with payments being made to Sythe. The bank was never able to make service of process on Sythe. The bank was a "holder" of the note since it was in possession of the note endorsed by Sythe. As a holder and having produced the note, the bank was entitled to recover unless the defendant established a defense. Defendant's sole defense was that he had paid the note to Sythe. The defense of payment only discharges the maker's liability on the instrument if payment is made to the holder. Defendant never attempted to prove payment to the holder. Since the bank was the holder of the note and a valid assignee of the mortgage securing the note, it was entitled to a decree of foreclosure. Culbertson St. Bank v. Dahl, 190 M 33, 617 P2d 1295, 37 St. Rep. 1752 (1980).

Disclaimer Not Conspicuous: The disclaimer of warranties in an agreement is ineffective to exclude an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose since the disclaimer is in the same typeface as the rest of the contract and is not indented, underlined, or inked in a contrasting color to comply with the provision of the Code requiring conspicuousness. Transcont. Refrigeration Co. v. Figgins, 179 M 12, 585 P2d 1301 (1978).

Notice by Ordinary Mail: Plaintiff complied with the notice provisions of subsection (26) of this section when he sent notice of foreclosure sale to debtor by ordinary mail, since in Montana the receipt of mail is presumed if the procedure of the mailing is carried out in a regular manner. James Talcott, Inc. v. Reynolds, 165 M 404, 529 P2d 352 (1974).

Course of Dealing From Which Agreement Implied: Payor bank's holding and paying of one check to each of two of the plaintiff-payees were not sufficient to form "a sequence of previous conduct" under 30-1-205 necessary to establish a course of dealing from which an agreement excusing noncompliance with "midnight rule" under 30-4-302 could be implied under subsection (3) of this section. Sun River Cattle Co., Inc. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 237, 521 P2d 679 (1974).

Changes From Former Law: No changes.

1. This section supplies judicial recognition for documents that are relied upon as trustworthy by commercial parties.

2. This section is concerned only with documents that have been given a preferred status by the parties themselves who have required their procurement in the agreement, and for this reason the applicability of the section is limited to actions arising out of the contract that authorized or required the document. The list of documents is intended to be illustrative and not exclusive.

3. The provisions of this section go no further than establishing the documents in question as prima facie evidence and leave to the court the ultimate determination of the facts where the accuracy or authenticity of the documents is questioned. In this connection the section calls for a commercially reasonable interpretation.

4. Documents governed by this section need not be writings if records in another medium are generally relied upon in the context.

Case Notes

Good Faith by Lender: The gravamen of the statutory good faith requirement is whether the terms of the agreement were carried out faithfully. Although the terms of loans as negotiated prior to execution of actual notes were disputed where the lender performed according to the actual notes signed by the parties, the lender did not act in bad faith. Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988).

30-1-203. Obligation of good faith.

Official Comment

Source: Former Section 1-203 [30-1-203, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: Except for changing the form of reference to the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], this section is identical to former UCC Section 1-203 [30-1-203, 2003 MCA]. A Comment will make it clear that this section applies to the exercise of rights granted by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A].

1. This section sets forth a basic principle running throughout the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. The principle is that in commercial transactions good faith is required in the performance and enforcement of all agreements or duties. While this duty is explicitly stated in some provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], the applicability of the duty is broader than merely these situations and applies generally, as stated in this section, to the performance or enforcement of every contract or duty within this Act [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. It is further implemented by Section 1-303 [30-1-205] on course of dealing, course of performance, and usage of trade. This section does not support an independent cause of action for failure to perform or enforce in good faith. Rather, this section means that a failure to perform or enforce, in good faith, a specific duty or obligation under the contract, constitutes a breach of that contract or makes unavailable, under the particular circumstances, a remedial right or power. This distinction makes it clear that the doctrine of good faith merely directs a court towards interpreting contracts within the commercial context in which they are created, performed, and enforced, and does not create a separate duty of fairness and reasonableness which can be independently breached.

2. "Performance and enforcement" of contracts and duties within the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] include the exercise of rights created by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A].

Case Notes

No Error in Ordering Foreclosure of Personal Real Property for Failure to Repay Business Loans — Deficiency Judgment Proper: Defendants, husband and wife, failed to make scheduled payments on two bank loans, and the bank filed for foreclosure of two deeds of trust. Defendants were in the process of obtaining a divorce. The husband failed to respond to the complaint, and a default judgment was entered against him. The District Court then granted summary judgment against the wife, ordered foreclosure and sale of the collateral real property, and entered a deficiency judgment holding the wife responsible for any deficiency following sale of the real property. The wife appealed on grounds that the District Court erroneously granted summary judgment by: (1) determining that any oral representations made by bank agents were merged into written documents; (2) holding that the bank was entitled to a deficiency judgment; and (3) finding that the bank had no fiduciary duty to the wife. The Supreme Court considered each argument in turn and affirmed. First, the written loan agreements expressed the entire agreement between the parties, and any alleged oral understandings that were not reduced to writing were invalid. Second, although a deficiency judgment may not issue if the secured property is a single-family residence, in this case, the security agreements provided that the collateral property be used for business purposes, so even though the property was defendants' primary residence, the trust indenture was not strictly residential, and the District Court did not err in ordering a deficiency judgment. Third, as stated in Coles Dept. Store v. First Bank, 240 M 226, 783 P2d 932 (1989), to establish a fiduciary relationship, in addition to a long history of bank dealings, a bank must act in some capacity other than that common in the usual arm's-length debtor-creditor relationship. Here, no prior banking relationship existed between the parties, and given the wife's extensive legal and marketing background, she would not have needed to rely on the bank to interpret the loan documents for her or to act as her adviser, so no fiduciary relationship or duty existed. First Sec. Bank v. Abel, 2008 MT 161, 343 M 313, 184 P3d 318 (2008), following First St. Bank of Forsyth v. Chunkapura, 226 M 54, 734 P2d 1203 (1987), and Trustees of the Wash.-Idaho-Mont. Carpenters-Employers Retirement Trust Fund v. Galleria Partnership, 239 M 250, 780 P2d 608 (1989).

Covenant of Good Faith at Issue Only if Breach of Contract Occurs — Summary Judgment Improper: Precision Theatrical Effects (PTE), a manufacturer of explosive pyrotechnical materials, and Nickel, PTE's former owner, obtained five loans from United Banks (United), secured by cash, accounts receivable, and assets. The governing documents securing the loans provided that PTE would be in default if PTE did or failed to do anything that caused United to believe that it would have difficulty in collecting on its loans. After PTE's business was raided and Nickel was arrested for possessing and selling dangerous drugs, United froze PTE's accounts despite their current status and notified PTE and Nickel that the loans were in default. After the District Court granted summary judgment to United, PTE and Nickel appealed, alleging that United breached the implied covenant of good faith when it declared a default and froze all bank accounts. United argued that it had legitimate reasons to believe that its ability to collect on the loans had been jeopardized, and therefore, under the terms of the security agreement, PTE and Nickel were in default. The Supreme Court, in reversing the District Court ruling, held that United's belief that it would have difficulty collecting on the loans and whether it acted with honesty when it froze the accounts must be read in conjunction with its obligation to deal in good faith. The breach of duty of good faith is a question of fact not susceptible to summary judgment. Precision Theatrical Effects, Inc. v. United Banks, N.A., 2006 MT 236, 333 M 505, 143 P3d 442 (2006).

Elements of "Special Relationship" Necessary to Support Tort Claim of Bad Faith: The essential elements of a special relationship necessary to support a tort claim of bad faith, as set out in Wallis v. Kroehler Mfg. Co., 207 Cal. Rep. 123 (1984), are: (1) the contract must be such that the parties are in inherently unequal bargaining positions; (2) the motivation for entering the contract must be a nonprofit motivation (i.e., to secure peace of mind, security, or future protection); (3) ordinary contract damages are not adequate because they do not require the party in the superior position to account for its actions and they do not make the inferior party whole; (4) one party is especially vulnerable because of the type of harm it may suffer and of necessity places trust in the other party to perform; and (5) the other party is aware of this vulnerability. If substantial evidence is not presented in support of each and all of the elements, the court shall direct that there is no special relationship. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Holly Corp., 258 M 79, 852 P2d 523, 50 St. Rep. 433 (1993). See also Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767 (1990). These elements were applied in Stephens v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America, 258 M 142, 852 P2d 565, 50 St. Rep. 467 (1993).

Tort of Bad Faith — Not Available for Most Contract Actions — Breach: In a contract action, the Supreme Court ruled that a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing constituted a breach of the contract and that only contract damages would be available to the prevailing party. The court stated that tort-type damages would not be available for a breach of the covenant. The court also held that the tort of bad faith would apply only in exceptional circumstances to discourage oppression in contracts that necessarily give one party a superior position. Every contract, regardless of the type, contains an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. A breach of the covenant is a breach of the contract. Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767, 47 St. Rep. 850 (1990), followed in Keller v. Dooling, 248 M 535, 813 P2d 437, 48 St. Rep. 554 (1991), in McNeil v. Currie, 253 M 9, 830 P2d 1241, 49 St. Rep. 312 (1992), and Kneeland v. Luzenac America, Inc., 1998 MT 136, 289 M 201, 961 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 541 (1998).

Bank's "Action Plan" for Liquidation of Borrower's Business Not Breach of Obligation of Good Faith and Fair Dealing: The plaintiffs owned a department store that had received interim financing over the years from the bank. The business had been losing money for several years, and the bank informed the plaintiffs that it probably would not continue to provide the necessary financing. The plaintiffs thereafter liquidated their business and after it was sold learned that the bank had not disclosed to them that the bank had an "action plan" advocating the liquidation of the plaintiffs' business in order to ensure that the bank's loans be repaid. The Supreme Court held that the bank had never acted as a financial adviser to the plaintiffs. Therefore, no fiduciary duty existed. No contractual obligation existed requiring the bank to continue to loan money. The bank's failure to disclose its "action plan" was not a breach of the statutory obligation of good faith and fair dealing. Coles Dept. Store v. First Bank, 240 M 226, 783 P2d 932, 46 St. Rep. 2075 (1989).

Bank's Failure to Make Additional Loans Not Bad Faith: The bank had made a series of loans to the plaintiffs for their farming operation. Each loan was secured by a promissory note. The plaintiffs claimed that they had a reasonable expectation that the bank would continue to provide the necessary funds, and its failure to do so constituted bad faith. The Supreme Court ruled that no statutory or common-law duty existed that obligated the bank to continue to make loans to the plaintiffs; therefore, the bank's actions could not be characterized as arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable, a showing of which is necessary to prove a breach of the covenant of good faith. Blome v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 238 M 181, 776 P2d 525, 46 St. Rep. 1186 (1989).

Good Faith by Lender: The gravamen of the statutory good faith requirement is whether the terms of the agreement were carried out faithfully. Although the terms of loans as negotiated prior to execution of actual notes were disputed where the lender performed according to the actual notes signed by the parties, the lender did not act in bad faith. Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988).

Breach of Good Faith Obligation — Punitive Damages: A breach of the obligation of good faith imposed by this section, in and of itself, is not sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. There must be some oppressive, malicious, or fraudulent conduct, beyond a breach of the statutory good faith obligation, to support an award of punitive damages. This statement of dictum was made by the court in holding that the plaintiff bank properly foreclosed on a mortgage on real property pledged as collateral for business loans after the bank had refused to extend the note unless the principal balance was reduced substantially. Cent. Bank of Mont. v. Eystad, 219 M 69, 710 P2d 710, 42 St. Rep. 1850 (1985).

Lender's Failure to Honor Renegotiated Loan Payments: Bank's employee, Johnson, told defendants that their note with the bank would be renegotiated to allow further time for payment. Another employee then refused to renegotiate, and he offset defendants' checking account balance against the note without telling defendants, after defendants told him they had relied on Johnson and would not be able to pay on the note's due date. Several of defendants' checks were then dishonored due to insufficient funds. If a duty to exercise good faith is imposed by law rather than by a contract, breach of the duty is tortious and punitive damages are thus recoverable if the conduct is sufficiently culpable. Here, punitive damages could have been granted on the basis of malice, fraud, oppression, or all three, and a new trial was granted because the judge refused to submit the punitive damages issue to the jury. First Nat'l Bank of Libby v. Twombly, 213 M 66, 689 P2d 1226, 41 St. Rep. 1948 (1984). See also Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989).

Estoppel to Prevent Application of Statute of Frauds: In a contract action brought by the plaintiff buyer of seed potatoes against the seller, in which the evidence showed that the defendant had never signed a written contract for the potatoes, but by his active and passive conduct induced the plaintiff to change his position by agreeing to sell the potatoes that were the subject of the contract to other buyers, the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff had proved the elements of estoppel by silence or equitable estoppel and that the defendant would therefore be estopped in applying the Statute of Frauds to the oral contract. NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 M 310, 678 P2d 1138, 41 St. Rep. 362 (1984), followed, with regard to elements of estoppel, in CB&F Dev. Corp. v. Culbertson St. Bank, 256 M 1, 844 P2d 5, 49 St. Rep. 1122 (1992).

Good Faith Belief That Security Interest Impaired by Breach: Where security agreement between debtor and creditor provided that if debtor leased airplane without consent of creditor, creditor could, at its option, accelerate full payment of loan, where debtor leased airplane to plaintiffs and where creditor eventually repossessed airplane and sold it, plaintiffs were entitled to examination of fairness of acceleration. Trial court's failure to instruct jury that acceleration could only be done if creditor believed in good faith that his security interest was impaired by breach of security agreement was prejudicial error and warranted new trial of plaintiffs' conversion action. Brown v. AVEMCO Inv. Corp. 603 F2d 1367 (9th Cir. 1979).

Source: Former Section 1-204(2)-(3) [30-1-204(2 and (3), 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: This section is derived from subsections (2) and (3) of former Section 1-204 [30-1-204(2 and (3), 2003 MCA]. Subsection (1) of that section [30-1-204(1)] is now incorporated in Section 1-302(b) [30-1-302(2)].

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes it clear that requirements that actions be taken within a "reasonable" time are to be applied in the transactional context of the particular action.

2. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the agreement that fixes the time need not be part of the main agreement, but may occur separately. Notice also that under the definition of "agreement" (Section 1-201) [30-1-201] the circumstances of the transaction, including course of dealing or usages of trade or course of performance may be material. On the question what is a reasonable time these matters will often be important.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in catchline at beginning deleted "Time" and at end substituted "seasonableness" for "seasonably"; in (1) at beginning inserted "Whether a time for taking an action required by", after "code" deleted "requires any action to be taken within a reasonable time, any time which is not manifestly unreasonable may be fixed by agreement. (2) What", and after "reasonable" deleted "time for taking any action"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-1-205. Course of performance, course of dealing, and usage of trade.

Source: Former Sections 1-205, 2-208, and Section 2A-207 [30-1-205, 30-1-208, and 30-2A-207, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: This section integrates the "course of performance" concept from Articles 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] and 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] into the principles of former Section 1-205 [30-1-205, 2003 MCA], which deals with course of dealing and usage of trade. In so doing, the section slightly modifies the articulation of the course of performance rules to fit more comfortably with the approach and structure of former UCC Section 1-205 [30-1-205, 2003 MCA]. There are also slight modifications to be more consistent with the definition of "agreement" in former Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3), 2003 MCA]. It should be noted that a course of performance that might otherwise establish a defense to the obligation of a party to a negotiable instrument is not available as a defense against a holder in due course who took the instrument without notice of that course of performance.

1. The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] rejects both the "lay-dictionary" and the "conveyancer's" reading of a commercial agreement. Instead the meaning of the agreement of the parties is to be determined by the language used by them and by their action, read and interpreted in the light of commercial practices and other surrounding circumstances. The measure and background for interpretation are set by the commercial context, which may explain and supplement even the language of a formal or final writing.

2. "Course of dealing," as defined in subsection (b) [subsection (2)], is restricted, literally, to a sequence of conduct between the parties previous to the agreement. A sequence of conduct after or under the agreement, however, is a "course of performance." "Course of dealing" may enter the agreement either by explicit provisions of the agreement or by tacit recognition.

3. The Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] deals with "usage of trade" as a factor in reaching the commercial meaning of the agreement that the parties have made. The language used is to be interpreted as meaning what it may fairly be expected to mean to parties involved in the particular commercial transaction in a given locality or in a given vocation or trade. By adopting in this context the term "usage of trade," the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] expresses its intent to reject those cases which see evidence of "custom" as representing an effort to displace or negate "established rules of law." A distinction is to be drawn between mandatory rules of law such as the Statute of Frauds provisions of Article 2 on Sales [Title 30, chapter 2] whose very office is to control and restrict the actions of the parties, and which cannot be abrogated by agreement, or by a usage of trade, and those rules of law (such as those in Part 3 of Article 2 on Sales) [Title 30, chapter 2, part 3] which fill in points which the parties have not considered and in fact agreed upon. The latter rules hold "unless otherwise agreed" but yield to the contrary agreement of the parties. Part of the agreement of the parties to which such rules yield is to be sought for in the usages of trade which furnish the background and give particular meaning to the language used, and are the framework of common understanding controlling any general rules of law which hold only when there is no such understanding.

4. A usage of trade under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] must have the "regularity of observance" specified. The ancient English tests for "custom" are abandoned in this connection. Therefore, it is not required that a usage of trade be "ancient or immemorial," "universal," or the like. Under the requirement of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] full recognition is thus available for new usages and for usages currently observed by the great majority of decent dealers, even though dissidents ready to cut corners do not agree. There is room also for proper recognition of usage agreed upon by merchants in trade codes.

5. The policies of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] controlling explicit unconscionable contracts and clauses (Sections 1-304, 2-302) [30-1-203, 30-2-302] apply to implicit clauses that rest on usage of trade and carry forward the policy underlying the ancient requirement that a custom or usage must be "reasonable." However, the emphasis is shifted. The very fact of commercial acceptance makes out a prima facie case that the usage is reasonable, and the burden is no longer on the usage to establish itself as being reasonable. But the anciently established policing of usage by the courts is continued to the extent necessary to cope with the situation arising if an unconscionable or dishonest practice should become standard.

6. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)], giving the prescribed effect to usages of which the parties "are or should be aware," reinforces the provision of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] requiring not universality but only the described "regularity of observance" of the practice or method. This subsection also reinforces the point of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] that such usages may be either general to trade or particular to a special branch of trade.

7. Although the definition of "agreement" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] includes the elements of course of performance, course of dealing, and usage of trade, the fact that express reference is made in some sections to those elements is not to be construed as carrying a contrary intent or implication elsewhere. Compare Section 1-302(c) [30-1-302(3)].

8. In cases of a well established line of usage varying from the general rules of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] where the precise amount of the variation has not been worked out into a single standard, the party relying on the usage is entitled, in any event, to the minimum variation demonstrated. The whole is not to be disregarded because no particular line of detail has been established. In case a dominant pattern has been fairly evidenced, the party relying on the usage is entitled under this section to go to the trier of fact on the question of whether such dominant pattern has been incorporated into the agreement.

9. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] is intended to insure that this Act's [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] liberal recognition of the needs of commerce in regard to usage of trade shall not be made into an instrument of abuse.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in catchline inserted "performance, course of"; inserted (1) relating to course of performance; in (2) substituted "conduct concerning previous transactions" for "previous conduct"; in (3) in last sentence near beginning after "embodied in a" deleted "written", after "similar" substituted "record" for "writing", and at end substituted "record is a question of law" for "writing is for the court"; in (4) in first sentence near beginning inserted "course of performance or" and at end substituted "is relevant in ascertaining the meaning of the parties' agreement and may supplement or qualify the terms of the agreement" for "give particular meaning to and supplement or qualify terms of an agreement" and inserted second sentence relating to usage of trade; in (5) in first sentence at beginning inserted exception clause and near middle substituted "any applicable course of performance" for "an applicable"; in (5)(a) substituted "prevail over course of performance" for "control both"; inserted (5)(b) relating to course of performance prevailing over course of dealing and usage of trade; in (6) substituted "Subject to 30-2-209, a course of performance is relevant to show a waiver or modification of any term inconsistent with the course" for "An applicable usage of trade in the place where any part of performance is to occur shall be used in interpreting the agreement as to that part"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Case Notes

Terms of Price — Custom and Trade Usage at Variance With Contract: Where plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract under which defendant was to purchase approximately 45 truckloads of crushed auto bodies from the plaintiff for $25 a net ton, the defendant would not be heard to contend that custom and usage in the crushed auto body business should allow him to pass along a price decrease from his purchaser to the plaintiff. The custom and usage alleged by the defendant could not have been as widespread and used with the regularity defendant contended or it would have been stated in the contract. It would be unreasonable for the court to negate the explicit terms of the contract. Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. Pepper, 480 F. Supp. 1364 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Course of Dealing: Payor bank's holding and paying of one check to each of two of the plaintiff-payees were not sufficient to form "a sequence of previous conduct" necessary to establish a course of dealing from which an agreement excusing noncompliance with "midnight rule" under 30-4-302 could be implied under 30-1-201. Sun River Cattle Co., Inc. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 237, 521 P2d 679 (1974).

30-1-207. Performance or acceptance under reservation of rights.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 1-308, U.C.C.]

Source: Former Section 1-207 [30-1-207, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: This section is identical to former UCC Section 1-207 [30-1-207, 2003 MCA].

1. This section provides machinery for the continuation of performance along the lines contemplated by the contract despite a pending dispute, by adopting the mercantile device of going ahead with delivery, acceptance, or payment "without prejudice," "under protest," "under reserve," "with reservation of all our rights," and the like. All of these phrases completely reserve all rights within the meaning of this section. The section therefore contemplates that limited as well as general reservations and acceptance by a party may be made "subject to satisfaction of our purchaser," "subject to acceptance by our customers," or the like.

2. This section does not add any new requirement of language of reservation where not already required by law, but merely provides a specific measure on which a party can rely as that party makes or concurs in any interim adjustment in the course of performance. It does not affect or impair the provisions of this Act [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] such as those under which the buyer's remedies for defect survive acceptance without being expressly claimed if notice of the defects is given within a reasonable time. Nor does it disturb the policy of those cases which restrict the effect of a waiver of a defect to reasonable limits under the circumstances, even though no such reservation is expressed.

The section is not addressed to the creation or loss of remedies in the ordinary course of performance but rather to a method of procedure where one party is claiming as of right something which the other believes to be unwarranted.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states that this section does not apply to an accord and satisfaction. Section 3-311 [30-3-311] governs if an accord and satisfaction is attempted by tender of a negotiable instrument as stated in that section. If Section 3-311 [30-3-311] does not apply, the issue of whether an accord and satisfaction has been effected is determined by the law of contract. Whether or not Section 3-311 [30-3-311] applies, this section has no application to an accord and satisfaction.

Changes From Former Law: Except for minor stylistic changes, this section is identical to former UCC Section 1-208 [30-1-208, 2003 MCA].

1. The common use of acceleration clauses in many transactions governed by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], including sales of goods on credit, notes payable at a definite time, and secured transactions, raises an issue as to the effect to be given to a clause that seemingly grants the power to accelerate at the whim and caprice of one party. This section is intended to make clear that despite language that might be so construed and which further might be held to make the agreement void as against public policy or to make the contract illusory or too indefinite for enforcement, the option is to be exercised only in the good faith belief that the prospect of payment or performance is impaired.

Obviously this section has no application to demand instruments or obligations whose very nature permits call at any time with or without reason. This section applies only to an obligation of payment or performance which in the first instance is due at a future date.

Covenant of Good Faith at Issue Only if Breach of Contract Occurs — Summary Judgment Improper: Precision Theatrical Effects (PTE), a manufacturer of explosive pyrotechnical materials, and Nickel, PTE's former owner, obtained five loans from United Banks (United), secured by cash, accounts receivable, and assets. The governing documents securing the loans provided that PTE would be in default if PTE did or failed to do anything that caused United to believe that it would have difficulty in collecting on its loans. After PTE's business was raided and Nickel was arrested for possessing and selling dangerous drugs, United froze PTE's accounts despite their current status and notified PTE and Nickel that the loans were in default. After the District Court granted summary judgment to United, PTE and Nickel appealed, alleging that United breached the implied covenant of good faith when it declared a default and froze all bank accounts. United argued that it had legitimate reasons to believe that its ability to collect on the loans had been jeopardized, and therefore, under the terms of the security agreement, PTE and Nickel were in default. The Supreme Court, in reversing the District Court ruling, held that United's belief that it would have difficulty collecting on the loans and whether it acted with honesty when it froze the accounts must be read in conjunction with its obligation to deal in good faith. The breach of duty of good faith is a question of fact not susceptible to summary judgment. Precision Theatrical Effects, Inc. v. United Banks, N.A., 2006 MT 236, 333 M 505, 143 P3d 442 (2006).

Common-Law Right to Setoff Clarified: The right of setoff exists between any mutual debtors and creditors where the debts have matured and the parties mutually are debtors and creditors of and to each other. It is a general rule that when a depositor is indebted to a bank and the debts are mutual, the bank may apply deposits to a payment of the debt due it by the depositor, provided there is no express agreement to the contrary and the deposit is not specifically applicable to some other purpose. For a bank to establish the right to setoff, the fund to be set off must be owed by the bank to the debtor, the fund must be deposited without restrictions, and the existing indebtedness must be due and owing. Victor Werlhof Aviation Ins. v. Farmers St. Bank, 237 M 51, 771 P2d 962, 46 St. Rep. 613 (1989). See also Sec. St. Bank v. First Nat'l Bank, 78 M 389, 254 P 417 (1927).

Setoff at Time of Presentation of Writ of Execution: A judgment creditor claimed that because a bank took no action to exercise its right of setoff before a writ of execution was presented, the writ took precedence over the setoff. However, the bank acquired a right to setoff at the time payment became delinquent but chose instead to perform the setoff when presented with the writ. The judgment creditor had no greater right against the bank than did the debtor at that time, and because a judgment creditor seeking execution of a debtor's property in possession of a third party stands in the shoes of the debtor as far as the rights of the third party are concerned, the writ did not take precedence. Under these circumstances, 30-4-303 did not apply. The bank properly asserted the setoff at the time the writ was presented. Victor Werlhof Aviation Ins. v. Farmers St. Bank, 237 M 51, 771 P2d 962, 46 St. Rep. 613 (1989).

Setoff Improperly Applied Before Note Due or Default Occurs: A bank applied a setoff before any demand for payment was made or indebtedness matured under the theory of the general bank lien expressed in 71-3-1502 and the right to accelerate performance in good faith under this section. The argument was discounted by the Supreme Court, noting that the right of setoff does not arise simply from the lien and that under the long-established rule that when money is deposited in a bank to the credit of one of its debtors without an express agreement to the contrary or direction to apply to a specific purpose, the bank may apply the deposit only to satisfy past-due indebtedness. Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989), following Sec. St. Bank v. First Nat'l Bank, 78 M 389, 254 P 417 (1927).

Lender's Failure to Honor Renegotiated Loan Payments: Bank's employee, Johnson, told defendants that their note with the bank would be renegotiated to allow further time for payment. Another employee then refused to renegotiate, and he offset defendants' checking account balance against the note without telling defendants, after defendants told him they had relied on Johnson and would not be able to pay on the note's due date. Several of defendants' checks were then dishonored due to insufficient funds. If a duty to exercise good faith is imposed by law rather than by a contract, breach of the duty is tortious and punitive damages are thus recoverable if the conduct is sufficiently culpable. Here, punitive damages could have been granted on the basis of malice, fraud, oppression, or all three, and a new trial was granted because the judge refused to submit the punitive damages issue to the jury. First Nat'l Bank of Libby v. Twombly, 213 M 66, 689 P2d 1226, 41 St. Rep. 1948 (1984). See also Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989).

Invoking Acceleration Clause of Promissory Note Upon Death of Surety: Where deceased had previously cosigned a promissory note in favor of appellant, and appellant in submitting a claim against the deceased's estate sought the allowance of the claim but not the immediate payment of the note, the appellant may not on appeal raise the issue of its right to invoke the acceleration clause of the note and seek immediate payment. In re Estate of Harbaugh, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 495, 39 St. Rep. 84 (1982).

Actions — Fairness Required: Where security agreement between debtor and creditor provided that if debtor leased airplane without consent of creditor, creditor could, at its option, accelerate full payment of loan, where debtor leased airplane to plaintiffs and where creditor eventually repossessed airplane and sold it, plaintiffs were entitled to examination of fairness of acceleration. Trial court's failure to instruct jury that acceleration could only be done if creditor believed in good faith that his security interest was impaired by breach of security agreement was prejudicial error and warranted new trial of plaintiffs' conversion action. Brown v. AVEMCO Inv. Corp. 603 F2d 1367 (9th Cir. 1979).

30-1-209. Subordinated obligations.

Official Comment

Source: Former Section 1-209 [30-1-209, 2003 MCA].

Changes From Former Law: This section is substantively identical to former Section 1-209 [30-1-209, 2003 MCA]. The language in that section stating that it "shall be construed as declaring the law as it existed prior to the enactment of this section and not as modifying it" has been deleted.

1. Billions of dollars of subordinated debt are held by the public and by institutional investors. Commonly, the subordinated debt is subordinated on issue or acquisition and is evidenced by an investment security or by a negotiable or non-negotiable note. Debt is also sometimes subordinated after it arises, either by agreement between the subordinating creditor and the debtor, by agreement between two creditors of the same debtor, or by agreement of all three parties. The subordinated creditor may be a stockholder or other "insider" interested in the common debtor; the subordinated debt may consist of accounts or other rights to payment not evidenced by any instrument. All such cases are included in the terms "subordinated obligation," "subordination," and "subordinated creditor."

2. Subordination agreements are enforceable between the parties as contracts; and in the bankruptcy of the common debtor dividends otherwise payable to the subordinated creditor are turned over to the superior creditor. This "turn-over" practice has on occasion been explained in terms of "equitable lien," "equitable assignment," or "constructive trust," but whatever the label the practice is essentially an equitable remedy and does not mean that there is a transaction "that creates a security interest in personal property . . . by contract" or a "sale of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes" within the meaning of Section 9-109 [30-9A-109]. On the other hand, nothing in this section prevents one creditor from assigning his rights to another creditor of the same debtor in such a way as to create a security interest within Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], where the parties so intend.

3. The enforcement of subordination agreements is largely left to supplementary principles under Section 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103]. If the subordinated debt is evidenced by a certificated security, Section 8-202(a) [30-8-212(1)] authorizes enforcement against purchasers on terms stated or referred to on the security certificate. If the fact of subordination is noted on a negotiable instrument, a holder under Sections 3-302 [30-3-302] and 3-306 [30-3-306] is subject to the term because notice precludes him from taking free of the subordination. Sections 3-302(3)(a) [30-3-302(3)], 3-306 [30-3-306], and 8-317 [30-8-317, now repealed], severely limit the rights of levying creditors of a subordinated creditor in such cases.

[This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Optional Provision: The note accompanying UCC §1-209 provided: "This new section is proposed as an optional provision to make it clear that a subordination agreement does not create a security interest unless so intended."

Case Notes

Breach of Subordination Agreement — Failure to Respond — Summary Judgment Proper: After submitting evidence in support of its motion, defendant moved for summary judgment because plaintiff breached a subordination agreement. The burden shifted to plaintiff to respond, but instead of filing a response brief, plaintiff filed two depositions and a set of discovery answers at the hearing and relied on oral argument. After consideration, the District Court granted summary judgment. Plaintiff appealed, contending that summary judgment was improper because the depositions and discovery answers proved the existence of an intercreditor agreement between defendant and a codefendant, establishing a question of fact whether defendant received all funds to which it was entitled and thus whether defendant had any claim against plaintiff. The Supreme Court disagreed. Breach of the subordination agreement occurred before the intercreditor agreement existed, so the facts presented by plaintiff did not establish a material fact regarding the subordination agreement, and summary judgment was appropriate. Changes From Former Law: These provisions are substantive rather than purely definitional. Accordingly, they have been relocated from Section 1-201 [30-1-201, 2003 MCA] to this section.

1. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a person has notice when, inter alia, the person has received a notification of the fact in question. The subsection leaves open the time and circumstances under which notice or notification may cease to be effective. Therefore such cases as Graham v. White-Phillips Co., 296 U.S. 27, 56 S.Ct. 21, 80 L.Ed. 20 (1935), are not overruled.

2. As shown in subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the word "notifies" is used when the essential fact is the proper dispatch of the notice, not its receipt. Compare "Send." When the essential fact is the other party's receipt of the notice, that is stated. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] states when a notification is received.

3. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] makes clear that reason to know, knowledge, or a notification, although "received" for instance by a clerk in Department A of an organization, is effective for a transaction conducted in Department B only from the time when it was or should have been communicated to the individual conducting that transaction.

Changes From Former Law: This section is substantively identical to those portions of former UCC Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] that distinguished "true" leases from security interests, except that the definition of "present value" formerly embedded in Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] has been placed in UCC Section 1-201(30a) [not adopted].

1. An interest in personal property or fixtures which secures payment or performance of an obligation is a "security interest." See Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA]. Security interests are sometimes created by transactions in the form of leases. Because it can be difficult to distinguish leases that create security interests from those that do not, this section provides rules that govern the determination of whether a transaction in the form of a lease creates a security interest.

2. One of the reasons it was decided to codify the law with respect to leases was to resolve an issue that created considerable confusion in the courts: what is a lease? The confusion existed, in part, due to the last two sentences of the definition of security interest in the 1978 Official Text of the Act, Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA]. The confusion was compounded by the rather considerable change in the federal, state and local tax laws and accounting rules as they relate to leases of goods. The answer is important because the definition of lease determines not only the rights and remedies of the parties to the lease but also those of third parties. If a transaction creates a lease and not a security interest, the lessee's interest in the goods is limited to its leasehold estate; the residual interest in the goods belongs to the lessor. This has significant implications to the lessee's creditors. "On common law theory, the lessor, since he has not parted with title, is entitled to full protection against the lessee's creditors and trustee in bankruptcy . . . ." 1 G. Gilmore, Security Interests in Personal Property §3.6, at 76 (1965).

Under pre-UCC chattel security law there was generally no requirement that the lessor file the lease, a financing statement, or the like, to enforce the lease agreement against the lessee or any third party; the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9) [Title 30, chapter 9A] did not change the common law in that respect. Coogan, Leasing and the Uniform Commercial Code, in Equipment Leasing—Leveraged Leasing 681, 700 n.25, 729 n.80 (2d ed.1980). The Article on Leases (Article 2A) [Title 30, chapter 2A] did not change the law in that respect, except for leases of fixtures. Section 2A-309 [30-2A-309]. An examination of the common law will not provide an adequate answer to the question of what is a lease. The definition of security interest in Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] of the 1978 Official Text of the Act provided that the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9) [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs security interests disguised as leases, i.e., leases intended as security; however, the definition became vague and outmoded.

Lease is defined in Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] as a transfer of the right to possession and use of goods for a term, in return for consideration. Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]. The definition continues by stating that the retention or creation of a security interest is not a lease. Thus, the task of sharpening the line between true leases and security interests disguised as leases continues to be a function of this Article [Title 30, chapter 1].

This section begins where Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] leaves off. It draws a sharper line between leases and security interests disguised as leases to create greater certainty in commercial transactions.

Prior to enactment of the rules in this section, the 1978 text of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] provided that whether a lease was intended as security (i.e., a security interest disguised as a lease) was to be determined from the facts of each case; however, (a) the inclusion of an option to purchase did not itself make the lease one intended for security, and (b) an agreement that upon compliance with the terms of the lease the lessee would become, or had the option to become, the owner of the property for no additional consideration, or for a nominal consideration, did make the lease one intended for security.

Reference to the intent of the parties to create a lease or security interest led to unfortunate results. In discovering intent, courts relied upon factors that were thought to be more consistent with sales or loans than leases. Most of these criteria, however, were as applicable to true leases as to security interests. Examples include the typical net lease provisions, a purported lessor's lack of storage facilities or its character as a financing party rather than a dealer in goods. Accordingly, this section contains no reference to the parties' intent.

Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] are taken from Section 1(2) of the Uniform Conditional Sales Act (act withdrawn 1943), modified to reflect current leasing practice. Thus, reference to the case law prior to this Act will provide a useful source of precedent. Gilmore, Security Law, Formalism and Article 9, 47 Neb.L.Rev. 659, 671 (1968). Whether a transaction creates a lease or a security interest continues to be determined by the facts of each case. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] further provides that a transaction creates a security interest if the lessee has an obligation to continue paying consideration for the term of the lease, if the obligation is not terminable by the lessee (thus correcting early statutory gloss, e.g., In re Royer's Bakery, Inc., 1 U.C.C. Rep.Serv. (Callaghan) 342 (Bankr.E.D.Pa.1963)) and if one of four additional tests is met. The first of these four tests, subparagraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)], is that the original lease term is equal to or greater than the remaining economic life of the goods. The second of these tests, subparagraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)], is that the lessee is either bound to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods or to become the owner of the goods. In re Gehrke Enters., 1 Bankr. 647, 651-52 (Bankr.W.D.Wis.1979). The third of these tests, subparagraph (3) [subsection (2)(c)], is whether the lessee has an option to renew the lease for the remaining economic life or the goods for no additional consideration or for nominal additional consideration, which is defined later in this section. In re Celeryvale Transp., 44 Bankr. 1007, 1014-15 (Bankr.E.D.Tenn.1984). The fourth of these tests, subparagraph (4) [subsection (2)(d)], is whether the lessee has an option to become the owner of the goods for no additional consideration or for nominal additional consideration. All of these tests focus on economics, not the intent of the parties. In re Berge, 32 Bankr. 370, 371-73 (Bankr.W.D.Wis.1983).

The focus on economics is reinforced by subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. It states that a transaction does not create a security interest merely because the transaction has certain characteristics listed therein. Subparagraph (1) [subsection (3)(a)] has no statutory derivative; it states that a full payout lease does not per se create a security interest. Rushton v. Shea, 419 F.Supp. 1349, 1365 (D.Del.1976). Subparagraph (2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides the same regarding the provisions of the typical net lease. Compare All-States Leasing Co. v. Ochs, 42 Or.App. 319, 600 P.2d 899 (Ct.App.1979) with In re Tillery, 571 F.2d 1361 (5th Cir.1978). Subparagraph (3) [subsection (3)(c)] restates and expands the provisions of former Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37), 2003 MCA] to make clear that the option can be to buy or renew. Subparagraphs (4) and (5) [subsections (3)(d) and (3)(e)] treat fixed price options and provide that fair market value must be determined at the time the transaction is entered into. Compare Arnold Mach. Co. v. Balls, 624 P.2d 678 (Utah 1981), with Aoki v. Shepherd Mach. Co., 665 F.2d 941 (9th Cir.1982).

The relationship of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] to subsection (c) [subsection (3)] deserves to be explored. The fixed price purchase option provides a useful example. A fixed price purchase option in a lease does not of itself create a security interest. This is particularly true if the fixed price is equal to or greater than the reasonably predictable fair market value of the goods at the time the option is to be performed. A security interest is created only if the option price is nominal and the conditions stated in the introduction to the second paragraph of this subsection are met. There is a set of purchase options whose fixed price is less than fair market value but greater than nominal that must be determined on the facts of each case to ascertain whether the transaction in which the option is included creates a lease or a security interest.

It was possible to provide for various other permutations and combinations with respect to options to purchase and renew. For example, this section could have stated a rule to govern the facts of In re Marhoefer Packing Co., 674 F.2d 1139 (7th Cir.1982). This was not done because it would unnecessarily complicate the definition. Further development of this rule is left to the courts.

Subsections (d) [subsections (4)(a) and (4)(b)] and (e) [subsection (4)(c)] provide definitions and rules of construction.

Changes From Former Law: Unchanged from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201(44), 2003 MCA], which was derived from Sections 25, 26, 27, 191, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law; Section 76, Uniform Sales Act; Section 53, Uniform Bills of Lading Act; Section 58, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 22(1), Uniform Stock Transfer Act; Section 1, Uniform Trust Receipts Act. These provisions are substantive rather than purely definitional. Accordingly, they have been relocated from former Section 1-201 [30-1-201(44), MCA] to this section.

1. All the Uniform Acts in the commercial law field (except the Uniform Conditional Sales Act) have carried definitions of "value." All those definitions provided that value was any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract, including the taking of property in satisfaction of or as security for a pre-existing claim. Subsections (1), (2), and (4) in substance continue the definitions of "value" in the earlier acts. Subsection (3) makes explicit that "value" is also given in a third situation: where a buyer by taking delivery under a pre-existing contract converts a contingent into a fixed obligation.

This definition is not applicable to Articles 3 and 4 [Title 30, chapters 3 and 4], but the express inclusion of immediately available credit as value follows the separate definitions in those Articles. See Sections 4-208, 4-209, 3-303 [30-4-215, 30-4-216, 30-3-303]. A bank or other financing agency which in good faith makes advances against property held as collateral becomes a bona fide purchaser of that property even though provision may be made for charge-back in case of trouble. Checking credit is "immediately available" within the meaning of this section if the bank would be subject to an action for slander of credit in case checks drawn against the credit were dishonored, and when a charge-back is not discretionary with the bank, but may only be made when difficulties in collection arise in connection with the specific transaction involved.

Source: Former Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA]. [Montana substantially revised the uniform section and the Montana version more closely resembles the versions adopted in Minnesota and Idaho.]

Changes From Former Law: Section 1-301 [30-1-301], which replaces former UCC Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA], represents a significant rethinking of choice of law issues addressed in that section. The new section reexamines both the power of parties to select the jurisdiction whose law will govern their transaction and the determination of the governing law in the absence of such selection by the parties. With respect to the power to select governing law, the draft affords greater party autonomy than former Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA], but with important safeguards protecting consumer interests and fundamental policies. While the Drafting Committee considered addressing the related topic of forum selection clauses, it ultimately decided that Article 1 of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapter 1] is not an appropriate vehicle for addressing this issue.

Revised UCC Section 1-301 [30-1-301] addresses contractual designation of governing law somewhat differently than does former Section 1-105 [30-1-105, 2003 MCA]. Former law allows the parties to any transaction to designate a jurisdiction whose law governs if the transaction bears a "reasonable relation" to that jurisdiction. Revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] deviates from this unified approach by providing different rules for consumer transactions than for "business to business" transactions.

In the context of consumer transactions, revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1], unlike former law, generally protects consumers against the possibility of losing the protection of consumer protection laws of their home jurisdiction.

In the context of business-to-business transactions, revised Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] generally provides the parties with greater autonomy to designate a jurisdiction whose law will govern than does former Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1], but also provides some safeguards against abuse that do not appear in former Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. Following emerging international norms, greater autonomy is provided in subsections (b) and (c) [(b) not adopted and (c) partially adopted as 30-1-301(1)] by deleting the requirement that the transaction bear a "reasonable relation" to the jurisdiction designated in this non-consumer context. It should be noted in this regard that in the case of wholly domestic transactions the jurisdiction designated must be a State. An important safeguard not present in former law is provided in subsection (e) [not adopted]. Subsection (e) [not adopted] indicates that the designation of a jurisdiction's law is not effective (even if the transaction bears a reasonable relation to that jurisdiction) to the extent that application of that law would be contrary to a fundamental policy of the jurisdiction whose law would govern in the absence of contractual designation. Application of the law designated may be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern either because of the nature of the law designated or because of the "mandatory" nature of the law that would otherwise apply.

In the absence of an effective contractual designation of governing law, former UCC Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1), 2003 MCA] directs the forum to apply its own law if the transaction bears "an appropriate relation to this state." This provision, however, is frequently ignored by courts. Revised UCC Section 1-301(c) [partially 30-1-301(1)] provides simply that, in the absence of contractual designation, the court should apply the forum's choice of law principles.

1. Applicability of section. This section is neither a full Restatement of choice of law principles nor a free-standing choice of law statute. Rather, it is a provision of Article 1 of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapter 1]. As such, it is subject to Section 1-102 [30-1-101(4)], which states the scope of Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. As that section [30-1-101(4)] indicates, Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1], and the rules contained therein, apply to transactions to the extent that they are governed by one of the other Articles of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 2 through 5, 7, 8, and 9A]. Thus, this section does not apply to a transaction outside the scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] such as a services contract or a contract for the sale of real estate. On the other hand, if the transaction is within the scope of a substantive Article of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], such as in the case of a sale or lease of goods, this section does apply.

In some cases, a transaction is neither completely within the scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] (as in the case of a sale or lease of goods) nor completely outside the scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] (as in the case of a contract for the sale of real estate). Rather, some aspects of the transaction are within the substantive scope of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] while other aspects are not. One example of this phenomenon is an agreement to loan money in which the borrower's obligation to repay the loan is secured by a security interest in personal property. The security agreement, and the security interest created thereby, are clearly within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The loan agreement, on the other hand, is governed not by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] but by the general law of contracts. Another example is provided by a real estate lease in which the lessee's obligation to pay the stated rent is backed by a standby letter of credit issued by a bank. The lease is governed by realty law outside the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], while the letter of credit is governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. While this section, by its terms, only applies to the UCC aspect of such a "mixed transaction," it is within a court's discretion to decide in a particular case that bifurcation of the choice of law principles applicable to the transaction is inadvisable and, accordingly, to apply principles of this section to the non-UCC aspects of the transaction in order to have the law of the same State or country apply to the entire transaction. When the UCC aspects of such a "mixed transaction" predominate, such a decision may be particularly appropriate.

2. Contractual choice of law. This section allows parties broad autonomy, with several important limitations, to select the law governing their transaction, even if the transaction does not bear a relation to the State or country whose law is selected. This recognition of party autonomy with respect to governing law has already been established in several Articles of the Uniform Commercial Code (see UCC Sections 4A-507, 5-116, and 8-110) [30-4A-507, 30-5-136, and 30-8-120] and is consistent with international norms. See, e.g., Inter-American Convention on the Law Applicable to International Contracts, Article 7 (Mexico City 1994); Convention on the Law Applicable to Contracts for the International Sale of Goods, Article 7(1) (The Hague 1986); EC Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations, Article 3(1) (Rome 1980).

There are three important limitations on this party autonomy to select governing law. First, a different, and more protective, rule applies in the context of consumer transactions (see note c). Second, in an entirely domestic transaction, this section does not validate the selection of foreign law. (See note d.) Third, contractual choice of law will not be given effect to the extent that application of the law designated would be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would be applied in the absence of such contractual designation (see Comment 5).

The Drafting Committee considered whether this section should expressly provide for the ability of parties to designate non-legal codes such as trade codes as the set of rules governing their transaction, but decided that the principles of Section 1-302 [30-1-302] allowing parties broad freedom of contract to structure their relation are adequate for this purpose. A similar decision was made with respect to the ability of the parties to designate recognized bodies of rules or principles applicable to commercial transactions that are promulgated by intergovernmental authorities such as UNCITRAL or UNIDROIT. See, e.g., UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts.

3. Consumer transactions. If one of the parties is a consumer (as defined in Section 1-201(11a)) [30-1-201(2)(l)], subsection (d) [30-1-301(2), substantially modified] provides the parties less autonomy to designate the State or country whose law will govern. First, in a consumer transaction subsection (d)(1) [30-1-301(2), substantially modified] provides that the transaction must bear a reasonable relation to the State or country designated. Second, except as noted below, subsection (d)(2) [not adopted] provides that a designation of the law of a State or country other than that of the consumer's habitual residence, even if the transaction bears a reasonable relation to that State or country, will not deprive the consumer of the protection of any rules of law of the consumer's habitual residence which are protective of consumers and are not variable by agreement. (It should be noted that the phrase "rule of law" is intended to refer to case law as well as statutes and administrative regulations.) Thus, for example, in the case of a sale of goods by a seller in Indiana to a consumer buyer in New York, in which transaction the contract designates Indiana law as governing, the New York buyer will retain the protection of nonwaivable New York rules of law that are protective of consumers.

There is one exception to this principle. In the case of a sale of goods to a consumer in which the consumer makes the contract and takes possession of the goods in a State or country other than the consumer's habitual residence, subsection (d)(2)(B) [not adopted] provides that it is the consumer protection rules of law of that State or country that cannot be eliminated by choice of law. Thus, for example, if a New York consumer, while on vacation in Indiana, buys goods and takes delivery of them at an Indiana branch of an Ohio retailer, and the contract designates Ohio law as governing, this choice of law may not deprive the New York consumer buyer of nonwaivable Indiana rules of law that are protective of consumers, but may deprive that buyer of analogous New York rules. This exception, adapted from UCC Section 2A-106 [30-2A-106] and Article 5 of the EC Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations, enables a seller that engages in only face-to-face transactions to ascertain in advance which consumer protection law it is subject to. The reference in subsection (d)(2)(B) [not adopted] to the State or country in which the consumer makes the contract should not be read to incorporate formalistic concepts of where the last event necessary to conclude the contract took place; rather, the intent is to identify the State in which all material steps were taken by the consumer to enter into the contract.

In the absence of a contractual designation of governing law, application of the choice of law rules of the forum, as mandated by subsection (c) [partially 30-1-301(1)], could lead to application of the laws of a State or country other than that of the consumer's habitual residence. In such a case, subsection (d)(2) [not adopted] still applies to preserve consumer protection rules for the benefit of the consumer as described in the preceding paragraph.

4. Wholly domestic transactions. While this section provides parties broad autonomy to select governing law, that autonomy is limited in the case of wholly domestic transactions. In a "domestic transaction," subsection (b)(1) [not adopted] validates only the designation of the law of a State. A "domestic transaction" is a transaction that does not bear a reasonable relation to a country other than the United States. See subsection (a) [not adopted]. Thus, in a wholly domestic non-consumer transaction, parties may (subject to the limitations set out in subsections (e) and (f) [not adopted]) designate the law of any State but not the law of a foreign country.

5. International transactions. This section provides greater autonomy in the context of international transactions. As defined in subsection (a)(2) [not adopted], a transaction is an "international transaction" if it bears a reasonable relation to a country other than the United States. In a non-consumer international transaction, subsection (b)(2) [not adopted] provides that a designation of the law of any State or country is effective (subject, of course, to the limitations set out in subsections (e) and (f) [not adopted]). It is important to note that the transaction need not bear a relation to the State or country designated so long as the transaction is international. Thus, for example, in a non-consumer lease of goods in which the lessor is located in Mexico and the lessee is located in Louisiana, a designation of the law of Ireland to govern the transaction would be given effect under this section even though the transaction may bear no relation to Ireland. The ability to designate the law of any country in non-consumer international transactions is important in light of the common practice in many commercial contexts of designating the law of a "neutral" jurisdiction whose law is well-developed.

6. Fundamental policy. Subsection (e) [not adopted] provides that an agreement designating the governing law will not be given effect to the extent that application of the designated law would be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern. This rule provides a narrow exception to the broad autonomy afforded to parties in subsection (b) [not adopted]. One of the prime objectives of contract law is to protect the justified expectations of the parties and to make it possible for them to foretell with accuracy what will be their rights and liabilities under the contract. In this way, certainty and predictability of result are most likely to be secured. See Restatement (Second) Conflict of Laws, §187, comment e.

Under the fundamental policy doctrine, a court should not refrain from applying the designated law merely because this would lead to a result different than would be obtained under the local law of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern. Rather, the difference must be contrary to a public policy that is so substantial that it justifies overriding the concerns for certainty and predictability underlying modern commercial law as well as concerns for judicial economy generally. Thus, application of the designated law will rarely be found to be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern when the difference between the two concerns a requirement, such as a statute of frauds, that relates to formalities, or general rules of contract law, such as those concerned with the need for consideration.

The opinion of Judge Cardozo in Loucks v. Standard Oil Co. of New York, 120 N.E. 198 (1918), regarding the related issue of when a state court may decline to apply the law of another State, is a helpful touchstone here:

Our own scheme of legislation may be different. We may even have no legislation on the subject. That is not enough to show that public policy forbids us to enforce the foreign right. A right of action is property. If a foreign statute gives the right, the mere fact that we do not give a like right is no reason for refusing to help the plaintiff in getting what belongs to him. We are not so provincial as to say that every solution of a problem is wrong because we deal with it otherwise at home. Similarity of legislation has indeed this importance; its presence shows beyond question that the foreign statute does not offend the local policy. But its absence does not prove the contrary. It is not to be exalted into an indispensable condition. The misleading word 'comity' has been responsible for much of the trouble. It has been fertile in suggesting a discretion unregulated by general principles.

The courts are not free to refuse to enforce a foreign right at the pleasure of the judges, to suit the individual notion of expediency or fairness. They do not close their doors, unless help would violate some fundamental principle of justice, some prevalent conception of good morals, some deep-rooted tradition of the common weal. 120 N.E. at 201-02 (citations to authorities omitted).

Analytically, one might conclude that application of the designated law is contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern either (i) because the substance of the designated law violates a fundamental principle of justice of that State or country or (ii) because it differs from a rule of that State or country that is "mandatory" in that it must be applied in the courts of that State or country without regard to otherwise-applicable choice of law rules of that State or country and without regard to whether the designated law is otherwise offensive. This distinction, which may have more theoretical than practical significance, has been suggested in some international conventions in this area, although in some cases the concept is applied to authorize the forum State to apply its mandatory rules, rather than those of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern. The latter situation is not addressed by this section. See Comment 9.

In any event, it is obvious that a rule that is freely changeable by agreement of the parties under the law of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern can hardly be construed as a mandatory rule of that State or country. This does not mean, however, that rules that cannot be changed by agreement under that law are, for that reason alone, mandatory rules. Otherwise, contractual choice of law in the UCC context would be illusory and redundant; the parties would be able to accomplish by choice of law no more than can be accomplished under Section 1-302 (by agreeing to vary the rules that would otherwise govern their transaction by substituting for those rules the rules that would apply if the transaction were governed by the designated State or country) without designation of governing law. Indeed, other than cases in which a mandatory choice of law rule is established by statute (see, e.g., UCC Sections 9-301 through 9-307 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307], explicitly preserved in subsection (f) [not adopted]), cases in which courts have declined to follow the designated law solely because a rule of the State or country whose law would otherwise govern is mandatory are rare.

7. Choice of law in the absence of contractual designation. Subsection (c) [partially 30-1-301(1)], which replaces the second sentence of former UCC Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1), 2003 MCA], determines which jurisdiction's law governs a transaction in the absence of an effective contractual choice by the parties. Former Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1), 2003 MCA], provided that the law of the forum (i.e., the Uniform Commercial Code) applies if the transaction bears "an appropriate relation to this state." By using an "appropriate relation" test, rather than, say, requiring that the forum be the location of the "most significant" contact, Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1), 2003 MCA] expressed a bias in favor of applying the forum's law. This bias, while not universally respected by the courts, was justifiable in light of the uncertainty that existed at the time of drafting as to whether the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] would be adopted by all the States; the pro-forum bias would assure that the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] would be applied so long as the transaction bore an "appropriate" relation to the forum. Inasmuch as the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] has been adopted, at least in part, in all U.S. jurisdictions, the vitality of this point is minimal in the domestic context, and international comity concerns militate against continuing the pro-forum, pro-UCC bias in transnational transactions. When the choice is between the law of two jurisdictions that have adopted the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A], but whose law differs (whether because of differences in enacted language or differing judicial interpretations), there is no strong justification for directing a court to apply different choice of law rules to its determination than it would apply if the matter were not governed by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. Similarly, given the wide variety of choice of law principles applied by the States, it would not be prudent to designate only one such principle as the proper one for transactions governed by the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. Accordingly, in cases in which the parties have not made an effective choice of law, Section 1-301(a) [not adopted] simply directs the forum to apply its ordinary choice of law principles to determine which jurisdiction's law governs.

8. Primacy of other UCC choice of law rules. Subsection (f) [subsection (3)], which is essentially identical to former UCC Section 1-105(2) [30-1-105(2), 2003 MCA], indicates that choice of law rules provided in the other Articles govern when applicable.

9. Matters not addressed by this section. As noted in Comment 1, this section is not a complete statement of conflict of laws doctrines applicable in commercial cases. In particular, this section does not address, and leaves to other law, two issues that relate to the forum and its law. First, a forum will occasionally decline to apply the law of a different jurisdiction selected by the parties when application of that law would be contrary to a fundamental policy of the forum jurisdiction, even if it would not be contrary to a fundamental policy of the State or country whose law would govern in the absence of contractual designation. Standards for application of this doctrine relate primarily to concepts of sovereignty rather than commercial law and are thus left to the courts. Second, in determining whether to give effect to the parties' agreement that the law of a particular State or country will govern their relationship, courts must, of necessity, address some issues as to the basic validity of that agreement. These issues might relate, for example, to capacity to contract and absence of duress. This section does not address these issues.

Changes From Former Law: This section combines the rules from subsections (3) and (4) of former Section 1-102 [30-1-102(3) and (4)] and subsection (1) of former Section 1-204 [30-1-204(1)]. No substantive changes are made.

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states affirmatively at the outset that freedom of contract is a principle of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]: "the effect" of its provisions may be varied by "agreement." The meaning of the statute itself must be found in its text, including its definitions, and in appropriate extrinsic aids; it cannot be varied by agreement. But the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] seeks to avoid the type of interference with evolutionary growth found in pre-Code cases such as Manhattan Co. v. Morgan, 242 N.Y. 38, 150 N.E. 594 (1926). Thus private parties cannot make an instrument negotiable within the meaning of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] except as provided in Section 3-104 [30-3-104]; nor can they change the meaning of such terms as "bona fide purchaser," "holder in due course," or "due negotiation," as used in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. But an agreement can change the legal consequences that would otherwise flow from the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]. "Agreement" here includes the effect given to course of dealing, usage of trade and course of performance by Sections 1-201 [30-1-201] and 1-303 [30-1-205]; the effect of an agreement on the rights of third parties is left to specific provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code and to supplementary principles applicable under Section 1-103 [30-1-102(1) and 30-1-103]. The rights of third parties under Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] when a security interest is unperfected, for example, cannot be destroyed by a clause in the security agreement.

This principle of freedom of contract is subject to specific exceptions found elsewhere in the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] and to the general exception stated here. The specific exceptions vary in explicitness: the statute of frauds found in Section 2-201 [30-2-201], for example, does not explicitly preclude oral waiver of the requirement of a writing, but a fair reading denies enforcement to such a waiver as part of the "contract" made unenforceable; Section 9-602 [30-9A-602], on the other hand, is a quite explicit limitation on freedom of contract. Under the exception for "the obligations of good faith, diligence, reasonableness and care prescribed by [the Uniform Commercial Code] [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A]," provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] prescribing such obligations are not to be disclaimed. However, the section also recognizes the prevailing practice of having agreements set forth standards by which due diligence is measured and explicitly provides that, in the absence of a showing that the standards manifestly are unreasonable, the agreement controls. In this connection, Section 1-303 [30-1-205] incorporating into the agreement prior course of dealing and usages of trade is of particular importance.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] also recognizes that nothing is stronger evidence of a reasonable time than the fixing of such time by a fair agreement between the parties. However, provision is made for disregarding a clause which whether by inadvertence or overreaching fixes a time so unreasonable that it amounts to eliminating all remedy under the contract. The parties are not required to fix the most reasonable time but may fix any time which is not obviously unfair as judged by the time of contracting.

2. An agreement that varies the effect of provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] may do so by stating the rules that will govern in lieu of the provisions varied. Alternatively, the parties may vary the effect of such provisions by stating that their relationship will be governed by recognized bodies of rules or principles applicable to commercial transactions. Such bodies of rules or principles may include, for example, those that are promulgated by intergovernmental authorities such as UNCITRAL or UNIDROIT (see, e.g., UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts), or non-legal codes such as trade codes.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is intended to make it clear that, as a matter of drafting, phrases such as "unless otherwise agreed" have been used to avoid controversy as to whether the subject matter of a particular section does or does not fall within the exceptions to subsection (b) [subsection (2)], but absence of such words contains no negative implication since under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the general and residual rule is that the effect of all provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code [Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A] may be varied by agreement.

Short Title, General Construction, and Subject Matter

30-2-101. Short title.

Official Comment

This Chapter is a complete revision and modernization of the Uniform Sales Act which was promulgated by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1906 and has been adopted in 36 states and the District of Columbia.

The coverage of the present Chapter is much more extensive than that of the old Sales Act and extends to the various bodies of case law which have been developed both outside of and under the latter.

The arrangement of the present Chapter is in terms of contract for sale and the various steps of its performance. The legal consequences are stated as following directly from the contract and action taken under it without resorting to the idea of when property or title passed or was to pass as being the determining factor. The purpose is to avoid making practical issues between practical men turn upon the location of an intangible something, the passing of which no man can prove by evidence and to substitute for such abstractions proof of words and actions of a tangible character.

30-2-102. Scope — certain security and other transactions excluded from this chapter.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 75, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Section 75 has been rephrased.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter: To make it clear that:

The Chapter leaves substantially unaffected the law relating to purchase money security such as conditional sale or chattel mortgage though it regulates the general sales aspects of such transactions. "Security transaction" is used in the same sense as in the Chapter on Secured Transactions (Chapter 9A).

Case Notes

Foreseeability Not Required in Breach of Contract Action Under Uniform Commercial Code When Injury Results From Breach of Warranty: A breach of contract action under the Uniform Commercial Code does not require foreseeability if injury to person or property proximately results from any breach of warranty. Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Lease Transaction Actually Sales Agreement Subject to U.C.C. Provisions: Vendees leased a printing press from vendor; after making numerous monthly payments, vendees would obtain title to the press on payment of a small sum. As agreement contains an option to purchase at the end of the lease agreement, it falls within the sale of goods provisions of the U.C.C. Beneficial Commercial Corp. v. Cottrell, 212 M 493, 688 P2d 1254, 41 St. Rep. 1888 (1984).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplements the Montana U.C.C. which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Scope of the Statute of Frauds — Section as Applying to Sale of Registered Horses: Appellant's contention, arguing that an oral contract for the purchase and sale of five registered horses is not within the scope of the Statute of Frauds (30-2-201) and is therefore enforceable despite the lack of a writing confirming the contract, is not supportable. The transaction does not come within any of the exclusions provided for in 30-2-102. Scott v. Hjelm, 188 M 375, 613 P2d 1385, 37 St. Rep. 1219 (1980).

30-2-103. Definitions and index of definitions.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-103, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1): Section 76, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes:

The definitions of "buyer" and "seller" have been slightly rephrased, the reference in Section 76 of the prior Act to "any legal successor in interest of such person" being omitted. The definition of "receipt" is new.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. The phrase "any legal successor in interest of such person" has been eliminated since Section 30-2-210 of this Chapter, which limits some types of delegation of performance on assignment of a sales contract, makes it clear that not every such successor can be safely included in the definition. In every ordinary case, however, such successors are as of course included.

2. "Receipt" must be distinguished from delivery particularly in regard to the problems arising out of shipment of goods, whether or not the contract calls for making delivery by way of documents of title, since the seller may frequently fulfill his obligations to "deliver" even though the buyer may never "receive" the goods. Delivery with respect to documents of title is defined in Chapter 1 and requires transfer of physical delivery of a tangible document of title and transfer of control of an electronic document of title. Otherwise the many divergent incidents of delivery are handled incident by incident.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 in (3) in reference to "consumer goods" substituted "30-9-122" (renumbered 30-9A-102) for "30-9-109". Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1991 Amendment: In (3), in citation for "dishonor", substituted "30-3-512" for "30-3-507"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

Tort of Bad Faith — Not Available for Most Contract Actions — Breach: In a contract action, the Supreme Court ruled that a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing constituted a breach of the contract and that only contract damages would be available to the prevailing party. The court stated that tort-type damages would not be available for a breach of the covenant. The court also held that the tort of bad faith would apply only in exceptional circumstances to discourage oppression in contracts that necessarily give one party a superior position. Every contract, regardless of the type, contains an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. A breach of the covenant is a breach of the contract. Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767, 47 St. Rep. 850 (1990), followed in Keller v. Dooling, 248 M 535, 813 P2d 437, 48 St. Rep. 554 (1991), Haines Pipeline Constr., Inc. v. Mont. Power Co., 251 M 422, 830 P2d 1230, 48 St. Rep. 1102 (1991), in McNeil v. Currie, 253 M 9, 830 P2d 1241, 49 St. Rep. 312 (1992), and Kneeland v. Luzenac America, Inc., 1998 MT 136, 289 M 201, 961 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 541 (1998).

30-2-104. Definitions — "merchant" — "between merchants" — "financing agency".

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None. But see Sections 15(2), (5), 16(c), 45(2) and 71, Uniform Sales Act, and Sections 35 and 37, Uniform Bills of Lading Act for examples of the policy expressly provided for in this Chapter.

Purposes:

1. This Chapter assumes that transactions between professionals in a given field require special and clear rules which may not apply to a casual or inexperienced seller or buyer. It thus adopts a policy of expressly stating rules applicable "between merchants" and "as against a merchant", wherever they are needed instead of making them depend upon the circumstances of each case as in the statutes cited above. This section lays the foundation of this policy by defining those who are to be regarded as professionals or "merchants" and by stating when a transaction is deemed to be "between merchants".

2. The term "merchant" as defined here roots in the "law merchant" concept of a professional in business. The professional status under the definition may be based upon specialized knowledge as to the goods, specialized knowledge as to business practices, or specialized knowledge as to both and which kind of specialized knowledge may be sufficient to establish the merchant status is indicated by the nature of the provisions.

The special provisions as to merchants appear only in this Chapter and they are of three kinds. Sections 30-2-201(2), 30-2-205, 30-2-207 and 30-2-209 dealing with the statute of frauds, firm offers, confirmatory memoranda and modification rest on normal business practices which are or ought to be typical of and familiar to any person in business. For purposes of these sections almost every person in business would, therefore, be deemed to be a "merchant" under the language "who . . . by his occupation holds himself out as having knowledge or skill peculiar to the practices . . . involved in the transaction . ." since the practices involved in the transaction are non-specialized business practices such as answering mail. In this type of provision, banks or even universities, for example, well may be "merchants." But even these sections only apply to a merchant in his mercantile capacity; a lawyer or bank president buying fishing tackle for his own use is not a merchant.

On the other hand, in Section 30-2-314 on the warranty of merchantability, such warranty is implied only "if the seller is a merchant with respect to goods of that kind." Obviously this qualification restricts the implied warranty to a much smaller group than everyone who is engaged in business and requires a professional status as to particular kinds of goods. The exception in Section 30-2-402(2) for retention of possession by a merchant-seller falls in the same class; as does Section 30-2-403(2) on entrusting of possession to a merchant "who deals in goods of that kind".

A third group of sections includes 30-2-103(1)(b), which provides that in the case of a merchant "good faith" includes observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade; 30-2-327(1)(c), 30-2-603 and 30-2-605, dealing with responsibilities of merchant buyers to follow seller's instructions, etc.; 30-2-509 on risk of loss, and 30-2-609 on adequate assurance of performance. This group of sections applies to persons who are merchants under either the "practices" or the "goods" aspect of the definition of merchant.

3. The "or to whom such knowledge or skill may be attributed by his employment of an agent or broker . . ." clause of the definition of merchant means that even persons such as universities, for example, can come within the definition of merchant if they have regular purchasing departments or business personnel who are familiar with business practices and who are equipped to take any action required.

Compiler's Comments

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (1) near beginning substituted "is held out by occupation" for "by his occupation holds himself out" and near end substituted "that is held out by occupation" for "who by his occupation holds himself out"; in (2) near end of first sentence after "accompany" inserted "or are associated with"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Case Notes

Foreseeability Not Required in Breach of Contract Action Under Uniform Commercial Code When Injury Results From Breach of Warranty: A breach of contract action under the Uniform Commercial Code does not require foreseeability if injury to person or property proximately results from any breach of warranty. Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Average Farmer Not a "Merchant": Faced with the absence of controlling state precedent, the federal District Court assumed that the Montana courts would follow the majority of states in finding that the average farmer is not a "merchant" as defined by 30-2-104. The issue must be determined on a case-by-case basis to see if the farmer possesses a special skill or knowledge in the marketing of grain. Where a farmer's sole connection with the grain market was the sale of his annual crop to the local grain elevators, such special skill or knowledge did not exist. Pierson v. Arnst, 534 F. Supp. 360, 39 St. Rep. 676 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

State as Merchant: It may well be that a state may be a merchant in some circumstances. However, the plaintiff did not carry its burden of proof in demonstrating that the state was a merchant in this transaction. W. Sign, Inc. v. St., 180 M 278, 590 P2d 141 (1979).

30-2-105. Definitions — transferability — "goods" — "future" goods — "lot" — "commercial unit".

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsections (1), (2), (3) and (4)—Sections 5, 6 and 76, Uniform Sales Act; Subsections (5) and (6)—none.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Subsection (1) on "goods": The phraseology of the prior uniform statutory provision has been changed so that:

The definition of goods is based on the concept of movability and the term "chattels personal" is not used. It is not intended to deal with things which are not fairly identifiable as movables before the contract is performed.

Growing crops are included within the definition of goods since they are frequently intended for sale. The concept of "industrial" growing crops has been abandoned, for under modern practices fruit, perennial hay, nursery stock and the like must be brought within the scope of this Chapter. The young of animals are also included expressly in this definition since they, too, are frequently intended for sale and may be contracted for before birth. The period of gestation of domestic animals is such that the provisions of the section on identification can apply as in the case of crops to be planted. The reason of this definition also leads to the inclusion of a wool crop or the like as "goods" subject to identification under this Chapter.

The exclusion of "money in which the price is to be paid" from the definition of goods does not mean that foreign currency which is included in the definition of money may not be the subject matter of a sales transaction. Goods is intended to cover the sale of money when money is being treated as a commodity but not to include it when money is the medium of payment.

As to contracts to sell timber, minerals, or structures to be removed from the land Section 30-2-107(1) (Goods to be severed from Realty: recording) controls.

The use of the word "fixtures" is avoided in view of the diversity of definitions of that term. This Chapter in including within its scope "things attached to realty" adds the further test that they must be capable of severance without material harm thereto. As between the parties any identified things which fall within that definition become "goods" upon the making of the contract for sale.

"Investment securities" are expressly excluded from the coverage of this Chapter. It is not intended by this exclusion, however, to prevent the application of a particular section of this Chapter by analogy to securities (as was done with the Original Sales Act in Agar v. Orda, 264 N.Y. 248, 190 N.E. 479, 99 A.L.R. 269 (1934)) when the reason of that section makes such application sensible and the situation involved is not covered by the Chapter of this Act dealing specifically with such securities (Chapter 8).

2. References to the fact that a contract for sale can extend to future or contingent goods and that ownership in common follows the sale of a part interest have been omitted here as obvious without need for expression; hence no inference to negate these principles should be drawn from their omission.

3. Subsection (4) does not touch the question of how far an appropriation of a bulk of fungible goods may or may not satisfy the contract for sale.

4. Subsections (5) and (6) on "lot" and "commercial unit" are introduced to aid in the phrasing of later sections.

5. The question of when an identification of goods takes place is determined by the provisions of Section 30-2-501 and all that this section says is what kinds of goods may be the subject of a sale.

Case Notes

Foreseeability Not Required in Breach of Contract Action Under Uniform Commercial Code When Injury Results From Breach of Warranty: A breach of contract action under the Uniform Commercial Code does not require foreseeability if injury to person or property proximately results from any breach of warranty. Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Sale of Front-End Loader — Applicable Parol Evidence Rule: Front-end loader that buyer purchased from seller was within the definition of "goods" set out in 30-2-105. Therefore, the sale was governed by the Montana Uniform Commercial Code, and any Code provisions addressing a parol evidence question controlled the answer to the question, with the contract law parol evidence rule of 28-2-904 being used only to supplement the Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. The purchase and sale of the round hay baler were transactions in goods covered by the U.C.C. Because principal and agent law supplements the Montana U.C.C. which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Sugar Refinery's Piled Sugar Beets Exempt From Tax — Business Inventory: If the products of a sugar refinery qualify as business inventory under 15-6-202, then the raw materials (sugar beets) used to produce such products also qualify for the exemption, since the definition of business inventory also includes "raw materials and work in progress with respect to such goods". While not defined by the Legislature, the term "raw materials" is generally defined as the material or substance out of which other products or the final product is made. 40 A.G. Op. 82 (1984).

30-2-106. Definitions — "contract" — "agreement" — "contract for sale" — "sale" — "present sale" — "conforming" to contract — "termination" — "cancellation".

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1)—Section 1(1) and (2), Uniform Sales Act; Subsection (2)—none, but subsection generally continues policy of Sections 11, 44 and 69, Uniform Sales Act; Subsections (3) and (4)—none.

Changes: Completely rewritten.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Subsection (1): "Contract for sale" is used as a general concept throughout this Chapter, but the rights of the parties do not vary according to whether the transaction is a present sale or a contract to sell unless the Chapter expressly so provides.

2. Subsection (2): It is in general intended to continue the policy of requiring exact performance by the seller of his obligations as a condition to his right to require acceptance. However, the seller is in part safeguarded against surprise as a result of sudden technicality on the buyer's part by the provisions of Section 30-2-508 on seller's cure of improper tender or delivery. Moreover usage of trade frequently permits commercial leeways in performance and the language of the agreement itself must be read in the light of such custom or usage and also, prior course of dealing, and in a long term contract, the course of performance.

3. Subsections (3) and (4): These subsections are intended to make clear the distinction carried forward throughout this Chapter between termination and cancellation.

Case Notes

Payment After Unilateral Price Increase as Termination of Contract and Formation of New Contract — Adequate Notice Found: Hansens ordered 30 truckloads of logs from Lumber Enterprises, Inc., at a special price. The parties agreed to ship and receive the logs over a longer period of time than originally agreed. After delivery of 18 truckloads, Lumber Enterprises raised the price of each load by about 50% and told Hansens to "take it or leave it". Hansens agreed to the increase under protest but refused to pay for the last three loads. Citing the official comment to 30-2-209 and testimony by the Lumber Enterprises manager that the company had to raise prices because it discovered it was losing money on each truckload at the agreed price, the Supreme Court held that the indefinite extension allowed the contract to be terminated at any time by either party. The Supreme Court held that when Lumber Enterprises raised its prices and the Hansens purchased logs more than 30 days after that increase, the former contract had been terminated and a new contract agreed to after reasonable notification. The District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion in applying 30-2-309. Lumber Enterprises, Inc. v. Hansen, 257 M 11, 846 P2d 1046, 50 St. Rep. 138 (1993).

Award of Damages for Delivery of Nonconforming Goods: Contract terms provided for a building 18 feet high, but Meland learned upon beginning construction that the building height would be less than 18 feet. He notified Intermountain of the problem, then altered the construction sequence to obtain the desired height. He later ran out of materials, necessitating expenditure of $4,085 for additional materials, labor, and temporary grain storage facilities. He then filed suit alleging breach of the sales contract. The District Court awarded Meland $4,085 in damages as a result of Intermountain's delivery of nonconforming goods. Under 30-2-106, goods are conforming when they are in accordance with the contract obligations. The Supreme Court affirmed the damage award, as the goods were not in accord with the contract terms. Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Lease Transaction Actually Sales Agreement Subject to U.C.C. Provisions: Vendees leased a printing press from vendor; after making numerous monthly payments, vendees would obtain title to the press on payment of a small sum. As agreement contains an option to purchase at the end of the lease agreement, it falls within the sale of goods provisions of the U.C.C. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Beneficial Commercial Corp. v. Cottrell, 212 M 493, 688 P2d 1254, 41 St. Rep. 1888 (1984).

Railroad Right-of-Way Lease — Not Contract for Sale: Section 30-2-107 does not apply to a railroad right-of-way lease because the lease is not a contract for sale within the meaning of this section. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Pac. Metal Co. v. NW. Bank of Helena, 205 M 323, 667 P2d 958, 40 St. Rep. 1301 (1983).

Lease as Installment Sale: The parties entered into an agreement for the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system that was termed a "lease agreement". Payments were to be made over a 5-year term at the expiration of which defendant had the option to renew for another 5-year term or to purchase the system for $1. The District Court found that the transaction was in effect a "sale". The Supreme Court affirmed, saying that in circumstances where the purported lease gives the lessee the option to purchase the goods upon expiration of the term of the lease for a nominal amount, the lease is commercially indistinguishable from an installment sales contract and the provisions of the U.C.C. apply. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Implied Warranty of Merchantability Inapplicable to Lease: Defendant leased a truck from plaintiff. The truck was in the shop many times, and after an accident and long delays in obtaining parts, defendant defaulted on the lease. Plaintiff sued for amounts owing under the lease, and defendant counterclaimed for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The implied warranty of merchantability is only applicable in the event of a "sale" as defined in the Uniform Commercial Code. On the basis of the definition of sale and language contained in the lease agreement, the Supreme Court found that the implied warranty of merchantability was not applicable. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) R & W Leasing v. Mosher, 195 M 285, 636 P2d 832, 38 St. Rep. 1857 (1981).

"Lease" Construed as Sales Transaction: Although the contract between the parties stated that "The equipment is, and shall be and remain, the sole and exclusive personal property of the lessor; and the lessee shall have no right, title or interest therein except as expressly set forth in this lease", the agreement qualified as a sales transaction invoking the Montana Uniform Commercial Code when construed with the shipping order, which provided for title conveyance. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Transcont. Refrigeration Co. v. Figgins, 179 M 12, 585 P2d 1301 (1978), followed in Westmont Tractor Co. v. Viking Exploration, Inc., 534 F. Supp. 1314, 39 St. Rep. 1398 (D.C Mont. 1982).

30-2-107. Goods to be severed from realty — recording.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Section 76, Uniform Sales Act on prior policy; Section 7, Uniform Conditional Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1). Notice that this subsection applies only if the minerals or structures "are to be severed by the seller". If the buyer is to sever, such transactions are considered contracts affecting land and all problems of the Statute of Frauds and of the recording of land rights apply to them. Therefore, the Statute of Frauds section of this Chapter does not apply to such contracts though they must conform to the Statute of Frauds affecting the transfer of interests in land.

2. Subsection (2). "Things attached" to the realty which can be severed without material harm are goods within this Chapter regardless of who is to effect the severance. The word "fixtures" has been avoided because of the diverse definitions of this term, the test of "severance without material harm" being substituted.

The provision in subsection (3) for recording such contracts is within the purview of this Chapter since it is a means of preserving the buyer's rights under the contract of sale.

3. The security phases of things attached to or to become attached to realty are dealt with in the Chapter on Secured Transactions (Chapter 9A) and it is to be noted that the definition of goods in that Chapter differs from the definition of goods in this Chapter.

However, both Chapters treat as goods growing crops and also timber to be cut under a contract of severance.

Reasons for 1972 Change: Several timber-growing states have changed the 1962 Code to make timber to be cut under a contract of severance goods, regardless of the question who is to sever them. The section is revised to adopt this change. Financing of the transaction is facilitated if the timber is treated as goods instead of real estate. A similar change is made in the definition of "goods" in Section 30-9-105 [now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. To protect persons dealing with timberlands, filing on timber to be cut is required in Part 4 of Chapter 9 (renumbered, see 30-9A-501) to be made in real estate records in a manner comparable to fixture filing.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: Near beginning of (1), deleted "timber" before "minerals"; in (1) inserted "(including oil and gas)"; in (2) inserted "or of timber to be cut" after "not described in subsection (1)".

Source of 1983 Amendment: The source of the 1983 amendment was the 1972 amendments to Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. The amendment was to Section 2-107 of the Official Text of the Uniform Commercial Code.

Case Notes

Unenforceable Timber Sale by Agent Without Written Authority: Gebert Logging contracted in writing with Palin to remove timber from certain land. This was a contract under this section of the U.C.C. for goods to be severed from realty. The contract price was over $500, so under 30-2-201 of the U.C.C., the contract had to be in writing. Under 28-10-203 relating to agency, authority to enter into a contract that the law requires to be written can only be given by an instrument that is itself written. Since Palin did not own the land and did not have written authority from his wife, the owner, to execute the contract as her agent, the contract was unenforceable because it was not signed by or with the written authority of the owner of the land. Gebert Logging was thus entitled to receive back its land damage bond, and Palin was not entitled to damages for alleged unrepaired injury to the land. The court denied Palin's claims that part performance took the contract out of the Statute of Frauds and that the contract should not be invalidated because he had altered his position to his detriment. The court also held that his wife could not retroactively ratify his acts without the consent of Gebert Logging, which was not given. Gebert Logging, Inc. v. Palin, 220 M 405, 716 P2d 200, 43 St. Rep. 481 (1986).

Section Inapplicable to Railroad Right-of-Way Lease: This section does not apply to a railroad right-of-way lease because the lease is not a contract for sale as defined by 30-2-106. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Pac. Metal Co. v. NW. Bank of Helena, 205 M 323, 667 P2d 958, 40 St. Rep. 1301 (1983).

U.C.C. — Application to Timber Contracts: Defendant was to selectively cut diseased trees on plaintiff's land under a contract entered by the parties. Defendant clearcut several stands of timber. He contended that this was the best management practice to control the spread of the disease. He argued that this established a "usage of trade" under 30-2-208, which should be used in construing the contract. Section 30-2-107(1) establishes that a contract for the sale of timber is subject to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.) only if the timber is to be "severed by the seller". This was not the case here, so the provisions of the U.C.C. did not apply. Madison Fork Ranch v. L&B Lodge Pole Timber Prod., 189 M 292, 615 P2d 900, 37 St. Rep. 1468 (1980).

Notice: A contract for sale of standing timber is enforceable against a subsequent buyer of the land only to the extent that he has or is chargeable with notice thereof. Pegg v. Mid-State Dev. Corp., 164 M 525, 529 P2d 1399 (1974).

Timber: A contract for sale of standing timber may be enforced under the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code or under general contract law of realty. Pegg v. Mid-State Dev. Corp., 164 M 525, 529 P2d 1399 (1974).

Part 2
Form, Formation, and Readjustment of Contract

30-2-201. Formal requirements — statute of frauds.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 4, Uniform Sales Act (which was based on Section 17 of the Statute of 29 Charles II).

Changes: Completely rephrased; restricted to sale of goods. See also Sections 30-1-206 [now repealed], 30-8-319 [now repealed, see 30-8-123] and 30-9-203 [now repealed, see 30-9A-203].

Purposes of Changes: The changed phraseology of this section is intended to make it clear that:

1. The required writing need not contain all the material terms of the contract and such material terms as are stated need not be precisely stated. All that is required is that the writing afford a basis for believing that the offered oral evidence rests on a real transaction. It may be written in lead pencil on a scratch pad. It need not indicate which party is the buyer and which the seller. The only term which must appear is the quantity term which need not be accurately stated but recovery is limited to the amount stated. The price, time and place of payment or delivery, the general quality of the goods, or any particular warranties may all be omitted.

Special emphasis must be placed on the permissibility of omitting the price term in view of the insistence of some courts on the express inclusion of this term even where the parties have contracted on the basis of a published price list. In many valid contracts for sale the parties do not mention the price in express terms, the buyer being bound to pay and the seller to accept a reasonable price which the trier of the fact may well be trusted to determine. Again, frequently the price is not mentioned since the parties have based their agreement on a price list or catalogue known to both of them and this list serves as an efficient safeguard against perjury. Finally, "market" prices and valuations that are current in the vicinity constitute a similar check. Thus if the price is not stated in the memorandum it can normally be supplied without danger of fraud. Of course if the "price" consists of goods rather than money the quantity of goods must be stated.

Only three definite and invariable requirements as to the memorandum are made by this subsection. First, it must evidence a contract for the sale of goods; second, it must be "signed", a word which includes any authentication which identifies the party to be charged; and third, it must specify a quantity.

2. "Partial performance" as a substitute for the required memorandum can validate the contract only for the goods which have been accepted or for which payment has been made and accepted.

Receipt and acceptance either of goods or of the price constitutes an unambiguous overt omission by both parties that a contract actually exists. If the court can make a just apportionment, therefore, the agreed price of any goods actually delivered can be recovered without a writing or, if the price has been paid, the seller can be forced to deliver an apportionable part of the goods. The overt actions of the parties make admissible evidence of the other terms of the contract necessary to a just apportionment. This is true even though the actions of the parties are not in themselves inconsistent with a different transaction such as a consignment for resale or a mere loan of money.

Part performance by the buyer requires the delivery of something by him that is accepted by the seller as such performance. Thus, part payment may be made by money or check, accepted by the seller. If the agreed price consists of goods or services, then they must also have been delivered and accepted.

3. Between merchants, failure to answer a written confirmation of a contract within ten days of receipt is tantamount to a writing under subsection (2) and is sufficient against both parties under subsection (1). The only effect, however, is to take away from the party who fails to answer the defense of the Statute of Frauds; the burden of persuading the trier of fact that a contract was in fact made orally prior to the written confirmation is unaffected. Compare the effect of a failure to reply under Section 30-2-207.

4. Failure to satisfy the requirements of this section does not render the contract void for all purposes, but merely prevents it from being judicially enforced in favor of a party to the contract. For example, a buyer who takes possession of goods as provided in an oral contract which the seller has not meanwhile repudiated, is not a trespasser. Nor would the Statute of Frauds provisions of this section be a defense to a third person who wrongfully induces a party to refuse to perform an oral contract, even though the injured party cannot maintain an action for damages against the party so refusing to perform.

5. The requirement of "signing" is discussed in the comment to Section 30-1-201.

6. It is not necessary that the writing be delivered to anybody. It need not be signed or authenticated by both parties but it is, of course, not sufficient against one who has not signed it. Prior to a dispute no one can determine which party's signing of the memorandum may be necessary but from the time of contracting each party should be aware that to him it is signing by the other which is important.

7. If the making of a contract is admitted in court, either in a written pleading, by stipulation or by oral statement before the court, no additional writing is necessary for protection against fraud. Under this section it is no longer possible to admit the contract in court and still treat the Statute as a defense. However, the contract is not thus conclusively established. The admission so made by a party is itself evidential against him of the truth of the facts so admitted and of nothing more; as against the other party, it is not evidential at all.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C.

Failure to Bring Fraud Action Within Time Claim Accrues — Statute of Limitations Precluding Fraud Action: Plaintiff discovered or reasonably should have discovered within 6 months of purchasing a trailer park in May 2003 that a fraud may have been perpetrated regarding the profitability of the park and the condition of the park water system, but plaintiff did not bring a fraud or misrepresentation claim until 2007. The actual and constructive fraud claims were therefore precluded by the statute of limitations in 27-2-203, which requires an action for fraud to be commenced within 2 years. Plaintiff's claims were properly dismissed as untimely. Deschamps v. Treasure St. Trailer Ct., Ltd., 2010 MT 74, 356 Mont. 1, 230 P.3d 800.

Failure to Notify Grain Buyer of Intent to Breach Oral Agreement Within Reasonable Time — Oral Contract Enforceable: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code and that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Nierenberg never objected in writing to the written confirmation. The Supreme Court noted that the merchant exception in this section does not dictate which party must send the written confirmation, but rather that in order to create an enforceable oral contract and avoid the signed writing requirement, one of the parties must send written confirmation to the other party. A farmer as well as a buyer may lock in an oral contract price as the market fluctuates up or down, and both parties equally possess the power to bind the other party. In this case, ConAgra did not immediately mail a written agreement, but instead waited about 6 days for Nierenberg to come to the elevator and sign the contract in person before mailing it. Although a court must look at the broad nature, purpose, and circumstances in determining whether written confirmation was received within a reasonable time, two specific factors may be examined: (1) the merchant's usual practice or policy following such transactions; and (2) the merchant's excuse for not following its practice or policy. The slight delay in Nierenberg's receipt of the confirmation because of an apparent misunderstanding was not seen as an unreasonable deviation from ConAgra's usual practices under the circumstances. However, Nierenberg chose to simply not honor his contractual obligation without notifying ConAgra of his true intentions. Nierenberg's mistake was to act outside of accepted commercial grain sales practices and not give ConAgra prompt notice of his breach so that his obligation for expectancy damages would be fixed. The written confirmation became an enforceable binding contract when Nierenberg failed to respond in writing with his objections within the stated 10-day period. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's finding that the oral agreement could not be enforced. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Rules for Determining Whether Judicial Admission Made to Establish Oral Contract for Sale of Grain: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code, based on the fact that Nierenberg had been selling grain for many years and was familiar with grain prices through periodic visits to local grain elevators. The court also concluded that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Noting that the rules governing sales agreements under the Uniform Commercial Code are far more permissive than general contract rules under the common law, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in determining that a contract was not formed because Nierenberg did not unambiguously testify to the necessary elements of a contract. Under this section, a contract that does not satisfy the signed writing requirements, but that is valid in other respects, is enforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits that a contract for sale was made. For a judicial admission to be binding, the admission must be an unequivocal statement of fact rather than a conclusion of law or the expression of an opinion. Prodding a party while on the witness stand or while testifying during a deposition to say certain magical words that may indicate that a contract was formed will be viewed with disfavor. Instead, the Supreme Court cited Thomas v. Prewitt, 355 S2d 657 (Miss. 1978), for the five-part rule for testing the sufficiency of a claimed judicial admission: (1) the declaration relied on was made during the course of a judicial proceeding; (2) the statement was contradictory to an essential fact embraced in the theory of recovery or defense asserted by the person giving the testimony; (3) the statement was deliberate, clear, and unequivocal; (4) giving of conclusive effect to the declaration is consistent with public policy; and (5) the testimony must be such as relates to a fact upon which a judgment for the opposing party may be based. The Supreme Court's review will adhere to the outward objective manifestations test expressed in Miller v. Walter, 165 M 221, 527 P2d 240 (1974), namely whether intent that a contract existed must be gathered from the outward objective manifestations of the parties and not by the subjective undisclosed intent of one of the parties. In Nierenberg's case, his testimony indicated that most of his grain sales involved signing a contract shortly after oral discussions with ConAgra—an apparent contradiction to an outright admission that he was orally bound to sell the grain. The fact that Nierenberg was willing to further negotiate the quantity of grain was not the objective conduct of a person who was contractually bound without a signed writing. The testimonial facts concerning Nierenberg's postphone conversation conduct were ambiguous, and the District Court did not err in holding that Nierenberg did not make a judicial admission that a contract was made, even though that conclusion was not dispositive of the ultimate determination of whether an enforceable contract was made. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Farmer May Be Merchant in Grain Sale — Oral Contract Upheld: Jack, acting as personal representative of his brother's estate, was considered a merchant for purposes of this section because he had operative knowledge of the grain marketing system and was familiar with all facets of marketing grain, including knowledge of the product, how to produce it, and how to negotiate the best terms for its sale. When he made a contract over the phone for sale of grain and the other party sent a confirmation, which Jack did not sign or return, the contract was enforceable under the merchant exception to the statute of frauds. General Mills was entitled to withhold $15,000 under a subsequent contract as an offset of the difference on the two contracts. Smith v. Gen. Mills, Inc., 1998 MT 280, 291 M 426, 968 P2d 723, 55 St. Rep. 1151 (1998).

Oral Contract Enforceable — Statute of Frauds Defense Inapplicable: Defendants orally agreed to sell 6,500 bushels of wheat to Columbia Grain International (Columbia Grain) at $4.05 a bushel. Relying on the oral agreement, Columbia Grain sold the wheat in open market. When defendants refused to deliver the wheat, Columbia Grain purchased wheat from another seller for $4.68 a bushel. In an action to recover damages for breach of contract, the District Court awarded Columbia Grain the difference between the contract price of $4.05 and the replacement price of $4.68. On appeal, defendants claimed that the District Court erred in recognizing the existence of a contract, in failing to apply the statute of frauds defense, and in calculating damages. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that an oral contract existed based on the parties' prior course of dealings and general industry practices and that defendants had waived their right to rely on the statute of frauds defense by not affirmatively pleading the defense. Damages are properly based on the cost of Columbia Grain to cover the undelivered grain. Columbia Grain Int'l v. Cereck, 258 M 414, 852 P2d 676, 50 St. Rep. 591 (1993).

Unenforceable Timber Sale by Agent Without Written Authority: Gebert Logging contracted in writing with Palin to remove timber from certain land. This was a contract under 30-2-107 of the U.C.C. for goods to be severed from realty. The contract price was over $500, so under 30-2-201 of the U.C.C., the contract had to be in writing. Under 28-10-203 relating to agency, authority to enter into a contract that the law requires to be written can only be given by an instrument that is itself written. Since Palin did not own the land and did not have written authority from his wife, the owner, to execute the contract as her agent, the contract was unenforceable because it was not signed by or with the written authority of the owner of the land. Gebert Logging was thus entitled to receive back its land damage bond, and Palin was not entitled to damages for alleged unrepaired injury to the land. The court denied Palin's claims that part performance took the contract out of the Statute of Frauds and that the contract should not be invalidated because he had altered his position to his detriment. The court also held that his wife could not retroactively ratify his acts without the consent of Gebert Logging, which was not given. Gebert Logging, Inc. v. Palin, 220 M 405, 716 P2d 200, 43 St. Rep. 481 (1986).

Transaction Constitutes Lease — Not Installment Sales Contract: The facts of this case indicate that the lessee did not have the option to obtain title to the property at no further charge at the termination of the lease. Therefore, the court found the characterization of the transaction was a lease of equipment and was not governed by the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) IFG Leasing Co. v. Schultz, 217 M 434, 705 P2d 576, 42 St. Rep. 1307 (1985), following Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Estoppel to Prevent Application of Statute of Frauds: In a contract action brought by the plaintiff buyer of seed potatoes against the seller, in which the evidence showed that the defendant had never signed a written contract for the potatoes, but by his active and passive conduct induced the plaintiff to change his position by agreeing to sell the potatoes that were the subject of the contract to other buyers, the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff had proved the elements of estoppel by silence or equitable estoppel and that the defendant would therefore be estopped in applying the Statute of Frauds to the oral contract. NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 M 310, 678 P2d 1138, 41 St. Rep. 362 (1984), followed, with regard to elements of estoppel, in CB&F Dev. Corp. v. Culbertson St. Bank, 256 M 1, 844 P2d 5, 49 St. Rep. 1122 (1992).

Written Bid Ripens Into Contract — Writing Held Sufficient: Where the Commissioners of the defendant county attempted to reject a written bid, after first voting to accept it, arguing that there was no written contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, the Supreme Court held that the written bid accepted by the Commission ripened into a contract. Thus, there was a valid contract, not barred by the Statute of Frauds. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

Equitable Principles — Estopped From Invalidating Agreement Under Statute of Frauds: Agreement between plaintiff and defendant to sell property was valid under the Statute of Frauds even though the written instrument was signed only by the plaintiff and defendant's wife when plaintiff had made an irretrievable change in position and defendant had secured an unconscionable advantage or inflicted an unjust or unconscionable loss upon the plaintiff. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982).

Average Farmer Not a "Merchant": Faced with the absence of controlling state precedent, the federal District Court assumed that the Montana courts would follow the majority of states in finding that the average farmer is not a "merchant" as defined by 30-2-104. The issue must be determined on a case-by-case basis to see if the farmer possesses a special skill or knowledge in the marketing of grain. Where a farmer's sole connection with the grain market was the sale of his annual crop to the local grain elevators, such special skill or knowledge did not exist. Pierson v. Arnst, 534 F. Supp. 360, 39 St. Rep. 676 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Oral "Futures" Contract Not Enforceable: The plaintiff sought damages for an alleged breach of an oral "futures" contract whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase and the defendant farmer agreed to sell a sunflower seed crop. The contract was held unenforceable because it failed to comply with the requirement of subsection (1) that it be in writing. Subsection (2), the exception to the writing requirement, was inapplicable because the defendant farmer was not a "merchant". Pierson v. Arnst, 534 F. Supp. 360, 39 St. Rep. 676 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Acquiescence in Modification as Precluding Defense of Statute of Frauds: The parties entered into an agreement for the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system that was termed a "lease agreement". Payments were to be made over a 5-year term at the expiration of which defendant had the option to renew for another 5-year term or to purchase the system for $1. The original contract was rescinded, and an identical one was executed, except that payments were to begin at a later date. Defendant contended the contract was later further modified by an oral agreement to allow double payments during the summer months and no payments during some of the winter months. Plaintiff denied that this oral agreement was made, but this schedule was tolerated for 3 years. The contract was within the Statute of Frauds; however, an attempted oral modification can operate as a waiver of the right to assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense. The payment schedule followed was a sequence of conduct between the parties establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions and conduct. As such, it constituted a course of performance, the acquiescence in which effectively modified the agreement. The Statute of Frauds defense was not applicable. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplement the Montana UCC which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Scope of the Statute of Frauds — Section as Applying to Sale of Registered Horses: Appellant's contention, arguing that an oral contract for the purchase and sale of five registered horses is not within the scope of the Statute of Frauds (30-2-201) and is therefore enforceable despite the lack of a writing confirming the contract, is not supportable. The transaction does not come within any of the exclusions provided for in 30-2-102. Scott v. Hjelm, 188 M 375, 613 P2d 1385, 37 St. Rep. 1219 (1980).

Statute of Frauds Not Pleaded: Defendant failed to raise the Statute of Frauds defense in his pleadings, therefore he could not maintain it on appeal. Mont. Seeds, Inc. v. Holliday, 178 M 119, 582 P2d 1223 (1978).

Exceptions — Admissions: When a party to litigation regarding an oral agreement for the sale of wheat of a value of more than $500 did not deny the existence of the agreement, the contract was valid under the "judicial admission" exception to the Statute of Frauds. Farmers Elev. Co. v. Anderson, 170 M 175, 552 P2d 63 (1976).

Oral Contract — Memorandum in Writing: When the parties made an oral agreement for the sale of wheat over the telephone, the buyer wrote a memorandum of the transaction and signed the seller's name to it, and the buyer later acknowledged the written memorandum and accepted payments under it, there was a sufficient memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Cargill Inc. v. Wilson, 166 M 346, 532 P2d 988 (1975).

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER STATUTE OF FRAUDS

Receipt or Acceptance of Thing Sold:

Where the goods are already in the buyer's possession under a written lease, such possession is not such a receipt as required by Statute of Frauds, absent an affirmative act by the seller assenting to such receipt by the buyer. W. River Equip. Co. v. Holzworth Constr. Co., 134 M 582, 335 P2d 298 (1959).

The receipt and acceptance of property sold need not be concurrent with the time of sale, but may occur at any time thereafter. Where the buyer accepts and receives the thing sold, such acceptance and receipt by one who assumes the buyer's contract is sufficient. Slater Brick Co. v. Shackleton, 30 M 390, 76 P 805 (1904).

Complaint — Essentials of Agreement: Where complaint shows on its face that memorandum of agreement does not contain all essentials of agreement and such essentials cannot be ascertained without resort to oral evidence, demurrer to complaint was properly sustained. Dineen v. Sullivan, 123 M 195, 213 P2d 241 (1949).

Sufficiency of Note or Memorandum:

In order to take an oral contract for the sale of personal property out of the Statute of Frauds, the note or memorandum thereof referred to in section 74-201, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), must be so drawn that the essentials of the contract may be ascertained without resort to oral evidence, the rule being complied with if the material elements of the contract are stated in general terms. Lewis v. Aronow, 77 M 348, 251 P 146 (1926).

For the purpose of enabling the Court to interpret the abbreviations "No. 1 D. N. S." used in a memorandum evidencing the sale of wheat to a wheat buyer, where the oral contract of sale was attacked on the ground that it was void under the Statute of Frauds, parol evidence was admissible to show their customary meaning in the business of dealing in wheat. Lewis v. Aronow, 77 M 348, 251 P 146 (1926).

Part Payment:

When acceptance and receipt of a part of goods or payment of a portion of the purchase price at the time of the sale by an agent of the buyer is relied upon to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds, it must be by one having specific authority or by a general agent having all authority, and the authority of the former cannot depend upon the same oral agreement which is sought to be rendered valid by the act of the agent. Mahoney Bros. v. Hansen Packing Co., 67 M 120, 215 P 506 (1923).

In an action for breach of contract of sale of cattle where defendant company was sought to be held liable under an arrangement made over the telephone by a third person who had never been its agent and was not specifically authorized by it to act for it, and who after completion of the conversation assured the buyer that defendant would take the cattle and thereupon paid a part of the purchase price, defendant never making any payment whatever, the payment was not made by the buyer and the case was not taken out of the Statute of Frauds by such part payment. Mahoney Bros. v. Hansen Packing Co., 67 M 120, 215 P 506 (1923).

Part payment of the purchase price upon a contract for the sale of cattle brought the transaction within the exception provided for in section 74-201, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed). Case v. Kramer, 34 M 142, 85 P 878 (1906).

Building Contract: A contract between tenants in common for the erection of a house on the common property by one at his own expense, and requiring him to make an equal division of the rents between them when the rents received equaled one-half the cost, is not within section 74-201, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed). Ayotte v. Nadeau, 32 M 498, 81 P 145 (1905).

Burden of Proof: Where the value of property involved in a sale was sufficient to bring the contract of sale within the provisions of section 74-201, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), the burden is on plaintiff, in an action for breach of the contract, to establish by a preponderance of evidence that a valid contract under the statutes was entered into between the parties, together with a breach of such contract, and the consequent damages. Brophy v. Idaho Prod. & Prov. Co., 31 M 279, 78 P 493 (1904).

Valid Verbal Contract: Where a person leaves a message with a clerk, to the effect that if the plaintiff would buy in certain property to be sold under a chattel mortgage, and let a certain person buy it from him, that he would pay the plaintiff $500, and the plaintiff acted accordingly, the transaction was not within the Statute of Frauds and constituted a valid verbal contract. Frank v. Murray, 7 M 4, 14 P 654 (1887).

30-2-202. Final written expression — parol or extrinsic evidence.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section definitely rejects:

(a) Any assumption that because a writing has been worked out which is final on some matters, it is to be taken as including all the matters agreed upon;

(b) The premise that the language used has the meaning attributable to such language by rules of construction existing in the law rather than the meaning which arises out of the commercial context in which it was used; and

(c) The requirement that a condition precedent to the admissibility of the type of evidence specified in paragraph (a) is an original determination by the court that the language used is ambiguous.

2. Paragraph (a) makes admissible evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade and course of performance to explain or supplement the terms of any writing stating the agreement of the parties in order that the true understanding of the parties as to the agreement may be reached. Such writings are to be read on the assumption that the course of prior dealings between the parties and the usages of trade were taken for granted when the document was phrased. Unless carefully negated they have become an element of the meaning of the words used. Similarly, the course of actual performance by the parties is considered the best indication of what they intended the writing to mean.

3. Under paragraph (b) consistent additional terms, not reduced to writing, may be proved unless the court finds that the writing was intended by both parties as a complete and exclusive statement of all the terms. If the additional terms are such that, if agreed upon, they would certainly have been included in the document in the view of the court, then evidence of their alleged making must be kept from the trier of fact.

Case Notes

Error in Failing to Consider Estoppel Related to Waiver of Right to Declare Contract Forfeiture — Summary Judgment Improper: When plaintiffs began experiencing financial problems, they notified defendants that they would not be able to make the annual payment on their property. Defendants allegedly told plaintiffs that they would have whatever time they needed to come up with the money, as long as they paid any additional interest and other expenses. Defendants subsequently sent plaintiffs a default notice and terminated the contract for deed. Plaintiffs contended that defendants waived the right to terminate the contract and should be estopped from forfeiting the contract. The District Court dismissed the waiver and estoppel arguments as an attempt to offer parol evidence to amend the contract and granted summary judgment to defendants. However, plaintiffs were not trying to amend the contract, but rather were simply trying to show that defendants waived the right to foreclose for at least a period of time, that plaintiffs relied on the waiver, and that defendants should be estopped from foreclosure. Because material questions remained as to whether a waiver occurred, summary judgment was improper and the case was remanded for further proceedings. Danelson v. Robinson, 2003 MT 271, 317 M 462, 77 P3d 1010 (2003).

Contract for Elk Sale — Telephone Conversations Occurring After Contract Admissible — Oral Agreement Extending Contract Cutoff Dates Inadmissible but Promise Enforced: Seller appealed a District Court judgment awarding buyer damages after seller breached contracts for the sale of elk. Seller entered into contracts agreeing to deliver elk before April 1 and May 1 and in subsequent telephone conversations promised to deliver elk after these contract cutoff dates. While the parol evidence rule bars prior or contemporaneous oral agreements, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court decision allowing testimony regarding telephone conversations that occurred after the written agreements. The buyer, to his detriment, entered into third-party contracts to resell the elk in reliance on the seller's promise that the elk would be available and delivered after the contract cutoff dates. The Supreme Court ruled that enforcing the oral agreement extending the cutoff dates of the contract avoided an injustice to the buyer. Trad Indus., Ltd. v. Brogan, 246 M 439, 805 P2d 54, 48 St. Rep. 51 (1991).

Improper Reliance on Statute as Parol Evidence Instruction: A jury instruction that used this section as a source was properly refused upon a finding that a "written agreement" was merely a purchase order for goods and made no reference to additional promises made by the seller. The purchase order was not intended to be a final expression of the agreement, and a parol evidence instruction disallowing evidence of any prior agreement or contemporaneous agreement was improper. Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Unambiguous Contract Description — Applicability of Parol Evidence Rule — Unilateral Mistake: Since a 1971 written agreement was not ambiguous with respect to the land it affected, the parol evidence rule prevented admission of evidence of a 1967 oral agreement to show intent of the parties as to what land was involved. Admission of the oral agreement would only have provided evidence of unilateral mistake, which is not grounds for reforming a written contract. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Final Expression of Agreement Implied: The lower court found that buyer, seller, and bank, which was seller's assignee with full recourse, had agreed to the terms stated in a written contract and that buyer's promise to pay was stated in plain and unequivocal terms and referred to no antecedent or contemporaneous agreement not reduced to writing. By implication, the court indicated that there was an appropriate degree of finality respecting the terms of the written contract. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Parol Evidence Rules Substantive, Not Procedural — Subject to Rules of Evidence and Common-Law Exceptions: The Montana Uniform Commercial Code's parol evidence rule contained in 30-2-202 continues the operation of the traditional law of contracts parol evidence rule, though with some modifications. Each is a principle of substantive law, not a procedural rule of evidence. Thus, the admissibility of any evidence is ultimately subject to the provisions of the Montana Rules of Evidence, and the traditional common-law exceptions to the contract law parol evidence rule, such as proof of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, remain exceptions to the parol evidence rule in the Montana Uniform Commercial Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984). See also Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Partial Final Expression of Agreement — Inclusion of Entire Agreement Not Implied: Evidence that a writing is final as to some matters must not necessarily be construed to mean that the writing must be taken as including all the matters on which agreed. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Sale of Front-End Loader — Applicable Parol Evidence Rule: Front-end loader that buyer purchased from seller was within the definition of "goods" set out in 30-2-105. Therefore, the sale was governed by the Montana Uniform Commercial Code, and any Code provisions addressing a parol evidence question controlled the answer to the question, with the contract law parol evidence rule of 28-2-904 being used only to supplement the Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Written Promise to Pay — Contradicted by Oral Agreement Excusing Payment: Alleged contemporaneous oral agreement excusing buyer from paying for front-end loader he purchased to the extent of any deficiency due under the written contract, primarily because of alleged misrepresentations of the seller regarding the loader, was inadmissible under the Uniform

Commercial Code's parol evidence rule as a matter of law because it definitely contradicted the clear promise to pay stated in the written contract. In addition, the buyer's testimony was uncorroborated and contradictory and could be excluded on that ground and was hearsay testimony and could also be excluded on that ground. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Parol Evidence on Month and Day of Contract Admissible Where Parties Themselves Presented Parol Evidence on Year of Contract: Buyer failed to pay entire purchase price for irrigation system, and seller sued. Since buyer counterclaimed for crop losses allegedly resulting from seller's failure to install system within a reasonable time of contract, the exact date of the contract was an issue at trial. Seller submitted a copy of the contract dated May 20, 1976. Both parties agreed that the year was incorrect, as the transaction had actually taken place in 1977. However, the buyer claimed that the contract had been made in April, not May, and the District Court permitted him to present evidence in support of this. Seller appealed, claiming it was improper to allow the admission of parol evidence in contradiction of the terms of the contract. The Supreme Court held that since parol evidence had been allowed on the year of the contract, it was allowable for the month and day also. Ag Sales v. Klose, 199 M 400, 649 P2d 447, 39 St. Rep. 1482 (1982).

Documents Incorporated as Contract — Waiver of Condition Precedent: Plaintiff negotiated to sell two-wheel loaders to defendant. The terms of the sale were contained on the purchase order and included a 30-day warranty. Later, a lease agreement covering the same equipment was executed with plaintiff as lessor and defendant as lessee. One of the loaders broke down and required repair. Plaintiff contended the date of the warranty was from the date the purchase order was executed. Defendant refused to pay for the repair, contending the warranty began on the date of the lease agreement. Plaintiff claimed breach and took possession of the loaders. By its own admission, plaintiff conceded that the initial agreement was transformed into the lease agreement. This in effect was a modification of the contract. The terms contained in the purchase order were incorporated into and became part of the lease agreement. The two writings together constituted the final written expression of the agreement. The terms were unambiguous and could not be contradicted by evidence of any prior agreement. Plaintiff was responsible for repair under the warranty provision. Defendant contended refusal to honor this warranty constituted breach of the agreement, while plaintiff contended that a provision for advance payment, not rendered by defendant, was a condition precedent to the formation of the lease contract. The only logical interpretation of the events which transpired was that plaintiff waived the advance payment by delivering the loaders prior to receipt of the payment. Plaintiff could not rely on failure to receive the advance payment in claiming breach of contract under 30-2-706. Defendant was entitled to summary judgment. Westmont Tractor Co. v. Viking Exploration, Inc., 543 F. Supp. 1314, 39 St. Rep. 1398 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Sale of a Business Not Within Scope of Section: In the sale of a barber shop, parol evidence that the parties intended to include goodwill in the purchase price is not admissible under 30-2-202. This section of the Uniform Commercial Code is applicable only to the sale of "goods" and affords plaintiff no relief upon the sale of a business. Baldwin v. Stuber, 182 M 501, 597 P2d 1135 (1979).

Waiver of Parol Evidence Rule: Assignee's failure to object to the admission of parol evidence regarding assignor's prior oral promise to repair, establishing a breach and rendering unenforceable buyer's contract with assignor in failing to perform promise to repair renders such evidence admissible because an objection to the admission of parol evidence is waived when no effort is made to preserve it at the time it is offered. Massey-Ferguson Credit Corp. v. Brown, 169 M 396, 547 P2d 846 (1976).

Relation to Other Statutes: Section 28-3-602, which provides that time is not considered of the essence in a contract unless such a provision is expressly provided, was more specific than this section and controlled to prohibit parol evidence regarding the delivery date under an agreement for purchase and sale. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Gleason Equip., Inc., 166 M 479, 534 P2d 883 (1975).

30-2-203. Seals inoperative.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 3, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Portion pertaining to "seals" rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section makes it clear that every effect of the seal which relates to "sealed instruments" as such is wiped out insofar as contracts for sale are concerned. However, the substantial effects of a seal, except extension of the period of limitations, may be had by appropriate drafting as in the case of firm offers (see Section 30-2-205).

2. This section leaves untouched any aspects of a seal which relate merely to signatures or to authentication of execution and the like. Thus, a statute providing that a purported signature gives prima facie evidence of its own authenticity or that a signature gives prima facie evidence of consideration is still applicable to sales transactions even though a seal may be held to be a signature within the meaning of such a statute. Similarly, the authorized affixing of a corporate seal bearing the corporate name to a contractual writing purporting to be made by the corporation may have effect as a signature without any reference to the law of sealed instruments.

30-2-204. Formation in general.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1 and 3, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten by this and other sections of this Chapter.

Purposes of Changes:

Subsection (1) continues without change the basic policy of recognizing any manner of expression of agreement, oral, written or otherwise. The legal effect of such an agreement is, of course, qualified by other provisions of this Chapter.

Under subsection (1) appropriate conduct by the parties may be sufficient to establish an agreement. Subsection (2) is directed primarily to the situation where the interchanged correspondence does not disclose the exact point at which the deal was closed, but the actions of the parties indicate that a binding obligation has been undertaken.

Subsection (3) states the principle as to "open terms" underlying later sections of the Chapter. If the parties intend to enter into a binding agreement, this subsection recognizes that agreement as valid in law, despite missing terms, if there is any reasonably certain basis for granting a remedy. The test is not certainty as to what the parties were to do nor as to the exact amount of damages due the plaintiff. Nor is the fact that one or more terms are left to be agreed upon enough of itself to defeat an otherwise adequate agreement. Rather, commercial standards on the point of "indefiniteness" are intended to be applied, this Act making provision elsewhere for missing terms needed for performance, open price, remedies and the like.

The more terms the parties leave open, the less likely it is that they have intended to conclude a binding agreement, but their actions may be frequently conclusive on the matter despite the omissions.

30-2-205. Firm offers.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1 and 3, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten by this and other sections of this Chapter.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section is intended to modify the former rule which required that "firm offers" be sustained by consideration in order to bind, and to require instead that they must merely be characterized as such and expressed in signed writings.

2. The primary purpose of this section is to give effect to the deliberate intention of a merchant to make a current firm offer binding. The deliberation is shown in the case of an individualized document by the merchant's signature to the offer, and in the case of an offer included on a form supplied by the other party to the transaction by the separate signing of the particular clause which contains the offer. "Signed" here also includes authentication but the reasonableness of the authentication herein allowed must be determined in the light of the purpose of the section. The circumstances surrounding the signing may justify something less than a formal signature or initialing but typically the kind of authentication involved here would consist of a minimum of initialing of the clause involved. A handwritten memorandum on the writer's letterhead purporting in its terms to "confirm" a firm offer already made would be enough to satisfy this section, although not subscribed, since under the circumstances it could not be considered a memorandum of mere negotiation and it would adequately show its own authenticity. Similarly, an authorized telegram will suffice, and this is true even though the original draft contained only a typewritten signature. However, despite settled courses of dealing or usages of the trade whereby firm offers are made by oral communication and relied upon without more evidence, such offers remain revocable under this Chapter since authentication by a writing is the essence of this section.

3. This section is intended to apply to current "firm" offers and not to long term options, and an outside time limit of three months during which such offers remain irrevocable has been set. The three month period during which firm offers remain irrevocable under this section need not be stated by days or by date. If the offer states that it is "guaranteed" or "firm" until the happening of a contingency which will occur within the three month period, it will remain irrevocable until that event. A promise made for a longer period will operate under this section to bind the offeror only for the first three months of the period but may of course be renewed. If supported by consideration it may continue for as long as the parties specify. This section deals only with the offer which is not supported by consideration.

4. Protection is afforded against the inadvertent signing of a firm offer when contained in a form prepared by the offeree by requiring that such a clause be separately authenticated. If the offer clause is called to the offeror's attention and he separately authenticates it, he will be bound; Section 30-2-302 may operate, however, to prevent an unconscionable result which otherwise would flow from other terms appearing in the form.

5. Safeguards are provided to offer relief in the case of material mistake by virtue of the requirement of good faith and the general law of mistake.

Case Notes

Failure to Notify Grain Buyer of Intent to Breach Oral Agreement Within Reasonable Time — Oral Contract Enforceable: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code and that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Nierenberg never objected in writing to the written confirmation. The Supreme Court noted that the merchant exception in 30-2-201 does not dictate which party must send the written confirmation, but rather that in order to create an enforceable oral contract and avoid the signed writing requirement, one of the parties must send written confirmation to the other party. A farmer as well as a buyer may lock in an oral contract price as the market fluctuates up or down, and both parties equally possess the power to bind the other party. In this case, ConAgra did not immediately mail a written agreement, but instead waited about 6 days for Nierenberg to come to the elevator and sign the contract in person before mailing it. Although a court must look at the broad nature, purpose, and circumstances in determining whether written confirmation was received within a reasonable time, two specific factors may be examined: (1) the merchant's usual practice or policy following such transactions; and (2) the merchant's excuse for not following its practice or policy. The slight delay in Nierenberg's receipt of the confirmation because of an apparent misunderstanding was not seen as an unreasonable deviation from ConAgra's usual practices under the circumstances. However, Nierenberg chose to simply not honor his contractual obligation without notifying ConAgra of his true intentions. Nierenberg's mistake was to act outside of accepted commercial grain sales practices and not give ConAgra prompt notice of his breach so that his obligation for expectancy damages would be fixed. The written confirmation became an enforceable binding contract when Nierenberg failed to respond in writing with his objections within the stated 10-day period. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's finding that the oral agreement could not be enforced. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Rules for Determining Whether Judicial Admission Made to Establish Oral Contract for Sale of Grain: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code, based on the fact that Nierenberg had been selling grain for many years and was familiar with grain prices through periodic visits to local grain elevators. The court also concluded that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Noting that the rules governing sales agreements under the Uniform Commercial Code are far more permissive than general contract rules under the common law, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in determining that a contract was not formed because Nierenberg did not unambiguously testify to the necessary elements of a contract. Under 30-2-201, a contract that does not satisfy the signed writing requirements, but that is valid in other respects, is enforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits that a contract for sale was made. For a judicial admission to be binding, the admission must be an unequivocal statement of fact rather than a conclusion of law or the expression of an opinion. Prodding a party while on the witness stand or while testifying during a deposition to say certain magical words that may indicate that a contract was formed will be viewed with disfavor. Instead, the Supreme Court cited Thomas v. Prewitt, 355 S2d 657 (Miss. 1978), for the five-part rule for testing the sufficiency of a claimed judicial admission: (1) the declaration relied on was made during the course of a judicial proceeding; (2) the statement was contradictory to an essential fact embraced in the theory of recovery or defense asserted by the person giving the testimony; (3) the statement was deliberate, clear, and unequivocal; (4) giving of conclusive effect to the declaration is consistent with public policy; and (5) the testimony must be such as relates to a fact upon which a judgment for the opposing party may be based. The Supreme Court's review will adhere to the outward objective manifestations test expressed in Miller v. Walter, 165 M 221, 527 P2d 240 (1974), namely whether intent that a contract existed must be gathered from the outward objective manifestations of the parties and not by the subjective undisclosed intent of one of the parties. In Nierenberg's case, his testimony indicated that most of his grain sales involved signing a contract shortly after oral discussions with ConAgra—an apparent contradiction to an outright admission that he was orally bound to sell the grain. The fact that Nierenberg was willing to further negotiate the quantity of grain was not the objective conduct of a person who was contractually bound without a signed writing. The testimonial facts concerning Nierenberg's postphone conversation conduct were ambiguous, and the District Court did not err in holding that Nierenberg did not make a judicial admission that a contract was made, even though that conclusion was not dispositive of the ultimate determination of whether an enforceable contract was made. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Offer to Buy: Tender to a farmer of a copy of a standard grain purchase contract, executed by a dealer, constituted at least an offer by the dealer to buy the stated quantity of grain from the farmer. Cargill Inc. v. Wilson, 166 M 346, 532 P2d 988 (1975).

30-2-206. Offer and acceptance in formation of contract.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1 and 3, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten in this and other sections of this Chapter.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. Any reasonable manner of acceptance is intended to be regarded as available unless the offeror has made quite clear that it will not be acceptable. Former technical rules as to acceptance, such as requiring that telegraphic offers be accepted by telegraphed acceptance, etc., are rejected and a criterion that the acceptance be "in any manner and by any medium reasonable under the circumstances," is substituted. This section is intended to remain flexible and its applicability to be enlarged as new media of communication develop or as the more time-saving present day media come into general use.

2. Either shipment or a prompt promise to ship is made a proper means of acceptance of an offer looking to current shipment. In accordance with ordinary commercial understanding the section interprets an order looking to current shipment as allowing acceptance either by actual shipment or by a prompt promise to ship and rejects the artificial theory that only a single mode of acceptance is normally envisaged by an offer. This is true even though the language of the offer happens to be "ship at once" or the like. "Shipment" is here used in the same sense as in Section 30-2-504; it does not include the beginning of delivery by the seller's own truck or by messenger. But loading on the seller's own truck might be a beginning of performance under subsection (2).

3. The beginning of performance by an offeree can be effective as acceptance so as to bind the offeror only if followed within a reasonable time by notice to the offeror. Such a beginning of performance must unambiguously express the offeree's intention to engage himself. For the protection of both parties it is essential that notice follow in due course to constitute acceptance. Nothing in this section however bars the possibility that under the common law performance begun may have an intermediate effect of temporarily barring revocation of the offer, or at the offeror's option, final effect in constituting acceptance.

4. Subsection (1)(b) deals with the situation where a shipment made following an order is shown by a notification of shipment to be referable to that order but has a defect. Such a non-conforming shipment is normally to be understood as intended to close the bargain, even though it proves to have been at the same time a breach. However, the seller by stating that the shipment is non-conforming and is offered only as an accommodation to the buyer keeps the shipment or notification from operating as an acceptance.

Case Notes

Failure to Notify Grain Buyer of Intent to Breach Oral Agreement Within Reasonable Time — Oral Contract Enforceable: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code and that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Nierenberg never objected in writing to the written confirmation. The Supreme Court noted that the merchant exception in 30-2-201 does not dictate which party must send the written confirmation, but rather that in order to create an enforceable oral contract and avoid the signed writing requirement, one of the parties must send written confirmation to the other party. A farmer as well as a buyer may lock in an oral contract price as the market fluctuates up or down, and both parties equally possess the power to bind the other party. In this case, ConAgra did not immediately mail a written agreement, but instead waited about 6 days for Nierenberg to come to the elevator and sign the contract in person before mailing it. Although a court must look at the broad nature, purpose, and circumstances in determining whether written confirmation was received within a reasonable time, two specific factors may be examined: (1) the merchant's usual practice or policy following such transactions; and (2) the merchant's excuse for not following its practice or policy. The slight delay in Nierenberg's receipt of the confirmation because of an apparent misunderstanding was not seen as an unreasonable deviation from ConAgra's usual practices under the circumstances. However, Nierenberg chose to simply not honor his contractual obligation without notifying ConAgra of his true intentions. Nierenberg's mistake was to act outside of accepted commercial grain sales practices and not give ConAgra prompt notice of his breach so that his obligation for expectancy damages would be fixed. The written confirmation became an enforceable binding contract when Nierenberg failed to respond in writing with his objections within the stated 10-day period. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's finding that the oral agreement could not be enforced. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Rules for Determining Whether Judicial Admission Made to Establish Oral Contract for Sale of Grain: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. Jury Instruction Based on Statute Inapplicable: The trial court correctly refused to advise the jury on when an agreement could arise by performance because the contention was not whether a contract was entered into to buy goods, but rather that defendant made untrue oral representations that caused plaintiffs to enter into an agreement they would not otherwise have entered. Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Acceptance of Offer: Farmer accepted dealer's offer to buy stated quantity of grain by receiving without objection an executed copy of standard grain purchase contract, by receiving and endorsing an advance payment check to which was attached a memorandum referring by number to the grain purchase contract, and by failing to object for 4 months to quantity stated. Cargill Inc. v. Wilson, 166 M 346, 532 P2d 988 (1975).

30-2-207. Additional terms in acceptance or confirmation.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1 and 3, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten by this and other sections of this Chapter.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section is intended to deal with two typical situations. The one is the written confirmation, where an agreement has been reached either orally or by informal correspondence between the parties and is followed by one or both of the parties sending formal memoranda embodying the terms so far as agreed upon and adding terms not discussed. The other situation is offer and acceptance, in which a wire or letter expressed and intended as an acceptance or the closing of an agreement adds further minor suggestions or proposals such as "ship by Tuesday," "rush," "ship draft against bill of lading inspection allowed," or the like. A frequent example of the second situation is the exchange of printed purchase order and acceptance (sometimes called "acknowledgment") forms. Because the forms are oriented to the thinking of the respective drafting parties, the terms contained in them often do not correspond. Often the seller's form contains terms different from or additional to those set forth in the buyer's form. Nevertheless, the parties proceed with the transaction.

2. Under this Chapter a proposed deal which in commercial understanding has in fact been closed is recognized as a contract. Therefore, any additional matter contained in the confirmation or in the acceptance falls within subsection (2) and must be regarded as a proposal for an added term unless the acceptance is made conditional on the acceptance of the additional or different terms.

3. Whether or not additional or different terms will become part of the agreement depends upon the provisions of subsection (2). If they are such as materially to alter the original bargain, they will not be included unless expressly agreed to by the other party. If, however, they are terms which would not so change the bargain they will be incorporated unless notice of objection to them has already been given or is given within a reasonable time.

4. Examples of typical clauses which would normally "materially alter" the contract and so result in surprise or hardship if incorporated without express awareness by the other party are: a clause negating such standard warranties as that of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose in circumstances in which either warranty normally attaches; a clause requiring a guaranty of 90% or 100% deliveries in a case such as a contract by cannery, where the usage of the trade allows greater quantity leeways; a clause reserving to the seller the power to cancel upon the buyer's failure to meet any invoice when due; a clause requiring that complaints be made in a time materially shorter than customary or reasonable.

5. Examples of clauses which involve no element of unreasonable surprise and which therefore are to be incorporated in the contract unless notice of objection is seasonably given are:

a clause setting forth and perhaps enlarging slightly upon the seller's exemption due to supervening causes beyond his control, similar to those covered by the provision of this Chapter on merchant's excuse by failure of presupposed conditions or a clause fixing in advance any reasonable formula of proration under such circumstances; a clause fixing a reasonable time for complaints within customary limits, or in the case of a purchase for sub-sale, providing for inspection by the sub-purchaser; a clause providing for interest on overdue invoices or fixing the seller's standard credit terms where they are within the range of trade practice and do not limit any credit bargained for; a clause limiting the right of rejection for defects which fall within the customary trade tolerances for acceptance "with adjustment" or otherwise limiting remedy in a reasonable manner (see Sections 30-2-718 and 30-2-719).

6. If no answer is received within a reasonable time after additional terms are proposed, it is both fair and commercially sound to assume that their inclusion has been assented to. Where clauses on confirming forms sent by both parties conflict each party must be assumed to object to a clause of the other conflicting with one on the confirmation sent by himself. As a result the requirement that there be notice of objection which is found in subsection (2) is satisfied and the conflicting terms do not become a part of the contract. The contract then consists of the terms originally expressly agreed to, terms on which the confirmations agree, and terms supplied by this Act, including subsection (2). The written confirmation is also subject to Section 30-2-201. Under that section a failure to respond permits enforcement of a prior oral agreement; under this section a failure to respond permits additional terms to become part of the agreement.

7. In many cases, as where goods are shipped, accepted and paid for before any dispute arises, there is no question whether a contract has been made. In such cases, where the writings of the parties do not establish a contract, it is not necessary to determine which act or document constituted the offer and which the acceptance. See Section 30-2-204. The only question is what terms are included in the contract, and subsection (3) furnishes the governing rule.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: Near beginning of (2), inserted "or different" after "The additional".

Unofficial Amendment: The 1983 amendment to this section was not an official amendment to the Uniform Commercial Code drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

Case Notes

Jury Instruction Based on Statute Inapplicable: The trial court correctly refused to advise the jury on when additional terms become part of a contract because there was no claim that defendant's alleged untrue oral representations were additional terms within the meaning of this section. Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Exchange of Purchase Order and Acknowledgment: Defendant Volk, by purchase order dated December 1, 1977, made an offer to Morin, which Morin accepted on December 5, 1977. A confirmation document was also signed by Morin dated January 5, 1978. Volk's terms of sale became part of the subsequent contract with the additional term that materials supplied be in accordance with Morin's proposal document. No other material terms contained in Morin's proposal became part of the contract between the parties. Morin Bldg. Prod. Co., Inc. v. Volk Constr., Inc., 500 F. Supp. 82, 37 St. Rep. 1803 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Contract for Scrap Metal — Alteration of Writing: Where plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract under which the defendant was to purchase scrap auto bodies from the plaintiff and defendant struck certain terms of the proposed contract relating to the weight of truckloads to be delivered and termination of the contract but accepted delivery of some of the scrap auto bodies without a response from the plaintiff approving or disapproving the stricken contract terms, both parties by their conduct recognized the existence of a binding contract. Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. Pepper, 480 F. Supp. 1364 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

30-2-208. Course of performance or practical construction.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: No such general provision but concept of this section recognized by terms such as "course of dealing", "the circumstances of the case," "the conduct of the parties," etc., in Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. The parties themselves know best what they have meant by their words of agreement and their action under that agreement is the best indication of what that meaning was. This section thus rounds out the set of factors which determines the meaning of the "agreement" and therefore also of the "unless otherwise agreed" qualification to various provisions of this Chapter.

2. Under this section a course of performance is always relevant to determine the meaning of the agreement. Express mention of course of performance elsewhere in this Chapter carries no contrary implication when there is a failure to refer to it in other sections.

3. Where it is difficult to determine whether a particular act merely sheds light on the meaning of the agreement or represents a waiver of a term of the agreement, the preference is in favor of "waiver" whenever such construction, plus the application of the provisions on the reinstatement of rights waived (see Section 30-2-209), is needed to preserve the flexible character of commercial contracts and to prevent surprise or other hardship.

4. A single occasion of conduct does not fall within the language of this section but other sections such as the ones on silence after acceptance and failure to specify particular defects can affect the parties' rights on a single occasion (see Sections 30-2-605 and 30-2-607).

Case Notes

Sales — Guaranty of Buyer's Payment by Guarantor's Agent: Jacobs sold the uniform sales part of his business to K&M Sports, which in turn sold it to another, who defaulted on the sale. Jacobs, as secured party, repossessed the inventory and sold it to Snick Sports. Dirkson, who worked for K&M and then Snick, told Powers, plaintiff, that Jacobs would guarantee Snick's payment of goods sold to Snick by Powers. There was disagreement as to whether Dirkson worked for Jacobs. For 2 years Powers mailed merchandise, statements, and invoices to Jacobs, who forwarded them to Snick, who paid the bills. When some bills went unpaid, Powers sued Jacobs when he failed to pay the bills on request. The mailings to Jacobs put him on reasonable notice that something was wrong. His failure to investigate and take action was want of ordinary care that caused or allowed Powers to believe an authorized agency existed between Jacobs and Dirkson. Thus, there was an ostensible agency and ostensible authority. For the same reason, a valid guaranty existed and Jacobs was estopped from defending against it on the basis of the Statute of Frauds. A jury verdict for Powers was affirmed. Powers Mfg. Co. v. Leon Jacobs Enterprises, 216 M 407, 701 P2d 1377, 42 St. Rep. 906 (1985).

Acquiescence in Modification as Precluding Defense of Statute of Frauds: The parties entered into an agreement for the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system that was termed a "lease agreement". Payments were to be made over a 5-year term at the expiration of which defendant had the option to renew for another 5-year term or to purchase the system for $1. The original contract was rescinded, and an identical one was executed, except that payments were to begin at a later date. Defendant contended the contract was later further modified by an oral agreement to allow double payments during the summer months and no payments during some of the winter months. Plaintiff denied that this oral agreement was made, but this schedule was tolerated for 3 years. The contract was within the Statute of Frauds; however, an attempted oral modification can operate as a waiver of the right to assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense. The payment schedule followed was a sequence of conduct between the parties establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions and conduct. As such, it constituted a course of performance, the acquiescence in which effectively modified the agreement. The Statute of Frauds defense was not applicable. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

U.C.C. — Application to Timber Contracts: Defendant was to selectively cut diseased trees on plaintiff's land under a contract entered by the parties. Defendant clearcut several stands of timber. He contended that this was the best management practice to control the spread of the disease. He argued that this established a "usage of trade" under 30-2-208, which should be used in construing the contract. Section 30-2-107(1) establishes that a contract for the sale of timber is subject to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.) only if the timber is to be "severed by the seller". This was not the case here, so the provisions of the U.C.C. did not apply. Madison Fork Ranch v. L&B Lodge Pole Timber Prod., 189 M 292, 615 P2d 900, 37 St. Rep. 1468 (1980).

What Constitutes "Course of Performance": When there was an agreement for the sale and delivery of wheat at a specified time and the seller delivered the wheat after the agreed delivery date, there was a course of performance acquiesced to which operated to modify the agreement as to delivery date. Farmers Elev. Co. v. Anderson, 170 M 175, 552 P2d 63 (1976).

30-2-209. Modification, rescission and waiver.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1)—Compare Section 1, Uniform Written Obligations Act; Subsections (2) to (5)—none.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. This section seeks to protect and make effective all necessary and desirable modifications of sales contracts without regard to the technicalities which at present hamper such adjustments.

2. Subsection (1) provides that an agreement modifying a sales contract needs no consideration to be binding.

However, modifications made thereunder must meet the test of good faith imposed by this Act. The effective use of bad faith to escape performance on the original contract terms is barred, and the extortion of a "modification" without legitimate commercial reason is ineffective as a violation of the duty of good faith. Nor can a mere technical consideration support a modification made in bad faith.

The test of "good faith" between merchants or as against merchants includes "observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade" (Section 30-2-103), and may in some situations require an objectively demonstrable reason for seeking a modification. But such matters as a market shift which makes performance come to involve a loss may provide such a reason even though there is no such unforeseen difficulty as would make out a legal excuse from performance under Sections 30-2-615 and 30-2-616.

3. Subsections (2) and (3) are intended to protect against false allegations of oral modifications. "Modification or rescission" includes abandonment or other change by mutual consent, contrary to the decision in Green v. Doniger, 300 N.Y. 238, 90 N.E. 2d 56 (1949); it does not include unilateral "termination" or "cancellation" as defined in Section 30-2-106.

The Statute of Frauds provisions of this Chapter are expressly applied to modifications by subsection (3). Under those provisions the "delivery and acceptance" test is limited to the goods which have been accepted, that is, to the past. "Modification" for the future cannot therefore be conjured up by oral testimony if the price involved is $500.00 or more since such modification must be shown at least by an authenticated memo. And since a memo is limited in its effect to the quantity of goods set forth in it there is safeguard against oral evidence.

Subsection (2) permits the parties in effect to make their own Statute of Frauds as regards any future modification of the contract by giving effect to a clause in a signed agreement which expressly requires any modification to be by signed writing. But note that if a consumer is to be held to such a clause on a form supplied by a merchant it must be separately signed.

4. Subsection (4) is intended, despite the provisions of subsections (2) and (3), to prevent contractual provisions excluding modification except by a signed writing from limiting in other respects the legal effect of the parties' actual later conduct. The effect of such conduct as a waiver is further regulated in subsection (5).

Case Notes

Payment After Unilateral Price Increase as Termination of Contract and Formation of New Contract — Adequate Notice Found: Hansens ordered 30 truckloads of logs from Lumber Enterprises, Inc., at a special price. The parties agreed to ship and receive the logs over a longer period of time than originally agreed. After delivery of 18 truckloads, Lumber Enterprises raised the price of each load by about 50% and told Hansens to "take it or leave it". Hansens agreed to the increase under protest but refused to pay for the last three loads. Citing the official comment to this section and testimony by the Lumber Enterprises manager that the company had to raise prices because it discovered it was losing money on each truckload at the agreed price, the Supreme Court held that the indefinite extension allowed the contract to be terminated at any time by either party. The Supreme Court held that when Lumber Enterprises raised its prices and the Hansens purchased logs more than 30 days after that increase, the former contract had been terminated and a new contract agreed to after reasonable notification. The District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion in applying 30-2-309. Lumber Enterprises, Inc. v. Hansen, 257 M 11, 846 P2d 1046, 50 St. Rep. 138 (1993).

Challenge of Validity of Release on Basis of Unconscionability — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff signed a release for personal injuries with an insurance company in exchange for $8,900. Plaintiff later sued insureds, who were granted summary judgment after pleading the affirmative defense of release. However, a release is governed by contract law and may be rescinded for the same reasons that allow rescission of a contract. Therefore, the validity of a release may be challenged on the basis of unconscionability. The Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment after finding the release was unconscionable based on: (1) plaintiff's dire financial situation, lack of education and legal advice, and vulnerability; (2) substantial uncertainty as to the extent of injury and future prognosis at the time of settlement; and (3) haste in executing the release. Taken together, the circumstances raised an issue of fact whether justice was done, precluding summary judgment. Kelly v. Widner, 236 M 523, 771 P2d 142, 46 St. Rep. 591 (1989).

Documents Incorporated as Contract — Waiver of Condition Precedent: Plaintiff negotiated to sell two-wheel loaders to defendant. The terms of the sale were contained on the purchase order and included a 30-day warranty. Later, a lease agreement covering the same equipment was executed with plaintiff as lessor and defendant as lessee. One of the loaders broke down and required repair. Plaintiff contended the date of the warranty was from the date the purchase order was executed. Defendant refused to pay for the repair, contending the warranty began on the date of the lease agreement. Plaintiff claimed breach and took possession of the loaders. By its own admission, plaintiff conceded that the initial agreement was transformed into the lease agreement. This in effect was a modification of the contract. The terms contained in the purchase order were incorporated into and became part of the lease agreement. The two writings together constituted the final written expression of the agreement. The terms were unambiguous and could not be contradicted by evidence of any prior agreement. Plaintiff was responsible for repair under the warranty provision. Defendant contended refusal to honor this warranty constituted breach of the agreement, while plaintiff contended that a provision for advance payment, not rendered by defendant, was a condition precedent to the formation of the lease contract. The only logical interpretation of the events which transpired was that plaintiff waived the advance payment by delivering the loaders prior to receipt of the payment. Plaintiff could not rely on failure to receive the advance payment in claiming breach of contract under 30-2-706. Defendant was entitled to summary judgment. Westmont Tractor Co. v. Viking Exploration, Inc., 543 F. Supp. 1314, 39 St. Rep. 1398 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Acquiescence in Modification as Precluding Defense of Statute of Frauds: The parties entered into an agreement for the installation and maintenance of a fire alarm system that was termed a "lease agreement". Payments were to be made over a 5-year term at the expiration of which defendant had the option to renew for another 5-year term or to purchase the system for $1. The original contract was rescinded, and an identical one was executed, except that payments were to begin at a later date. Defendant contended the contract was later further modified by an oral agreement to allow double payments during the summer months and no payments during some of the winter months. Plaintiff denied that this oral agreement was made, but this schedule was tolerated for 3 years. The contract was within the Statute of Frauds; however, an attempted oral modification can operate as a waiver of the right to assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense. The payment schedule followed was a sequence of conduct between the parties establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions and conduct. As such, it constituted a course of performance, the acquiescence in which effectively modified the agreement. The Statute of Frauds defense was not applicable. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Waiver of Defenses: When an agreement to deliver wheat at a specified time was orally modified as to the time of delivery and the plaintiff made deliveries of wheat after the set date, he waived his right to assert a defense that the modification did not satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The Modification Mystery: Section 2-209 of the Uniform Commercial Code, Murray Jr., 32 Vill. L. Rev. 1 (1987).

30-2-210. Delegation of performance — assignment of rights.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Generally, this section recognizes both delegation of performance and assignability as normal and permissible incidents of a contract for the sale of goods.

2. Delegation of performance, either in conjunction with an assignment or otherwise, is provided for by subsection (1) where no substantial reason can be shown as to why the delegated performance will not be as satisfactory as personal performance.

3. Under subsection (2) rights which are no longer executory such as a right to damages for breach may be assigned although the agreement prohibits assignment. In such cases no question of delegation of any performance is involved. Subsection (2) is subject to Section 30-9A-406, which makes rights to payment for goods sold ("accounts"), whether or not earned, freely alienable notwithstanding a contrary agreement or rule of law.

4. The nature of the contract or the circumstances of the case, however, may bar assignment of the contract even where delegation of performance is not involved. This Chapter and this section are intended to clarify this problem, particularly in cases dealing with output requirement and exclusive dealing contracts. In the first place the section on requirements and exclusive dealing removes from the construction of the original contract most of the "personal discretion" element by substituting the reasonably objective standard of good faith operation of the plant or business to be supplied. Secondly, the section on insecurity and assurances, which is specifically referred to in subsection (5) of this section, frees the other party from the doubts and uncertainty which may afflict him under an assignment of the character in question by permitting him to demand adequate assurance of due performance without which he may suspend his own performance. Subsection (5) is not in any way intended to limit the effect of the section on insecurity and assurances and the word "performance" includes the giving of orders under a requirements contract. Of course, in any case where a material personal discretion is sought to be transferred, effective assignment is barred by subsection (2).

5. Subsection (4) lays down a general rule of construction distinguishing between a normal commercial assignment, which substitutes the assignee for the assignor both as to rights and duties, and a financing assignment in which only the assignor's rights are transferred.

This Chapter takes no position on the possibility of extending some recognition or power to the original parties to work out normal commercial readjustments of the contract in the case of financing assignments even after the original obligor has been notified of the assignment. This question is dealt with in the Chapter on Secured Transactions (Chapter 9A).

6. Subsection (5) recognizes that the non-assigning original party has a stake in the reliability of the person with whom he has closed the original contract, and is, therefore, entitled to due assurance that any delegated performance will be properly forthcoming.

7. This section is not intended as a complete statement of the law of delegation and assignment but is limited to clarifying a few points doubtful under the case law. Particularly, neither this section nor this Chapter touches directly on such questions as the need or effect of notice of the assignment, the rights of successive assignees, or any question of the form of an assignment, either as between the parties or as against any third parties. Some of these questions are dealt with in Chapter 9A.

Enforcement of Agricultural Lien Following Sale or Transfer of Farm Products — Assignment of Inchoate or Unperfected Lien Interests Allowed: A crop of sugar beets was sold, and a pesticide sprayer that held an agricultural lien sought to enforce the lien after the sale. Plaintiff bank also held a secured interest on the proceeds of the crop. The buyer issued checks made payable jointly to the bank and the sprayer, honoring the agricultural lien, and the lienholder's unconditioned negotiation of the check acknowledged satisfaction and release of its lien. The bank asserted that, not being an agricultural supplier, the sprayer had no right to file the lien and further contended that because inchoate or unperfected liens are not assignable, any argument that the supplier had assigned its lien right to the sprayer must fail as a matter of law. The sprayer argued that the supplier was clearly eligible to file an agricultural lien and that all actions taken by the sprayer were taken in an agency capacity for the supplier, as indicated in the lien filing, so the payment was not an assignment. Alternatively, the sprayer contended that the transaction was a pass-through between related entities constituting a limited assignment for collection purposes only and that even if the bank's evidence was sufficient to demonstrate that the transaction was a full assignment supported by consideration, inchoate lien interests are nonetheless assignable. The Supreme Court concluded that the dispute was best resolved on the issue of the assignability of inchoate lien interests, noting that generally property of any kind may be transferred, that a right arising out of an obligation is the property of the person to whom it is due and may be transferred, and that Montana's general policy supports the free assignability of rights and obligations stemming from contractual obligations. An agricultural lien is a security and ought to follow the debt or contract to which it pertains, and the free assignability of the right to perfect an agricultural lien comports with lien statutes as well as modern business practices. Thus, even though the supplier's lien was not yet perfected when transferred to the sprayer, it was assignable, and the sprayer validly proceeded to perfect and enforce the lien and was entitled to funds in the amount stipulated by the parties as payment for the chemicals sold by the supplier to the farm and applied by the sprayer and was entitled to the interest on the funds to be credited on that sum. Stockman Bank of Mont. v. Mon-Kota, Inc., 2008 MT 74, 342 M 115, 180 P3d 1125 (2008).

Investment Agreement Containing Arbitration Clause Considered Contract of Adhesion — Remand for Consideration of Investor's Reasonable Expectations and Potential Contract Formation Defenses: Zigrang entered an investment agreement with defendant investment company. The agreement contained an arbitration provision. When Zigrang learned that defendant frequently traded securities in Zigrang's account without permission, Zigrang filed a complaint, which was one of 23 suits filed by investors alleging defendant's mismanagement of accounts. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the agreement. A panel of three judges sat en banc to hear evidence common to all 23 cases. Defendant's motion to compel arbitration was denied, but the order contained common findings of fact that did not apply to Zigrang, including a mischaracterization of Zigrang's investment agreement. Defendant appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the agreement constituted a contract of adhesion that supported other contract formation defenses, but did not in itself constitute a sufficient basis for invalidating the agreement. The Supreme Court was unable to completely examine Zigrang's contract formation defenses, including unconscionability, waiver, and reasonable expectations, because the District Court's order relied on the mistaken finding of fact. Thus, the court remanded for further findings of fact related to Zigrang's investment agreement, noting that an inquiry into Zigrang's expectations should consist only of an analysis of Zigrang's objectively reasonable expectations regarding the agreement from Zigrang's perspective and that Zigrang's expectations might negate the arbitration provisions. 30-2-301. General obligations of parties.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 11 and 41, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

This section uses the term "obligation" in contrast to the term "duty" in order to provide for the "condition" aspects of delivery and payment insofar as they are not modified by other sections of this Chapter such as those on cure of tender. It thus replaces not only the general provisions of the Uniform Sales Act on the parties' duties, but also the general provisions of that Act on the effect of conditions. In order to determine what is "in accordance with the contract" under this Chapter usage of trade, course of dealing and performance, and the general background of circumstances must be given due consideration in conjunction with the lay meaning of the words used to define the scope of the conditions and duties.

Case Notes

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

30-2-302. Unconscionable contract or clause.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section is intended to make it possible for the courts to police explicitly against the contracts or clauses which they find to be unconscionable. In the past such policing has been accomplished by adverse construction of language, by manipulation of the rules of offer and acceptance or by determinations that the clause is contrary to public policy or to the dominant purpose of the contract. This section is intended to allow the court to pass directly on the unconscionability of the contract or particular clause therein and to make a conclusion of law as to its unconscionability. The basic test is whether, in the light of the general commercial background and the commercial needs of the particular trade or case, the clauses involved are so one-sided as to be unconscionable under the circumstances existing at the time of the making of the contract. Subsection (2) makes it clear that it is proper for the court to hear evidence upon these questions. The principle is one of the prevention of oppression and unfair surprise (Cf. Campbell Soup Co. v. Wentz, 172 F.2d 80, 3d Cir. 1948) and not of disturbance of allocation of risks because of superior bargaining power. The underlying basis of this section is illustrated by the results in cases such as the following:

Kansas City Wholesale Grocery Co. v. Weber Packing Corporation, 93 Utah 414, 73 P.2d 1272 (1937), where a clause limiting time for complaints was held inapplicable to latent defects in a shipment of catsup which could be discovered only by microscopic analysis; Hardy v. General Motors Acceptance Corporation, 38 Ga.App. 463, 144 S.E. 327 (1928), holding that a disclaimer of warranty clause applied only to express warranties, thus letting in a fair implied warranty; Andrews Bros. v. Singer & Co. (1934 CA) 1 K.B. 17, holding that where a car with substantial mileage was delivered instead of a "new" car, a disclaimer of warranties, including those "implied," left unaffected an "express obligation" on the description, even though the Sale of Goods Act called such an implied warranty; New Prague Flouring Mill Co. v. G.A. Spears, 194 Iowa 417, 189 N.W. 815 (1922), holding that a clause permitting the seller, upon the buyer's failure to supply shipping instructions, to cancel, ship, or allow delivery date to be indefinitely postponed 30 days at a time by the inaction, does not indefinitely postpone the date of measuring damages for the buyer's breach, to the seller's advantage; and Kansas Flour Mills Co. v. Dirks, 100 Kan. 376, 164 P. 273 (1917), where under a similar clause in a rising market the court permitted the buyer to measure his damages for non-delivery at the end of only one 30 day postponement; Green v. Arcos, Ltd. (1931 CA) 47 T.L.R. 336, where a blanket clause prohibiting rejection of shipments by the buyer was restricted to apply to shipments where discrepancies represented merely mercantile variations; Meyer v. Packard Cleveland Motor Co., 106 Ohio St. 328, 140 N.E. 118 (1922), in which the court held that a "waiver" of all agreements not specified did not preclude implied warranty of fitness of a rebuilt dump truck for ordinary use as a dump truck; Austin Co. v. J.H. Tillman Co., 104 Or. 541, 209 P. 131 (1922), where a clause limiting the buyer's remedy to return was held to be applicable only if the seller had delivered a machine needed for a construction job which reasonably met the contract description; Bekkevold v. Potts, 173 Minn. 87, 216 N.W. 790, 59 A.L.R. 1164 (1927), refusing to allow warranty of fitness for purpose imposed by law to be negated by clause excluding all warranties "made" by the seller; Robert A. Munroe & Co. v. Meyer (1930) 2 K.B. 312, holding that the warranty of description overrides a clause reading "with all faults and defects" where adulterated meat not up to the contract description was delivered.

2. Under this section the court, in its discretion, may refuse to enforce the contract as a whole if it is permeated by the unconscionability, or it may strike any single clause or group of clauses which are so tainted or which are contrary to the essential purpose of the agreement, or it may simply limit unconscionable clauses so as to avoid unconscionable results.

3. The present section is addressed to the court, and the decision is to be made by it. The commercial evidence referred to in subsection (2) is for the court's consideration, not the jury's. Only the agreement which results from the court's action on these matters is to be submitted to the general triers of the facts.

Arbitration Clause in Standardized Form Advertising Agreement — Lack of Mutuality of Obligation and Meaningful Choice Considered Unconscionable Contract of Adhesion: Iwen sued U.S. West Direct for damages for negligent construction of a yellow pages advertisement, infliction of emotional distress, and punitive damages. The District Court held that the parties were bound by the arbitration clause in the directory advertising order. The advertising order was a standardized form, the terms of which Iwen was unable to negotiate and for which Iwen's only choice was to accept or reject, constituting an agreement of adhesion. The arbitration provision lacked mutuality of obligation, was one-sided, and contained terms that were unreasonably favorable to U.S. West Direct, leaving Iwen, as the weaker bargaining party, no meaningful choice regarding acceptance of its provisions. Viewed from the perspective of consumer Iwen, the arbitration clause was held to be unconscionable, and the Supreme Court reversed, striking the arbitration clause, pursuant to this section, and remanding for further proceedings. Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989, 56 St. Rep. 263 (1999), following Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298, 43 St. Rep. 1532 (1986), and Leibrand v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 272 M 1, 898 P2d 1220, 52 St. Rep. 557 (1995), and distinguishing Snap-on Tools Corp. v. Vetter, 838 F. Supp. 468 (D.C. Mont. 1993).

Challenge of Validity of Release on Basis of Unconscionability — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff signed a release for personal injuries with an insurance company in exchange for $8,900. Plaintiff later sued insureds, who were granted summary judgment after pleading the affirmative defense of release. However, a release is governed by contract law and may be rescinded for the same reasons that allow rescission of a contract. Therefore, the validity of a release may be challenged on the basis of unconscionability. The Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment after finding the release was unconscionable based on: (1) plaintiff's dire financial situation, lack of education and legal advice, and vulnerability; (2) substantial uncertainty as to the extent of injury and future prognosis at the time of settlement; and (3) haste in executing the release. Taken together, the circumstances raised an issue of fact whether justice was done, precluding summary judgment. Kelly v. Widner, 236 M 523, 771 P2d 142, 46 St. Rep. 591 (1989).

No Unconscionability When Implications Based on Opinions: The burden of proof was on plaintiff to raise facts from which reasonable men might conclude that there was oppression, prejudice, or unfair surprise. The plaintiff's opinions alone did not provide sufficient evidence; therefore, summary judgment in favor of defendants was proper on this issue. Westlake v. Osborne, 220 M 91, 713 P2d 548, 43 St. Rep. 200 (1986).

Application of Section to Leases: This section can, at least by analogy, be applied to lease transactions and should guide the Supreme Court in determining whether a lease is unconscionable. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Leases Between Businessmen: Courts have readily applied the doctrine of unconscionability of contracts as between consumers and businessmen but are reluctant to rewrite the terms of a contract between businessmen. When, as in instant case, all provisions of a lease are agreed to by businessmen on both sides, none of the surrounding circumstances suggest oppression of lessee's freedom to select another lessor, nothing on the record suggests disparity of bargaining power, and lessee selected both the equipment leased and the supplier of the equipment to the lessor and notified lessor of lessee's desire to make the lease, the lease cannot be considered unconscionable. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Success of Unsupported Claim: The mere unsupported claim that equipment lease under which appellants were sued was unconscionable and that a more oppressive lease was hard to imagine could not succeed on appeal from summary judgment for delinquent payments under the lease. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

When Limitation of Remedies Permissible — Equipment Sales — Factors: In a case stemming from an accident involving a hay baler, one issue on appeal was the limitation of remedies. Although limitation of damages for personal injuries in the case of consumer goods is prima facie unconscionable under 30-2-719, farm equipment is defined as "equipment". The limitation of remedy provisions could as a matter of law be found unconscionable. Accordingly, the court ordered an evidentiary hearing on the remedy limitations. Factors under 30-2-302 were to be considered at the hearing. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

30-2-303. Allocation or division of risks.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section is intended to make it clear that the parties may modify or allocate "unless otherwise agreed" risks or burdens imposed by this Chapter as they desire, always subject, of course, to the provisions on unconscionability.

Compare Section 30-1-102(4).

2. The risk or burden may be divided by the express terms of the agreement or by the attending circumstances, since under the definition of "agreement" in this Act the circumstances surrounding the transaction as well as the express language used by the parties enter into the meaning and substance of the agreement.

30-2-304. Price payable in money, goods, realty, or otherwise.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsections (2) and (3) of Section 9, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section corrects the phrasing of the Uniform Sales Act so as to avoid misconstruction and produce greater accuracy in commercial result. While it continues the essential intent and purpose of the Uniform Sales Act it rejects any purely verbalistic construction in disregard of the underlying reason of the provisions.

2. Under subsection (1) the provisions of this Chapter are applicable to transactions where the "price" of goods is payable in something other than money. This does not mean, however, that this whole Chapter applies automatically and in its entirety simply because an agreed transfer of title to goods is not a gift. The basic purposes and reasons of the Chapter must always be considered in determining the applicability of any of its provisions.

3. Subsection (2) lays down the general principle that when goods are to be exchanged for realty, the provisions of this Chapter apply only to those aspects of the transaction which concern the transfer of title to goods but do not affect the transfer of the realty since the detailed regulation of various particular contracts which fall outside the scope of this Chapter is left to the courts and other legislation. However, the complexities of these situations may be such that each must be analyzed in the light of the underlying reasons in order to determine the applicable principles. Local statutes dealing with realty are not to be lightly disregarded or altered by language of this Chapter. In contrast, this Chapter declares definite policies in regard to certain matters legitimately within its scope though concerned with real property situations, and in those instances the provisions of this Chapter control.

30-2-305. Open price term.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 9 and 10, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section applies when the price term is left open on the making of an agreement which is nevertheless intended by the parties to be a binding agreement. This Chapter rejects in these instances the formula that "an agreement to agree is unenforceable" if the case falls within subsection (1) of this section, and rejects also defeating such agreements on the ground of "indefiniteness". Instead this Chapter recognizes the dominant intention of the parties to have the deal continue to be binding upon both. As to future performance, since this Chapter recognizes remedies such as cover (Section 30-2-712), resale (Section 30-2-706) and specific performance (Section 30-2-716) which go beyond any mere arithmetic as between contract price and market price, there is usually a "reasonably certain basis for granting an appropriate remedy for breach" so that the contract need not fail for indefiniteness.

2. Under some circumstances the postponement of agreement on price will mean that no deal has really been concluded, and this is made express in the preamble of subsection (1) ("The parties if they so intend") and in subsection (4). Whether or not this is so is, in most cases, a question to be determined by the trier of fact.

3. Subsection (2), dealing with the situation where the price is to be fixed by one party rejects the uncommercial idea that an agreement that the seller may fix the price means that he may fix any price he may wish by the express qualification that the price so fixed must be fixed in good faith. Good faith includes observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade if the party is a merchant. (Section 30-2-103). But in the normal case a "posted price" or a future seller's or buyer's "given price," "price in effect," "market price," or the like satisfies the good faith requirement.

4. The section recognizes that there may be cases in which a particular person's judgment is not chosen merely as a barometer or index of a fair price but is an essential condition to the parties' intent to make any contract at all. For example, the case where a known and trusted expert is to "value" a particular painting for which there is no market standard differs sharply from the situation where a named expert is to determine the grade of cotton, and the difference would support a finding that in the one the parties did not intend to make a binding agreement if that expert were unavailable whereas in the other they did so intend. Other circumstances would of course affect the validity of such a finding.

5. Under subsection (3), wrongful interference by one party with any agreed machinery for price fixing in the contract may be treated by the other party as a repudiation justifying cancellation, or merely as a failure to take cooperative action thus shifting to the aggrieved party the reasonable leeway in fixing the price.

6. Throughout the entire section, the purpose is to give effect to the agreement which has been made. That effect, however, is always conditioned by the requirement of good faith action which is made an inherent part of all contracts within this Act. (Section 30-1-203).

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-306. Output, requirements and exclusive dealings.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) of this section, in regard to output and requirements, applies to this specific problem the general approach of this Act which requires the reading of commercial background and intent into the language of any agreement and demands good faith in the performance of that agreement. It applies to such contracts of nonproducing establishments such as dealers or distributors as well as to manufacturing concerns.

2. Under this Chapter, a contract for output or requirements is not too indefinite since it is held to mean the actual good faith output or requirements of the particular party. Nor does such a contract lack mutuality of obligation since, under this section, the party who will determine quantity is required to operate his plant or conduct his business in good faith and according to commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade so that his output or requirements will approximate a reasonably foreseeable figure. Reasonable elasticity in the requirements is expressly envisaged by this section and good faith variations from prior requirements are permitted even when the variation may be such as to result in discontinuance. A shutdown by a requirements buyer for lack of orders might be permissible when a shut-down merely to curtail losses would not. The essential test is whether the party is acting in good faith. Similarly, a sudden expansion of the plant by which requirements are to be measured would not be included within the scope of the contract as made but normal expansion undertaken in good faith would be within the scope of this section. One of the factors in an expansion situation would be whether the market price had risen greatly in a case in which the requirements contract contained a fixed price. Reasonable variation of an extreme sort is exemplified in Southwest Natural Gas Co. v. Oklahoma Portland Cement Co., 102 F.2d 630 (C.C.A. 10, 1939). This Chapter takes no position as to whether a requirements contract is a provable claim in bankruptcy.

3. If an estimate of output or requirements is included in the agreement, no quantity unreasonably disproportionate to it may be tendered or demanded. Any minimum or maximum set by the agreement shows a clear limit on the intended elasticity. In similar fashion, the agreed estimate is to be regarded as a center around which the parties intend the variation to occur.

4. When an enterprise is sold, the question may arise whether the buyer is bound by an existing output or requirements contract. That question is outside the scope of this Chapter, and is to be determined on other principles of law. Assuming that the contract continues, the output or requirements in the hands of the new owner continue to be measured by the actual good faith output or requirements under the normal operation of the enterprise prior to sale. The sale itself is not grounds for sudden expansion or decrease.

5. Subsection (2), on exclusive dealing, makes explicit the commercial rule embodied in this Act under which the parties to such contracts are held to have impliedly, even when not expressly, bound themselves to use reasonable diligence as well as good faith in their performance of the contract. Under such contracts the exclusive agent is required, although no express commitment has been made, to use reasonable effort and due diligence in the expansion of the market or the promotion of the product, as the case may be. The principal is expected under such a contract to refrain from supplying any other dealer or agent within the exclusive territory. An exclusive dealing agreement brings into play all of the good faith aspects of the output and requirement problems of subsection (1). It also raises questions of insecurity and right to adequate assurance under this Chapter.

Case Notes

Requirements Contract: The trial court's finding of a requirements contract was upheld because there is no provision in the contract which specifies an exact quantity and price binding both the seller and buyer and since the contract contains a specific reference to the contingency of participation of local government units. In addition, the plaintiff did not prove that the State, in bad faith, made unreasonable disproportionate variations in the estimates of quantities. W. Sign, Inc. v. St., 180 M 278, 590 P2d 141 (1979).

30-2-307. Delivery in single lot or several lots.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 45(1), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten and expanded.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section applies where the parties have not specifically agreed whether delivery and payment are to be by lots and generally continues the essential intent of original Act, Section 45(1) by assuming that the parties intended delivery to be in a single lot.

2. Where the actual agreement or the circumstances do not indicate otherwise, delivery in lots is not permitted under this section and the buyer is properly entitled to reject for a deficiency in the tender, subject to any privilege in the seller to cure the tender.

3. The "but" clause of this section goes to the case in which it is not commercially feasible to deliver or to receive the goods in a single lot as for example, where a contract calls for the shipment of ten carloads of coal and only three cars are available at a given time. Similarly, in a contract involving brick necessary to build a building the buyer's storage space may be limited so that it would be impossible to receive the entire amount of brick at once, or it may be necessary to assemble the goods as in the case of cattle on the range, or to mine them.

In such cases, a partial delivery is not subject to rejection for the defect in quantity alone, if the circumstances do not indicate a repudiation or default by the seller as to the expected balance or do not give the buyer ground for suspending his performance because of insecurity under the provisions of Section 30-2-609. However, in such cases the undelivered balance of goods under the contract must be forthcoming within a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner according to the policy of Section 30-2-503 on manner of tender of delivery. This is reinforced by the express provisions of Section 30-2-608 that if a lot has been accepted on the reasonable assumption that its nonconformity will be cured, the acceptance may be revoked if the cure does not seasonably occur. The section rejects the rule of Kelly Construction Co. v. Hackensack Brick Co., 91 N.J.L. 585, 103 A. 417, 2 A.L.R. 685 (1918) and approves the result in Lynn M. Ranger, Inc. v. Gildersleeve, 106 Conn. 372, 138 A. 142 (1927) in which a contract was made for six carloads of coal then rolling from the mines and consigned to the seller but the seller agreed to divert the carloads to the buyer as soon as the car numbers became known to him. He arranged a diversion of two cars and then notified the buyer who then repudiated the contract. The seller was held to be entitled to his full remedy for the two cars diverted because simultaneous delivery of all of the cars was not contemplated by either party.

4. Where the circumstances indicate that a party has a right to delivery in lots, the price may be demanded for each lot if it is apportionable.

30-2-308. Absence of specified place for delivery.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-308, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Paragraphs (a) and (b)—Section 43(1), Uniform Sales Act; Paragraph (c)—none.

Changes: Slight modification in language.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Paragraphs (a) and (b) provide for those noncommercial sales and for those occasional commercial sales where no place or means of delivery has been agreed upon by the parties.

Where delivery by carrier is "required or authorized by the agreement", the seller's duties as to delivery of the goods are governed not by this section but by Section 30-2-504.

2. Under paragraph (b) when the identified goods contracted for are known to both parties to be in some location other than the seller's place of business or residence, the parties are presumed to have intended that place to be the place of delivery. This paragraph also applies (unless, as would be normal, the circumstances show that delivery by way of documents is intended) to a bulk of goods in the possession of a bailee. In such a case, however, the seller has the additional obligation to procure the acknowledgment by the bailee of the buyer's right to possession.

3. Where "customary banking channels" call only for due notification by the banker that the documents are available, leaving the buyer himself to see to the physical receipt of the goods, tender at the buyer's address is not required under paragraph (c) [subsection (c)]. But that paragraph merely eliminates the possibility of a default by the seller if "customary banking channels" have been properly used in giving notice to the buyer. Where the bank has purchased a draft accompanied by or associated with documents or has undertaken its collection on behalf of the seller, Part 5 of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4, part 5] spells out its duties and relations to its customer. Where the documents move forward under a letter of credit the Article on Letters of Credit [Title 30, chapter 5] spells out the duties and relations between the bank, the seller and the buyer. Delivery in relationship to either tangible or electronic documents of title is defined in Article 1, Section 1-201 [30-1-201].

4. The rules of this section apply only "unless otherwise agreed." The surrounding circumstances, usage of trade, course of dealing and course of performance, as well as the express language of the parties, may constitute an "otherwise agreement".

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-309. Absence of specific time provisions — notice of termination.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1)—see Sections 43(2), 45(2), 47(1) and 48, Uniform Sales Act, for policy continued under this Chapter; Subsection (2)—none; Subsection (3)—none.

Changes: Completely different in scope.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Subsection (1) requires that all actions taken under a sales contract must be taken within a reasonable time where no time has been agreed upon. The reasonable time under this provision turns on the criteria as to "reasonable time" and on good faith and commercial standards set forth in Sections 30-1-203, 30-1-204 and 30-2-103. It thus depends upon what constitutes acceptable commercial conduct in view of the nature purpose and circumstances of the action to be taken. Agreement as to a definite time, however, may be found in a term implied from the contractual circumstances, usage of trade or course of dealing or performance as well as in an express term. Such cases fall outside of this subsection since in them the time for action is "agreed" by usage.

2. The time for payment, where not agreed upon, is related to the time for delivery; the particular problems which arise in connection with determining the appropriate time of payment and the time for any inspection before payment which is both allowed by law and demanded by the buyer are covered in Section 30-2-513.

3. The facts in regard to shipment and delivery differ so widely as to make detailed provision for them in the text of this Chapter impracticable. The applicable principles, however, make it clear that surprise is to be avoided, good faith judgment is to be protected, and notice or negotiation to reduce the uncertainty to certainty is to be favored.

4. When the time for delivery is left open, unreasonably early offers of or demands for delivery are intended to be read under this Chapter as expressions of desire or intention, requesting the assent or acquiescence of the other party, not as final positions which may amount without more to breach or to create breach by the other side. See Sections 30-2-207 and 30-2-609.

5. The obligation of good faith under this Act requires reasonable notification before a contract may be treated as breached because a reasonable time for delivery or demand has expired. This operates both in the case of a contract originally indefinite as to time and of one subsequently made indefinite by waiver.

When both parties let an originally reasonable time go by in silence, the course of conduct under the contract may be viewed as enlarging the reasonable time for tender or demand of performance. The contract may be terminated by abandonment.

6. Parties to a contract are not required in giving reasonable notification to fix, at peril of breach, a time which is in fact reasonable in the unforeseeable judgment of a later trier of fact. Effective communication of a proposed time limit calls for a response, so that failure to reply will make out acquiescence. Where objection is made, however, or if the demand is merely for information as to when goods will be delivered or will be ordered out, demand for assurances on the ground of insecurity may be made under this Chapter pending further negotiations. Only when a party insists on undue delay or on rejection of the other party's reasonable proposal is there a question of flat breach under the present section.

7. Subsection (2) applies a commercially reasonable view to resolve the conflict which has arisen in the cases as to contracts of indefinite duration. The "reasonable time" of duration appropriate to a given arrangement is limited by the circumstances. When the arrangement has been carried on by the parties over the years, the "reasonable time" can continue indefinitely and the contract will not terminate until notice.

8. Subsection (3) recognizes that the application of principles of good faith and sound commercial practice normally call for such notification of the termination of a going contract relationship as will give the other party reasonable time to seek a substitute arrangement. An agreement dispensing with notification or limiting the time for the seeking of a substitute arrangement is, of course, valid under this subsection unless the results of putting it into operation would be the creation of an unconscionable state of affairs.

9. Justifiable cancellation for breach is a remedy for breach and is not the kind of termination covered by the present subsection.

10. The requirement of notification is dispensed with where the contract provides for termination on the happening of an "agreed event." "Event" is a term chosen here to contrast with "option" or the like.

Case Notes

Payment After Unilateral Price Increase as Termination of Contract and Formation of New Contract — Adequate Notice Found: Hansens ordered 30 truckloads of logs from Lumber Enterprises, Inc., at a special price. The parties agreed to ship and receive the logs over a longer period of time than originally agreed. After delivery of 18 truckloads, Lumber Enterprises raised the price of each load by about 50% and told Hansens to "take it or leave it". Hansens agreed to the increase under protest but refused to pay for the last three loads. Citing the official comment to 30-2-209 and testimony by the Lumber Enterprises manager that the company had to raise prices because it discovered it was losing money on each truckload at the agreed price, the Supreme Court held that the indefinite extension allowed the contract to be terminated at any time by either party. The Supreme Court held that when Lumber Enterprises raised its prices and the Hansens purchased logs more than 30 days after that increase, the former contract had been terminated and a new contract agreed to after reasonable notification. The District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion in applying this section. Lumber Enterprises, Inc. v. Hansen, 257 M 11, 846 P2d 1046, 50 St. Rep. 138 (1993).

Commercially Reasonable Shipping Date: Although not specified in the contract, subsequent correspondence between the parties indicates the time for shipment or delivery of the metal siding from Morin to Volk was to be approximately May 1, 1978 (90 days from the January 30 letter from Volk advising Morin that the color of the siding was to be "Buckskin 500"). Morin acknowledged the May 1, 1978, delivery date by letter dated February 2, 1978. The court concludes that even if the scheduled shipping date of May 1, 1978, were not one expressly agreed upon, it is, under all the facts and circumstances, a shipping date which would be implied as commercially reasonable. Morin Bldg. Prod. Co., Inc. v. Volk Constr., Inc., 500 F. Supp. 82, 37 St. Rep. 1803 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Time for Delivery: When the correspondence which constituted the memoranda of a contract for the sale did not specify that time was of the essence, the reasonable time provision applied. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Gleason Equip., Inc., 166 M 479, 534 P2d 883 (1975).

30-2-310. Open time for payment or running of credit — authority to ship under reservation.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-310, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 42 and 47(2), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten in this and other sections.

Purposes of Changes: This section is drawn to reflect modern business methods of dealing at a distance rather than face to face. Thus:

1. Paragraph (a) provides that payment is due at the time and place "the buyer is to receive the goods" rather than at the point of delivery except in documentary shipment cases (paragraph (c)). This grants an opportunity for the exercise by the buyer of his preliminary right to inspection before paying even though under the delivery term the risk of loss may have previously passed to him or the running of the credit period has already started.

2. Paragraph (b) [subsection (2)] while providing for inspection by the buyer before he pays, protects the seller. He is not required to give up possession of the goods until he has received payment, where no credit has been contemplated by the parties. The seller may collect through a bank by a sight draft against an order bill of lading "hold until arrival; inspection allowed." The obligations of the bank under such a provision are set forth in Part 5 of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4, part 5]. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], in the absence of a credit term, the seller is permitted to ship under reservation and if he does payment is then due where and when the buyer is to receive delivery of the tangible documents of title. In the case of an electronic document of title, payment is due when the buyer is to receive delivery of the electronic document and at the seller's place of business, or if none, the seller's residence. Delivery as to documents of title is stated in Article 1, Section 1-201 [30-1-201].

3. Unless otherwise agreed, the place for the delivery of the documents and payment is the buyer's city but the time for payment is only after arrival of the goods, since under paragraph (b) [subsection (2)], and Sections 2-512 and 2-513 [30-2-512 and 30-2-513] the buyer is under no duty to pay prior to inspection. Tender of a document of title requires that the seller be ready, willing and able to transfer possession of a tangible document of title or control of an electronic document of title to the buyer.

4. Where the mode of shipment is such that goods must be unloaded immediately upon arrival, too rapidly to permit adequate inspection before receipt, the seller must be guided by the provisions of this Chapter on inspection which provide that if the seller wishes to demand payment before inspection, he must put an appropriate term into the contract. Even requiring payment against documents will not of itself have this desired result if the documents are to be held until the arrival of the goods. But under (b) and (c) if the terms are C.I.F., C.O.D., or cash against documents payment may be due before inspection.

5. Paragraph (d) states the common commercial understanding that an agreed credit period runs from the time of shipment or from that dating of the invoice which is commonly recognized as a representation of the time of shipment. The provision concerning any delay in sending forth the invoice is included because such conduct results in depriving the buyer of his full notice and warning as to when he must be prepared to pay.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (3) at end inserted "regardless of where the goods are to be received"; in (3)(a) at end substituted "delivery of the tangible documents" for "the documents regardless of where the goods are to be received"; inserted (3)(b) relating to electronic documents; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-2-311. Options and cooperation respecting performance.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) permits the parties to leave certain detailed particulars of performance to be filled in by either of them without running the risk of having the contract invalidated for indefiniteness. The party to whom the agreement gives power to specify the missing details is required to exercise good faith and to act in accordance with commercial standards so that there is no surprise and the range of permissible variation is limited by what is commercially reasonable. The "agreement" which permits one party so to specify may be found as well in a course of dealing, usage of trade, or implication from circumstances as in explicit language used by the parties.

2. Options as to assortment of goods or shipping arrangements are specifically reserved to the buyer and seller respectively under subsection (2) where no other arrangement has been made. This section rejects the test which mechanically and without regard to usage or the purpose of the option gave the option to the party "first under a duty to move" and applies instead a standard commercial interpretation to these circumstances. The "unless otherwise agreed" provision of this subsection covers not only express terms but the background and circumstances which enter into the agreement.

3. Subsection (3) applies when the exercise of an option or cooperation by one party is necessary to or materially affects the other party's performance, but it is not seasonably forthcoming; the subsection relieves the other party from the necessity for performance or excuses his delay in performance as the case may be. The contract-keeping party may at his option under this subsection proceed to perform in any commercially reasonable manner rather than wait. In addition to the special remedies provided, this subsection also reserves "all other remedies". The remedy of particular importance in this connection is that provided for insecurity. Request may also be made pursuant to the obligation of good faith for a reasonable indication of the time and manner of performance for which a party is to hold himself ready.

4. The remedy provided in subsection (3) is one which does not operate in the situation which falls within the scope of Section 30-2-614 on substituted performance. Where the failure to cooperate results from circumstances set forth in that Section, the other party is under a duty to proffer or demand (as the case may be) substitute performance as a condition to claiming rights against the noncooperating party.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-312. Warranty of title and against infringement — buyer's obligation against infringement.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 13, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten, the provisions concerning infringement being new.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Subsection (1) makes provision for a buyer's basic needs in respect to a title which he in good faith expects to acquire by his purchase, namely, that he receive a good, clean title transferred to him also in a rightful manner so that he will not be exposed to a lawsuit in order to protect it.

The warranty extends to a buyer whether or not the seller was in possession of the goods at the time the sale or contract to sell was made.

The warranty of quiet possession is abolished. Disturbance of quiet possession, although not mentioned specifically, is one way, among many, in which the breach of the warranty of title may be established.

The "knowledge" referred to in subsection (1)(b) is actual knowledge as distinct from notice.

2. The provisions of this Chapter requiring notification to the seller within a reasonable time after the buyer's discovery of a breach apply to notice of a breach of the warranty of title, where the seller's breach was innocent. However, if the seller's breach was in bad faith he cannot be permitted to claim that he has been misled or prejudiced by the delay in giving notice. In such case the "reasonable" time for notice should receive a very liberal interpretation. Whether the breach by the seller is in good or bad faith Section 30-2-725 provides that the cause of action accrues when the breach occurs. Under the provisions of that section the breach of the warranty of good title occurs when tender of delivery is made since the warranty is not one which extends to "future performance of the goods."

3. When the goods are part of the seller's normal stock and are sold in his normal course of business, it is his duty to see that no claim of infringement of a patent or trademark by a third party will mar the buyer's title. A sale by a person other than a dealer, however, raises no implication in its circumstances of such a warranty. Nor is there such an implication when the buyer orders goods to be assembled, prepared or manufactured on his own specifications. If, in such a case, the resulting product infringes a patent or trademark, the liability will run from buyer to seller. There is, under such circumstances, a tacit representation on the part of the buyer that the seller will be safe in manufacturing according to the specifications, and the buyer is under an obligation in good faith to indemnify him for any loss suffered.

4. This section rejects the cases which recognize the principle that infringements violate the warranty of title but deny the buyer a remedy unless he has been expressly prevented from using the goods. Under this Chapter "eviction" is not a necessary condition to the buyer's remedy since the buyer's remedy arises immediately upon receipt of notice of infringement; it is merely one way of establishing the fact of breach.

5. Subsection (2) recognizes that sales by sheriffs, executors, certain foreclosing lienors and persons similarly situated may be so out of the ordinary commercial course that their peculiar character is immediately apparent to the buyer and therefore no personal obligation is imposed upon the seller who is purporting to sell only an unknown or limited right. This subsection does not touch upon and leaves open all questions of restitution arising in such cases, when a unique article so sold is reclaimed by a third party as the rightful owner.

Foreclosure sales under Chapter 9A are another matter. Section 30-9A-610 provides that a disposition of collateral under that section includes warranties such as those imposed by this section on a voluntary disposition of property of the kind involved. Consequently, unless properly excluded under subsection (2) or under the special provisions for exclusion in Section 30-9A-610, a disposition under Section 30-9A-610 of collateral consisting of goods includes the warranties imposed by subsection (1) and, if applicable, subsection (3).

6. The warranty of subsection (1) is not designated as an "implied" warranty, and hence is not subject to Section 30-2-316(3). Disclaimer of the warranty of title is governed instead by subsection (2), which requires either specific language or the described circumstances.

Warranty of Title Breached When Seller Sold Stolen Goods: Defendant pawnshop operator who sold stolen property to plaintiff refused to give plaintiff a refund after the property was recovered by police. Defendant argued that he disclaimed any warranty of title to goods sold in his business by posting a sign alerting buyers that merchandise is sold "as is" and by writing the same notation on his sales slips. Defendant clearly breached the warranty of clear title under this section when he sold stolen goods because neither a thief nor his successor pass clear title to stolen goods. It was irrelevant that defendant claimed he did not know the goods were stolen. Brokke v. Williams, 235 M 305, 766 P2d 1311, 46 St. Rep. 6 (1989).

30-2-313. Express warranties by affirmation, promise, description, sample.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 12, 14 and 16, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To consolidate and systematize basic principles with the result that:

1. "Express" warranties rest on "dickered" aspects of the individual bargain, and go so clearly to the essence of that bargain that words of disclaimer in a form are repugnant to the basic dickered terms. "Implied" warranties rest so clearly on a common factual situation or set of conditions that no particular language or action is necessary to evidence them and they will arise in such a situation unless unmistakably negated.

This section reverts to the older case law insofar as the warranties of description and sample are designated "express" rather than "implied".

2. Although this section is limited in its scope and direct purpose to warranties made by the seller to the buyer as part of a contract for sale, the warranty sections of this Chapter are not designed in any way to disturb those lines of case law growth which have recognized that warranties need not be confined either to sales contracts or to the direct parties to such a contract. They may arise in other appropriate circumstances such as in the case of bailments for hire, whether such bailment is itself the main contract or is merely a supplying of containers under a contract for the sale of their contents. The provisions of Section 30-2-318 on third party beneficiaries expressly recognize this case law development within one particular area. Beyond that, the matter is left to the case law with the intention that the policies of this Act may offer useful guidance in dealing with further cases as they arise.

3. The present section deals with affirmations of fact by the seller, descriptions of the goods or exhibitions of samples, exactly as any other part of a negotiation which ends in a contract is dealt with. No specific intention to make a warranty is necessary if any of these factors is made part of the basis of the bargain. In actual practice affirmations of fact made by the seller about the goods during a bargain are regarded as part of the description of those goods; hence no particular reliance on such statements need be shown in order to weave them into the fabric of the agreement. Rather, any fact which is to take such affirmations, once made, out of the agreement requires clear affirmative proof. The issue normally is one of fact.

4. In view of the principle that the whole purpose of the law of warranty is to determine what it is that the seller has in essence agreed to sell, the policy is adopted of those cases which refuse except in unusual circumstances to recognize a material deletion of the seller's obligation. Thus, a contract is normally a contract for a sale of something describable and described. A clause generally disclaiming "all warranties, express or implied" cannot reduce the seller's obligation with respect to such description and therefore cannot be given literal effect under Section 30-2-316.

This is not intended to mean that the parties, if they consciously desire, cannot make their own bargain as they wish. But in determining what they have agreed upon good faith is a factor and consideration should be given to the fact that the probability is small that a real price is intended to be exchanged for a pseudo-obligation.

5. Paragraph (1)(b) makes specific some of the principles set forth above when a description of the goods is given by the seller.

A description need not be by words. Technical specifications, blueprints and the like can afford more exact description than mere language and if made part of the basis of the bargain goods must conform with them. Past deliveries may set the description of quality, either expressly or impliedly by course of dealing. Of course, all descriptions by merchants must be read against the applicable trade usages with the general rules as to merchantability resolving any doubts.

6. The basic situation as to statements affecting the true essence of the bargain is no different when a sample or model is involved in the transaction. This section includes both a "sample" actually drawn from the bulk of goods which is the subject matter of the sale, and a "model" which is offered for inspection when the subject matter is not at hand and which has not been drawn from the bulk of the goods.

Although the underlying principles are unchanged, the facts are often ambiguous when something is shown as illustrative, rather than as a straight sample. In general, the presumption is that any sample or model just as any affirmation of fact is intended to become a basis of the bargain. But there is no escape from the question of fact. When the seller exhibits a sample purporting to be drawn from an existing bulk, good faith of course requires that the sample be fairly drawn. But in mercantile experience the mere exhibition of a "sample" does not of itself show whether it is merely intended to "suggest" or to "be" the character of the subject-matter of the contract. The question is whether the seller has so acted with reference to the sample as to make him responsible that the whole shall have at least the values shown by it. The circumstances aid in answering this question. If the sample has been drawn from an existing bulk, it must be regarded as describing values of the goods contracted for unless it is accompanied by an unmistakable denial of such responsibility. If, on the other hand, a model of merchandise not on hand is offered, the mercantile presumption that it has become a literal description of the subject matter is not so strong, and particularly so if modification on the buyer's initiative impairs any feature of the model.

7. The precise time when words of description or affirmation are made or samples are shown is not material. The sole question is whether the language or samples or models are fairly to be regarded as part of the contract. If language is used after the closing of the deal (as when the buyer when taking delivery asks and receives an additional assurance), the warranty becomes a modification, and need not be supported by consideration if it is otherwise reasonable and in order (Section 30-2-209).

8. Concerning affirmations of value or a seller's opinion or commendation under subsection (2), the basic question remains the same: What statements of the seller have in the circumstances and in objective judgment become part of the basis of the bargain? As indicated above, all of the statements of the seller do so unless good reason is shown to the contrary. The provisions of subsection (2) are included, however, since common experience discloses that some statements or predictions cannot fairly be viewed as entering into the bargain. Even as to false statements of value, however, the possibility is left open that a remedy may be provided by the law relating to fraud or misrepresentation.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Statement in Sales Brochure Rising to Level of Express Warranty: Defendant motor home manufacturer argued that plaintiffs' claims for breach of warranty arising from a swaying and handling problem with their motor home were not supported by the evidence and should not have gone to the jury. Defendant contended that plaintiffs reviewed the express warranties associated with a motor home and knew that defendant's warranty did not cover the chassis and its component parts, which were covered by a separate warranty with the chassis manufacturer. The District Court rejected defendant's argument, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. A statement in one of defendant's sales brochures promised a "flawless ride", and the jury could have concluded that the statement created an express warranty that was subsequently breached. Vader v. Fleetwood Enterprises, Inc., 2009 MT 6, 348 M 344, 201 P3d 139 (2009).

Abuse of Product: Plaintiff brought suit after the engine of his 2-year-old truck quit running. The truck had 42,000 miles on it at the time. Defendant refused to repair the truck under warranty. Testimony indicated that there was significant damage to the truck. The evidence of the condition of the truck indicated that the truck was abused and that the abuse directly affected the engine's performance. There was substantial evidence to support a verdict for the defendant. Owens v. Gen. Motors Corp., 249 M 124, 813 P2d 985, 48 St. Rep. 608 (1991).

Statements and Conduct as Basis for Express Warranty: Scheckla represented to Melotz that an engine was in good working condition, recently had major repair work done to it, and could be put right to work. After the engine was installed and developed problems, Melotz was told to replace the bearings and if that did not correct the problems, Scheckla would pay for the repairs. Additionally, on at least one other occasion, Scheckla recommended the type of repairs that should be done and had his mechanic work on the engine in an attempt to fix it. Scheckla's statements, together with his conduct after the engine was installed, provided a sufficient basis upon which the jury could find that an express warranty existed. Melotz v. Scheckla, 245 M 327, 801 P2d 593, 47 St. Rep. 2165 (1990).

Warranties — When Created — When Disclaimed: Plaintiffs brought an action against a farm implement company for breach of implied warranties of merchantability and fitness. The court noted that the Montana U.C.C. allows a seller to disclaim these implied warranties by means of "conspicuous" language in a writing. It was found the disclaimers in this case were sufficiently conspicuous to be effective under 30-2-316. The plaintiffs claimed the advertising, promotional materials, and operator's manual created express warranties under 30-2-313. The court held the disclaimers did not destroy the express warranty of safety made in the operator's manual. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Sale of Sprinkler Irrigation Equipment: The evidence supported the court's findings that defendants made express warranties to plaintiffs in the course of a sales transaction involving sprinkler irrigation equipment, orally and by brochure, and that they were breached. Whitaker v. Farmhand, Inc., 173 M 345, 567 P2d 916 (1977).

Workmanship Warranty: The court properly found, based upon the only evidence presented, that the third-party defendant expressly warranted and guaranteed its work and that the work was improperly performed, causing the defective condition. Prudential Fed. S & L v. Bldg. Agencies, Inc., 173 M 263, 567 P2d 445 (1977).

30-2-314. Implied warranty — merchantability — usage of trade.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 15(2), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: This section, drawn in view of the steadily developing case law on the subject, is intended to make it clear that:

1. The seller's obligation applies to present sales as well as to contracts to sell subject to the effects of any examination of specific goods. (Subsection (2) of Section 30-2-316). Also, the warranty of merchantability applies to sales for use as well as to sales for resale.

2. The question when the warranty is imposed turns basically on the meaning of the terms of the agreement as recognized in the trade. Goods delivered under an agreement made by a merchant in a given line of trade must be of a quality comparable to that generally acceptable in that line of trade under the description or other designation of the goods used in the agreement. The responsibility imposed rests on any merchant-seller, and the absence of the words "grower or manufacturer or not" which appeared in Section 15(2) of the Uniform Sales Act does not restrict the applicability of this section.

3. A specific designation of goods by the buyer does not exclude the seller's obligation that they be fit for the general purposes appropriate to such goods. A contract for the sale of second-hand goods, however, involves only such obligation as is appropriate to such goods for that is their contract description. A person making an isolated sale of goods is not a "merchant" within the meaning of the full scope of this section and, thus, no warranty of merchantability would apply. His knowledge of any defects not apparent on inspection would, however, without need for express agreement and in keeping with the underlying reason of the present section and the provisions on good faith, impose an obligation that known material but hidden defects be fully disclosed.

4. Although a seller may not be a "merchant" as to the goods in question, if he states generally that they are "guaranteed" the provisions of this section may furnish a guide to the content of the resulting express warranty. This has particular significance in the case of second-hand sales, and has further significance in limiting the effect of fine-print disclaimer clauses where their effect would be inconsistent with large-print assertions of "guarantee".

5. The second sentence of subsection (1) covers the warranty with respect to food and drink. Serving food or drink for value is a sale, whether to be consumed on the premises or elsewhere. Cases to the contrary are rejected. The principal warranty is that stated in subsections (1) and (2)(c) of this section.

6. Subsection (2) does not purport to exhaust the meaning of "merchantable" nor to negate any of its attributes not specifically mentioned in the text of the statute, but arising by usage of trade or through case law. The language used is "must be at least such as . . . ," and the intention is to leave open other possible attributes of merchantability.

7. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) are to be read together. Both refer, as indicated above, to the standards of that line of the trade which fits the transaction and the seller's business. "Fair average" is a term directly appropriate to agricultural bulk products and means goods centering around the middle belt of quality, not the least or the worst that can be understood in the particular trade by the designation, but such as can pass "without objection." Of course a fair percentage of the least is permissible but the goods are not "fair average" if they are all of the least or worst quality possible under the description. In cases of doubt as to what quality is intended, the price at which a merchant closes a contract is an excellent index of the nature and scope of his obligation under the present section.

8. Fitness for the ordinary purposes for which goods of the type are used is a fundamental concept of the present section and is covered in paragraph (c). As stated above, merchantability is also a part of the obligation owing to the purchaser for use. Correspondingly, protection, under this aspect of the warranty, of the person buying for resale to the ultimate consumer is equally necessary, and merchantable goods must therefore be "honestly" resalable in the normal course of business because they are what they purport to be.

9. Paragraph (d) on evenness of kind, quality and quantity follows case law. But precautionary language has been added as a reminder of the frequent usages of trade which permit substantial variations both with and without an allowance or an obligation to replace the varying units.

10. Paragraph (e) applies only where the nature of the goods and of the transaction require a certain type of container, package or label. Paragraph (f) applies, on the other hand, wherever there is a label or container on which representations are made, even though the original contract, either by express terms or usage of trade, may not have required either the labelling or the representation. This follows from the general obligation of good faith which requires that a buyer should not be placed in the position of reselling or using goods delivered under false representations appearing on the package or container. No problem of extra consideration arises in this connection since, under this Chapter, an obligation is imposed by the original contract not to deliver mislabeled articles, and the obligation is imposed where mercantile good faith so requires and without reference to the doctrine of consideration.

11. Exclusion or modification of the warranty of merchantability, or of any part of it, is dealt with in the section to which the text of the present section makes explicit precautionary references. That section must be read with particular reference to its subsection (4) on limitation of remedies. The warranty of merchantability, wherever it is normal, is so commonly taken for granted that its exclusion from the contract is a matter threatening surprise and therefore requiring special precaution.

12. Subsection (3) is to make explicit that usage of trade and course of dealing can create warranties and that they are implied rather than express warranties and thus subject to exclusion or modification under Section 30-2-316. A typical instance would be the obligation to provide pedigree papers to evidence conformity of the animal to the contract in the case of a pedigreed dog or blooded bull.

13. In an action based on breach of warranty, it is of course necessary to show not only the existence of the warranty but the fact that the warranty was broken and that the breach of the warranty was the proximate cause of the loss sustained. In such an action an affirmative showing by the seller that the loss resulted from some action or event following his own delivery of the goods can operate as a defense. Equally, evidence indicating that the seller exercised care in the manufacture, processing or selection of the goods is relevant to the issue of whether the warranty was in fact broken. Action by the buyer following an examination of the goods which ought to have indicated the defect complained of can be shown as matter bearing on whether the breach itself was the cause of the injury.

Case Notes

Failure to Warn Claims Available to Bystanders: A youth pitcher died after being struck in the head by a ball hit by a bat manufactured and sold by the defendant. His parents brought claims for design defect and failure to warn against the bat manufacturer. The bat manufacturer argued that a failure to warn claim is available to only the actual user or purchaser of the bat, and not to bystanders. Citing Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 Mont. 44, 692 P.2d 440 (1984), and Hagen v. Dow Chem. Co., 261 Mont. 487, 863 P.2d 413 (1993), the Supreme Court concluded that Montana's product liability jurisprudence permits a person who is neither the actual user nor the purchaser of the product to file a failure to warn claim. In this case, the bat manufacturer was subject to liability for all of the baseball players for inadequately communicating the potential risk of harm posed by the bat. Patch v. Hillerich & Bradsby Co., 2011 MT 175, 361 Mont. 241, 257 P.3d 383.

Feasibility of Providing Warning — Jury Question: Defendant baseball bat manufacturer argued that providing a warning to bystanders about the use of a bat was "unworkable" and that the District Court erred in not granting it summary judgment on the plaintiffs' failure to warn claim. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's ruling that the feasibility of providing a warning to bystanders was a question for the jury and was not proper for summary judgment. Patch v. Hillerich & Bradsby Co., 2011 MT 175, 361 Mont. 241, 257 P.3d 383.

Foreseeability Not Required in Breach of Contract Action Under Uniform Commercial Code When Injury Results From Breach of Warranty: A breach of contract action under the Uniform Commercial Code does not require foreseeability if injury to person or property proximately results from any breach of warranty. Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Negligence and Strict Liability Action for Damages by Pesticide Not Preempted by FIFRA — McAlpine Overruled: Plaintiffs brought an action for damages allegedly suffered when a pesticide was applied at the building where they worked. The District Court granted summary judgment for the pesticide manufacturer on the basis that the claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) and McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474 (1997), because all of the theories of liability were based on inclusions in or omissions from the pesticide labels. In particular, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b) provides that a state may not impose or continue in effect any requirement for labeling or packaging in addition to or different from those required under the federal law. On appeal, the Supreme Court overruled McAlpine and instead applied Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 US 470 (1996), concluding that Congress, through FIFRA, intended only to preempt states from imposing positive law requirements in the form of regulations and laws and did not intend to extinguish damage remedies under state common law. The word "requirements" in section 136v(b) means enactments of positive law by legislative or administrative bodies, not state law damage actions. The case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000).

Damage to Crops by Herbicide — Extent of Preemption by FIFRA — Claims for Breach of Express and Implied Warranty Not Preempted — Negligence and Strict Liability Preempted —

Remedy for Prevention of Discovery by Summary Judgment: McAlpine applied Weedone LV6, a herbicide manufactured by Rhone-Poulenc and distributed by Ben Taylor, to crops of barley and spring wheat. After several weeks of cool morning temperatures, McAlpine noticed damage to his crops, which experts from Montana State University (now Montana State University-Bozeman) and the Montana Department of Agriculture said was caused by cool temperatures after application of the herbicide. The McAlpines brought a civil action against Rhone-Poulenc, claiming damages from negligence, breach of express and implied warranty, and strict liability. The District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the basis that the plaintiffs' claims were based on deficiencies in the label on Weedone LV6 and that those claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA). Citing Wis. Pub. Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 US 597 (1991), and Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 US 504 (1992), the Supreme Court interpreted the FIFRA preemption statement, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b), to preempt only claims based upon negligence in labeling and not to preempt the appellants' claims based upon either express or implied warranty or strict liability. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the appellants must be given the opportunity to prove that Rhone-Poulenc and Ben Taylor breached their warranty by designing, manufacturing, and marketing a product that was inherently defective and that the same defendants are strictly liable for designing, manufacturing, and marketing an unreasonably dangerous product. In response to Rhone-Poulenc's argument that the McAlpines failed to offer any evidence to defeat summary judgment, the Supreme Court pointed out that because the District Court granted summary judgment, the McAlpines were prevented from conducting complete discovery and that until discovery was completed, it was premature for the Supreme Court to conclude that the McAlpines' evidence was insufficient. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474, 54 St. Rep. 1123 (1997), overruled in Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000), holding that state common-law negligence and strict liability claims based on or implicating pesticide labels are not preempted by FIFRA. Following the 1997 remand of McAlpine, the McAlpines settled with Ben Taylor, Inc., and proceeded to trial against Rhone-Poulenc on a theory of strict products liability, claiming that Weedone LV6 was a defective product because its propensity to damage or destroy crops in conjunction with cold weather was a danger outside the expectations of the ordinary consumer. Rhone-Poulenc acknowledged that the crop damage was caused by the phenoxy herbicide, but argued that the damage was not unreasonably dangerous and that liability exists only when a product is sufficiently dangerous. The trial court instructed the jury that it must find that the herbicide was in a "defective condition unreasonably dangerous", rather than merely in a defective condition, and the jury returned a verdict for Rhone-Poulenc. The McAlpines appealed. The Supreme Court previously held in McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910 (1987), that a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, but a plaintiff is not required to show that a product is defective and also that it is unreasonably dangerous, because establishing that a product is unreasonably dangerous is merely a means of proving that it is defective. Thus, the "defective condition unreasonably dangerous" language creates a vague and imprecise dual test and should not have been submitted to the jury because it was not plain, clear, and concise. The jury should have been required to find merely that the product was in a defective condition, so the case was again remanded. Further, the decision in Sleath, id., also applied on remand, so evidence of the product label was admissible in further proceedings. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 2000 MT 383, 304 M 31, 16 P3d 1054, 57 St. Rep. 1644 (2000).

Absence of Evidence of Defective Vehicle Window Design — Failure to Warn Not Defect — Jury Verdict Affirmed: As Wise drove a Ford Escort through a car wash, one of the side windows imploded when water was sprayed on it, injuring Wise, who sued Ford Motor Company for damages. The District Court properly applied the standards of product tort liability, including Ford's liability for failure to warn of a danger in its product as a separate theory of product liability. Alternate causes of the breakage were not necessarily eliminated, and the jury could have found that Wise did not meet his burden of proof by way of circumstantial evidence. The jury found in favor of Ford. Evidence supported the verdict that the vehicle was not defectively designed or defective for Ford's failure to warn that the side windows could break. Because the jury had substantial evidence upon which to base its decision that the vehicle did not have an unreasonably dangerous defective condition, judgment was affirmed. Wise v. Ford Motor Co., 284 M 336, 943 P2d 1310, 54 St. Rep. 909 (1997).

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

Abuse of Product: Plaintiff brought suit after the engine of his 2-year-old truck quit running. The truck had 42,000 miles on it at the time. Defendant refused to repair the truck under warranty. Testimony indicated that there was significant damage to the truck. The evidence of the condition of the truck indicated that the truck was abused and that the abuse directly affected the engine's performance. There was substantial evidence to support a verdict for the defendant. Owens v. Gen. Motors Corp., 249 M 124, 813 P2d 985, 48 St. Rep. 608 (1991).

Disclaimer on Back of Purchase Agreement Not Per Se Sufficient to Render Disclaimer Ineffective: Plaintiffs contended that a disclaimer of warranty of merchantability was invalid because there was no evidence they ever saw or were made aware of the disclaimer or were made aware of its significance. The Supreme Court noted that the disclaimer was not hidden in the fine print but was in larger, darker, bolder type and was capitalized and underlined. The fact that the disclaimer appeared on the back of the purchase agreement was not per se sufficient to render it ineffective because a person is presumed to have read contractual agreements he enters into. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987).

Failure to Prove Unreasonably Dangerous Defective Condition — Proper Test of Defective Product: The Supreme Court adopted a modified approach to the test of strict liability as defined by sec. 402A, Restatement (Second) of Torts, in holding that while a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, the lack of a dangerous aspect does not automatically preclude a finding that the product is defective. The proper test of a defective product is whether the product is unreasonably unsuitable for its intended or foreseeable purpose. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987).

Factors to Be Considered in Alternative Design Products Liability Case: Recognizing that all factors may not be appropriate in every case and that additional factors should be considered where appropriate, the court found that the following factors should be considered in an alternative design product liability case:

"(1) A manufacturer who sells a product in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous because of a design defect is subject to liability for harm thereby caused to the ultimate user.

(2) A product may be in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous if the manufacturer should have used an alternative design.

(3) In determining whether an alternative design should have been used, the jury should balance so many of the following factors as it finds to be pertinent at the time of manufacture:

(a) The reasonable probability that the product as originally designed would cause serious harm to the claimant.

(b) Consideration of the reasonable probability of harm from the use of the original product as compared to the reasonable probability of harm from the use of the product with the alternative design.

(c) The technological feasibility of an alternative design that would have prevented claimant's harm.

(d) The relative costs both to the manufacturer and the consumer of producing, distributing and selling the original product as compared to the product with the alternative design.

(e) The time reasonably required to implement the alternative design." Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Manufacturing Defects Defined: In finding jury instructions to be adequate, the court held that the essential question was whether the product was flawed or defective because it was not constructed correctly by the manufacturer. The court quoted from Caprara v. Chrysler Corp., 436 N.Y.S.2d 251 (1981), saying: "Manufacturing defects, by definition, are "imperfections that inevitably occur in a typically small percentage of products of a given design as a result of the fallibility of the manufacturing process. A defectively manufactured product does not conform in some significant aspect to the intended design, nor does it conform to the great majority of products manufactured in accordance with that design." Stated differently, a defectively manufactured product is flawed because it is misconstructed without regard to whether the intended design of the manufacturer was safe or not. Such defects result from some mishap in the manufacturing process itself, improper workmanship, or because defective materials were used in construction." Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Duty to Warn of Known Danger — Lack of Warning of Known Danger as Defect: In a tort action over injury caused by a hay baler, the Supreme Court held, based on the holding of Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978), that it was error to instruct the jury that a manufacturer has no duty to warn a person who claims to be entitled to a warning if the person actually knows of the danger. Under the facts of this case, there is a duty to warn of a known danger if the product is unreasonably dangerous and lack of such warning can make an otherwise nondefective product defective. Tacke v. Vermeer Mfg. Co., 220 M 1, 713 P2d 527, 43 St. Rep. 123 (1986). Recognition of a failure to warn claim and the Brown criteria were applied in Riley v. Am. Honda Motor Co., Inc., 259 M 128, 856 P2d 196, 50 St. Rep. 714 (1993). See also Emery v. Federated Foods, Inc., 262 M 83, 863 P2d 426, 50 St. Rep. 1454 (1993).

Products Liability — Breach of Warranties — No Privity Requirement: Goods are not merchantable if, in their ordinary use, the goods cause damage to the property to which they are applied or harm to the person using them. Potato sprout suppressant that caused erratic growing results in potato crop was nonmerchantable because in its ordinary use it caused damage to property to which it was applied. There was also a breach of warranty of fitness because manufacturer's representative knew the use for which plaintiff purchased product. The privity requirement has been abolished in Montana, and a remote manufacturer may be liable for breach of implied warranties. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984).

Products Liability — Failure to Warn of Adverse Side Effects — Expert Witness Testimony Not Necessary to Establish Standard of Care: Plaintiffs sued manufacturer of chemical potato sprout suppressant when use of product caused erratic growing results in potato crop. Plaintiffs' expert witness made no declaration as to failure to warn or that product was defective. Expert witness gave results of field tests that revealed decided risk of adverse side effects against which manufacturer did not warn. Supreme Court held that expert witness testimony was not necessary to establish standard of care owed by manufacturer to plaintiffs and that defendant breached that standard because any layman could understand insufficiency of warning. Evidence was sufficient to establish duty to warn of adverse side effects and that manufacturer breached that duty. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984).

Products Liability — Negligence — Duty of Care: A manufacturer has a duty to use reasonable care to give warning of dangerous condition of a product to those he expects to use the product or those endangered by its foreseeable use. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Products Liability — Strict Liability Applicable in Commercial Case — Failure to Warn — Jury Instructions: Plaintiffs, potato growers, sued manufacturer of chemical potato sprout suppressant that caused potato crop to show delayed and erratic emergence, multiple sprouting, a heavy tuber set resulting in small potatoes, and reduced yield. The only warning on the bag was a statement that after planting there might be a "slight delay in emergence depending on weather conditions and variety". District Court jury found defendant liable for damages based on theories of strict liability in tort, negligence, and breach of warranties. Supreme Court affirmed judgment and damage award. Supreme Court held that theory of strict liability applies in a case of lost profits in a purely commercial setting not involving personal injury. Supreme Court stated that when the defect involves an inadequate warning, the test of Restatement (Second) of Torts, section 402(a), is met, i.e., the product is "in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous" to the user or to his property. Use of accepted form instructions for personal injury strict liability cases that were modified to fit a property damage case were not error. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984).

Products Liability — When Only Damage Done to Defective Product Itself: A claim of strict liability in tort can be maintained when the only injury suffered is to the product itself. Thompson v. Nebr. Mobile Homes Corp., 198 M 461, 647 P2d 334, 39 St. Rep. 1094 (1982).

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Implied Warranty of Merchantability Inapplicable to Lease: Defendant leased a truck from plaintiff. The truck was in the shop many times, and after an accident and long delays in obtaining parts, defendant defaulted on the lease. Plaintiff sued for amounts owing under the lease, and defendant counterclaimed for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The implied warranty of merchantability is only applicable in the event of a "sale" as defined in the Uniform Commercial Code. On the basis of the definition of sale and language contained in the lease agreement, the Supreme Court found that the implied warranty of merchantability was not applicable. R&W Leasing v. Mosher, 195 M 285, 636 P2d 832, 38 St. Rep. 1857 (1981).

Proof of Credit Purchase — Requisite Proof of Warranty Breach: In an action to collect the purchase price of tires purchased on credit, the defendant (buyer) filed a counterclaim for breach of warranty against the plaintiff. The defendant's counterclaim properly was denied because the defendant had failed to prove a prima facie case. Defendant appealed that there was no proof of some of the purchases. The Supreme Court said that an open account between the seller and buyer can be proved by evidence that the seller's records show that the goods were sold, that invoices had been sent to the buyer who failed to object to them, and that the seller's records are accurate. Here the buyer's rebuttal testimony was indefinite, and credibility was a trial court question. No breach of warranty was proven; only the testimony of the buyer was given and no solid evidence, such as any tires, records of the amount of use of the tires, or maintenance records, was produced. This, with findings of possible alternative causes of the problems with the tires, was a sufficient record to support the finding that breach of warranty was not proved by sufficient evidence. Defendant therefore was liable for the price of the tires. D&K Distrib. v. Ford, 189 M 505, 616 P2d 1097, 37 St. Rep. 1693 (1980).

Sale of Sprinkler Irrigation Equipment: The evidence supported the court's findings that implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose did exist in a transaction for the sale of sprinkler irrigation equipment and that they were breached. Whitaker v. Farmhand, Inc., 173 M 345, 567 P2d 916 (1977).

Proof of Manufacturer Defect: The court did not err in granting defendants' motion for directed verdict when plaintiff failed to prove that the defect that caused an engine fire existed when the vehicle left the hands of the defendants — a necessary element in breach of implied warranty of merchantability, strict liability, and res ipsa loquitur legal theories. St. Paul Mercury Ins. Co. v. Jeep Corp. & Am. Motors Sales, 175 M 69, 572 P2d 204 (1977).

Breach of Warranty — Cattle Breeding: Implied warranties of merchantability and fitness were not met by artificial insemination service which sold semen to cattle rancher who had experienced a 95% calf crop via natural service prior to using artificial insemination, where the rancher experienced a 70% calf crop with artificial insemination in the first year and only a 7% calf crop in the second year using semen from the same bull under almost identical conditions. The only logical inference was that the semen purchased for use in the second year was defective. Waddell v. Am. Breeders Serv. Inc., 161 M 221, 505 P2d 417, 61 ALR 3d 801 (1973).

30-2-315. Implied warranty — fitness for particular purpose.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 15(1), (4), (5), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Whether or not this warranty arises in any individual case is basically a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of the contracting. Under this section the buyer need not bring home to the seller actual knowledge of the particular purpose for which the goods are intended or of his reliance on the seller's skill and judgment, if the circumstances are such that the seller has reason to realize the purpose intended or that the reliance exists. The buyer, of course, must actually be relying on the seller.

2. A "particular purpose" differs from the ordinary purpose for which the goods are used in that it envisages a specific use by the buyer which is peculiar to the nature of his business whereas the ordinary purposes for which goods are used are those envisaged in the concept of merchantability and go to uses which are customarily made of the goods in question. For example, shoes are generally used for the purpose of walking upon ordinary ground, but a seller may know that a particular pair was selected to be used for climbing mountains.

A contract may of course include both a warranty of merchantability and one of fitness for a particular purpose.

The provisions of this Chapter on the cumulation and conflict of express and implied warranties must be considered on the question of inconsistency between or among warranties. In such a case any question of fact as to which warranty was intended by the parties to apply must be resolved in favor of the warranty of fitness for particular purpose as against all other warranties except where the buyer has taken upon himself the responsibility of furnishing the technical specifications.

3. In connection with the warranty of fitness for a particular purpose the provisions of this Chapter on the allocation or division of risks are particularly applicable in any transaction in which the purpose for which the goods are to be used combines requirements both as to the quality of the goods themselves and compliance with certain laws or regulations. How the risks are divided is a question of fact to be determined, where not expressly contained in the agreement, from the circumstances of contracting, usage of trade, course of performance and the like, matters which may constitute the "otherwise agreement" of the parties by which they may divide the risk or burden.

4. The absence from this section of the language used in the Uniform Sales Act in referring to the seller, "whether he be the grower or manufacturer or not," is not intended to impose any requirement that the seller be a grower or manufacturer. Although normally the warranty will arise only where the seller is a merchant with the appropriate "skill or judgment," it can arise as to nonmerchants where this is justified by the particular circumstances.

5. The elimination of the "patent or other trade name" exception constitutes the major extension of the warranty of fitness which has been made by the cases and continued in this Chapter. Under the present section the existence of a patent or other trade name and the designation of the article by that name, or indeed in any other definite manner, is only one of the facts to be considered on the question of whether the buyer actually relied on the seller, but it is not of itself decisive of the issue. If the buyer himself is insisting on a particular brand he is not relying on the seller's skill and judgment and so no warranty results. But the mere fact that the article purchased has a particular patent or trade name is not sufficient to indicate nonreliance if the article has been recommended by the seller as adequate for the buyer's purposes.

6. The specific reference forward in the present section to the following section on exclusion or modification of warranties is to call attention to the possibility of eliminating the warranty in any given case. However it must be noted that under the following section the warranty of fitness for a particular purpose must be excluded or modified by a conspicuous writing.

Case Notes

Negligence and Strict Liability Action for Damages by Pesticide Not Preempted by FIFRA — McAlpine Overruled: Plaintiffs brought an action for damages allegedly suffered when a pesticide was applied at the building where they worked. The District Court granted summary judgment for the pesticide manufacturer on the basis that the claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) and McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474 (1997), because all of the theories of liability were based on inclusions in or omissions from the pesticide labels. In particular, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b) provides that a state may not impose or continue in effect any requirement for labeling or packaging in addition to or different from those required under the federal law. On appeal, the Supreme Court overruled McAlpine and instead applied Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 US 470 (1996), concluding that Congress, through FIFRA, intended only to preempt states from imposing positive law requirements in the form of regulations and laws and did not intend to extinguish damage remedies under state common law. The word "requirements" in section 136v(b) means enactments of positive law by legislative or administrative bodies, not state law damage actions. The case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000).

Damage to Crops by Herbicide — Extent of Preemption by FIFRA — Claims for Breach of Express and Implied Warranty Not Preempted — Negligence and Strict Liability Preempted — Remedy for Prevention of Discovery by Summary Judgment: McAlpine applied Weedone LV6, a herbicide manufactured by Rhone-Poulenc and distributed by Ben Taylor, to crops of barley and spring wheat. After several weeks of cool morning temperatures, McAlpine noticed damage to his crops, which experts from Montana State University (now Montana State University-Bozeman) and the Montana Department of Agriculture said was caused by cool temperatures after application of the herbicide. The McAlpines brought a civil action against Rhone-Poulenc, claiming damages from negligence, breach of express and implied warranty, and strict liability. The District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the basis that the plaintiffs' claims were based on deficiencies in the label on Weedone LV6 and that those claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA). Citing Wis. Pub. Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 US 597 (1991), and Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 US 504 (1992), the Supreme Court interpreted the FIFRA preemption statement, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b), to preempt only claims based upon negligence in labeling and not to preempt the appellants' claims based upon either express or implied warranty or strict liability. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the appellants must be given the opportunity to prove that Rhone-Poulenc and Ben Taylor breached their warranty by designing, manufacturing, and marketing a product that was inherently defective and that the same defendants are strictly liable for designing, manufacturing, and marketing an unreasonably dangerous product. In response to Rhone-Poulenc's argument that the McAlpines failed to offer any evidence to defeat summary judgment, the Supreme Court pointed out that because the District Court granted summary judgment, the McAlpines were prevented from conducting complete discovery and that until discovery was completed, it was premature for the Supreme Court to conclude that the McAlpines' evidence was insufficient. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474, 54 St. Rep. 1123 (1997), overruled in Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000), holding that state common-law negligence and strict liability claims based on or implicating pesticide labels are not preempted by FIFRA. Following the 1997 remand of McAlpine, the McAlpines settled with Ben Taylor, Inc., and proceeded to trial against Rhone-Poulenc on a theory of strict products liability, claiming that Weedone LV6 was a defective product because its propensity to damage or destroy crops in conjunction with cold weather was a danger outside the expectations of the ordinary consumer. Rhone-Poulenc acknowledged that the crop damage was caused by the phenoxy herbicide, but argued that the damage was not unreasonably dangerous and that liability exists only when a product is sufficiently dangerous. The trial court instructed the jury that it must find that the herbicide was in a "defective condition unreasonably dangerous", rather than merely in a defective condition, and the jury returned a verdict for Rhone-Poulenc. The McAlpines appealed. The Supreme Court previously held in McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910 (1987), that a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, but a plaintiff is not required to show that a product is defective and also that it is unreasonably dangerous, because establishing that a product is unreasonably dangerous is merely a means of proving that it is defective. Thus, the "defective condition unreasonably dangerous" language creates a vague and imprecise dual test and should not have been submitted to the jury because it was not plain, clear, and concise. The jury should have been required to find merely that the product was in a defective condition, so the case was again remanded. Further, the decision in Sleath, id., also applied on remand, so evidence of the product label was admissible in further proceedings. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 2000 MT 383, 304 M 31, 16 P3d 1054, 57 St. Rep. 1644 (2000).

Absence of Evidence of Defective Vehicle Window Design — Failure to Warn Not Defect — Jury Verdict Affirmed: As Wise drove a Ford Escort through a car wash, one of the side windows imploded when water was sprayed on it, injuring Wise, who sued Ford Motor Company for damages. The District Court properly applied the standards of product tort liability, including Ford's liability for failure to warn of a danger in its product as a separate theory of product liability. Alternate causes of the breakage were not necessarily eliminated, and the jury could have found that Wise did not meet his burden of proof by way of circumstantial evidence. The jury found in favor of Ford. Evidence supported the verdict that the vehicle was not defectively designed or defective for Ford's failure to warn that the side windows could break. Because the jury had substantial evidence upon which to base its decision that the vehicle did not have an unreasonably dangerous defective condition, judgment was affirmed. Wise v. Ford Motor Co., 284 M 336, 943 P2d 1310, 54 St. Rep. 909 (1997).

Failure to Prove Unreasonably Dangerous Defective Condition — Proper Test of Defective Product: The Supreme Court adopted a modified approach to the test of strict liability as defined by sec. 402A, Restatement (Second) of Torts, in holding that while a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, the lack of a dangerous aspect does not automatically preclude a finding that the product is defective. The proper test of a defective product is whether the product is unreasonably unsuitable for its intended or foreseeable purpose. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987).

Products Liability — Breach of Warranties — No Privity Requirement: Goods are not merchantable if, in their ordinary use, the goods cause damage to the property to which they are applied or harm to the person using them. Potato sprout suppressant that caused erratic growing results in potato crop was nonmerchantable because in its ordinary use it caused damage to property to which it was applied. There was also a breach of warranty of fitness because manufacturer's representative knew the use for which plaintiff purchased product. The privity requirement has been abolished in Montana, and a remote manufacturer may be liable for breach of implied warranties. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984).

Products Liability — Failure to Warn of Adverse Side Effects — Expert Witness Testimony Not Necessary to Establish Standard of Care: Plaintiffs sued manufacturer of chemical potato sprout suppressant when use of product caused erratic growing results in potato crop. Plaintiffs' expert witness made no declaration as to failure to warn or that product was defective. Expert witness gave results of field tests that revealed decided risk of adverse side effects against which manufacturer did not warn. Supreme Court held that expert witness testimony was not necessary to establish standard of care owed by manufacturer to plaintiffs and that defendant breached that standard because any layman could understand insufficiency of warning. Evidence was sufficient to establish duty to warn of adverse side effects and that manufacturer breached that duty. Streich v. Hilton-Davis, 214 M 44, 692 P2d 440, 41 St. Rep. 2310 (1984).

Reliance on Expertise — Implied Warranty of Fitness for Particular Purpose: Defendant relied on plaintiff's expertise to select an affordable fire alarm system that would provide reliable protection for the hotel's property and guests. Where the seller is aware that the buyer is relying upon the seller's judgment to select suitable goods, an implied warranty that the goods are fit for that particular purpose is created. The system installed was complicated, difficult to use, and frequently malfunctioned. Defendant advised plaintiff of the failure of the system after a fire in the snack bar, which was prior to the fire in a guest room that eventually resulted in this action. Plaintiff's own records showed repeated notifications of problems with the system. This was reasonable notice under 30-2-607(3). The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose was breached, and defendant was entitled to recover loss in value of the goods plus consequential and incidental damages. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Disclaimer Not Conspicuous: The disclaimer of warranties in an agreement is ineffective to exclude an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose since the disclaimer is in the same typeface as the rest of the contract and is not indented, underlined, or inked in a contrasting color to comply with the provision of the code requiring conspicuousness. Transcont. Refrigeration Co. v. Figgins, 179 M 12, 585 P2d 1301 (1978).

Sale of Sprinkler Irrigation Equipment: The evidence supported the court's findings that implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose did exist in a transaction for the sale of sprinkler irrigation equipment and that they were breached. Whitaker v. Farmhand, Inc., 173 M 345, 567 P2d 916 (1977).

Amendment of Complaint: Granting plaintiff's motion to amend complaint to include theory of implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose was error when motion was presented shortly before trial and plaintiff had relied upon theory of negligence through the entire course of pretrial proceedings. Warranty theory was foreign to the proper pleading of the case and required defendant to be prepared for an entirely different defense theory. McGuire v. Nelson, 162 M 37, 508 P2d 558 (1973).

Breach of Warranty — Cattle Breeding: Implied warranties of merchantability and fitness were not met by artificial insemination service which sold semen to cattle rancher who had experienced a 95% calf crop via natural service prior to using artificial insemination, where the rancher experienced a 70% calf crop with artificial insemination in the first year and only a 7% calf crop in the second year using semen from the same bull under almost identical conditions. The only logical inference was that the semen purchased for use in the second year was defective. Waddell v. Am. Breeders Serv. Inc., 161 M 221, 505 P2d 417, 61 ALR 3d 801 (1973).

30-2-316. Exclusion or modification of warranties.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None. See Sections 15 and 71, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. This section is designed principally to deal with those frequent clauses in sales contracts which seek to exclude "all warranties, express or implied." It seeks to protect a buyer from unexpected and unbargained language of disclaimer by denying effect to such language when inconsistent with language of express warranty and permitting the exclusion of implied warranties only by conspicuous language or other circumstances which protect the buyer from surprise.

2. The seller is protected under this Chapter against false allegations of oral warranties by its provisions on parol and extrinsic evidence and against unauthorized representations by the customary "lack of authority" clauses. This Chapter treats the limitation or avoidance of consequential damages as a matter of limiting remedies for breach, separate from the matter of creation of liability under a warranty. If no warranty exists, there is of course no problem of limiting remedies for breach of warranty. Under subsection (4) the question of limitation of remedy is governed by the sections referred to rather than by this section.

3. Disclaimer of the implied warranty of merchantability is permitted under subsection (2), but with the safeguard that such disclaimers must mention merchantability and in case of a writing must be conspicuous.

4. Unlike the implied warranty of merchantability, implied warranties of fitness for a particular purpose may be excluded by general language, but only if it is in writing and conspicuous.

5. Subsection (2) presupposes that the implied warranty in question exists unless excluded or modified. Whether or not language of disclaimer satisfies the requirements of this section, such language may be relevant under other sections to the question whether the warranty was ever in fact created. Thus, unless the provisions of this Chapter on parol and extrinsic evidence prevent, oral language of disclaimer may raise issues of fact as to whether reliance by the buyer occurred and whether the seller had "reason to know" under the section on implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.

6. The exceptions to the general rule set forth in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subsection (3) are common factual situations in which the circumstances surrounding the transaction are in themselves sufficient to call the buyer's attention to the fact that no implied warranties are made or that a certain implied warranty is being excluded.

7. Paragraph (a) of subsection (3) deals with general terms such as "as is," "as they stand," "with all faults," and the like. Such terms in ordinary commercial usage are understood to mean that the buyer takes the entire risk as to the quality of the goods involved. The terms covered by paragraph (a) are in fact merely a particularization of paragraph (c) which provides for exclusion or modification of implied warranties by usage of trade.

8. Under paragraph (b) of subsection (3) warranties may be excluded or modified by the circumstances where the buyer examines the goods or a sample or model of them before entering into the contract. "Examination" as used in this paragraph is not synonymous with inspection before acceptance or at any other time after the contract has been made. It goes rather to the nature of the responsibility assumed by the seller at the time of the making of the contract. Of course if the buyer discovers the defect and uses the goods anyway, or if he unreasonably fails to examine the goods before he uses them, resulting injuries may be found to result from his own action rather than proximately from a breach of warranty. See Sections 30-2-314 and 30-2-715 and comments thereto.

In order to bring the transaction within the scope of "refused to examine" in paragraph (b), it is not sufficient that the goods are available for inspection. There must in addition be a demand by the seller that the buyer examine the goods fully. The seller by the demand puts the buyer on notice that he is assuming the risk of defects which the examination ought to reveal. The language "refused to examine" in this paragraph is intended to make clear the necessity for such demand.

Application of the doctrine of "caveat emptor" in all cases where the buyer examines the goods regardless of statements made by the seller is, however, rejected by this Chapter. Thus, if the offer of examination is accompanied by words as to their merchantability or specific attributes and the buyer indicates clearly that he is relying on those words rather than on his examination, they give rise to an "express" warranty. In such cases the question is one of fact as to whether a warranty of merchantability has been expressly incorporated in the agreement. Disclaimer of such an express warranty is governed by subsection (1) of the present section.

The particular buyer's skill and the normal method of examining goods in the circumstances determine what defects are excluded by the examination. A failure to notice defects which are obvious cannot excuse the buyer. However, an examination under circumstances which do not permit chemical or other testing of the goods would not exclude defects which could be ascertained only by such testing. Nor can latent defects be excluded by a simple examination. A professional buyer examining a product in his field will be held to have assumed the risk as to all defects which a professional in the field ought to observe, while a nonprofessional buyer will be held to have assumed the risk only for such defects as a layman might be expected to observe.

9. The situation in which the buyer gives precise and complete specifications to the seller is not explicitly covered in this section, but this is a frequent circumstance by which the implied warranties may be excluded. The warranty of fitness for a particular purpose would not normally arise since in such a situation there is usually no reliance on the seller by the buyer. The warranty of merchantability in such a transaction, however, must be considered in connection with the next section on the cumulation and conflict of warranties. Under paragraph (c) of that section in case of such an inconsistency the implied warranty of merchantability is displaced by the express warranty that the goods will comply with the specifications. Thus, where the buyer gives detailed specifications as to the goods, neither of the implied warranties as to quality will normally apply to the transaction unless consistent with the specifications.

Case Notes

Warranty of Title Not Subject to Disclaimers as to Fitness and Merchantability: Defendant pawnshop operator who sold stolen property to plaintiff refused to give plaintiff a refund after the property was recovered by police. Defendant argued that he disclaimed any warranty of title to goods sold in his business by posting a sign alerting buyers that merchandise is sold "as is" and by writing the same notation on his sales slips. Warranty of title is not subject to the disclaimers found in this section pertaining to fitness and merchantability. Defendant's conduct does not meet the disclaimer of warranty of title found in 30-2-312 because there was no agreement between defendant and plaintiff regarding the title of the goods. Brokke v. Williams, 235 M 305, 766 P2d 1311, 46 St. Rep. 6 (1989).

Disclaimer on Back of Purchase Agreement Not Per Se Sufficient to Render Disclaimer Ineffective: Plaintiffs contended that a disclaimer of warranty of merchantability was invalid because there was no evidence they ever saw or were made aware of the disclaimer or were made aware of its significance. The Supreme Court noted that the disclaimer was not hidden in the fine print but was in larger, darker, bolder type and was capitalized and underlined. The fact that the disclaimer appeared on the back of the purchase agreement was not per se sufficient to render it ineffective because a person is presumed to have read contractual agreements he enters into. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987).

Warranties — When Created — When Disclaimed: Plaintiffs brought an action against a farm implement company for breach of implied warranties of merchantability and fitness. The court noted that the Montana U.C.C. allows a seller to disclaim these implied warranties by means of "conspicuous" language in a writing. It was found the disclaimers in this case were sufficiently conspicuous to be effective under 30-2-316. The plaintiffs claimed the advertising, promotional materials, and operator's manual created express warranties under 30-2-313. The court held the disclaimers did not destroy the express warranty of safety made in the operator's manual. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Effect of "As Is" Clause in Used Car Sales Agreement: When defendant failed to inspect a car for defects before sale to plaintiff and the defect that was the proximate cause of plaintiff's accident and subsequent injuries would have been discovered in a reasonable safety inspection, defendant should not be allowed to hide behind the cloak of a simple "as is" disclaimer. Public policy requires a used car dealer to inspect the cars he sells and to make sure they are in safe, working condition. Kopischke v. First Cont. Corp., 187 M 471, 610 P2d 668 (1980).

Disclaimer Not Conspicuous: The disclaimer of warranties in an agreement is ineffective to exclude an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose since the disclaimer is in the same typeface as the rest of the contract and is not indented, underlined, or inked in a contrasting color to comply with the provision of the code requiring conspicuousness. Transcont. Refrigeration Co. v. Figgins, 179 M 12, 585 P2d 1301 (1978).

Disclaimer — Ineffective: A disclaimer or limitation of warranty contained in a manufacturer's manual received by the purchasers subsequent to the sale does not limit recovery for implied or express warranties made prior to or at the time of the sale. Whitaker v. Farmhand, Inc., 173 M 345, 567 P2d 916 (1977), followed in Vandalia Ranch, Inc. v. Farmers Union Oil & Supply Co., 221 M 253, 718 P2d 647, 43 St. Rep. 790 (1986).

Used Farm Equipment — Implied Warranties: Implied warranties of merchantability and fitness for purpose were inapplicable to sale of used farm combine where buyer owned a large farm-ranch operation and had been in the farm business for a substantial length of time and knew or should have known that used machinery was customarily not warranted beyond a sharing of the cost of repairs and he acquiesced in sharing of repair expenses for more than a year. Spurgeon v. Jamieson Motors, 164 M 296, 521 P2d 924 (1974).

30-2-317. Cumulation and conflict of warranties express or implied.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: On cumulation of warranties see Sections 14, 15, and 16, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten into one section.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The present section rests on the basic policy of this Chapter that no warranty is created except by some conduct (either affirmative action or failure to disclose) on the part of the seller. Therefore, all warranties are made cumulative unless this construction of the contract is impossible or unreasonable.

This Chapter thus follows the general policy of the Uniform Sales Act except that in case of the sale of an article by its patent or trade name the elimination of the warranty of fitness depends solely on whether the buyer has relied on the seller's skill and judgment; the use of the patent or trade name is but one factor in making this determination.

2. The rules of this section are designed to aid in determining the intention of the parties as to which of inconsistent warranties which have arisen from the circumstances of their transaction shall prevail. These rules of intention are to be applied only where factors making for an equitable estoppel of the seller do not exist and where he has in perfect good faith made warranties which later turn out to be inconsistent. To the extent that the seller has led the buyer to believe that all of the warranties can be performed, he is estopped from setting up any essential inconsistency as a defense.

3. The rules in subsections (a), (b) and (c) are designed to ascertain the intention of the parties by reference to the factor which probably claimed the attention of the parties in the first instance. These rules are not absolute but may be changed by evidence showing that the conditions which existed at the time of contracting make the construction called for by the section inconsistent or unreasonable.

30-2-318. Third-party beneficiaries of warranties express or implied.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The last sentence of this section does not mean that a seller is precluded from excluding or disclaiming a warranty which might otherwise arise in connection with the sale provided such exclusion or modification is permitted by Section 30-2-316. Nor does that sentence preclude the seller from limiting the remedies of his own buyer and of any beneficiaries, in any manner provided in Sections 30-2-718 or 30-2-719. To the extent that the contract of sale contains provisions under which warranties are excluded or modified, or remedies for breach are limited, such provisions are equally operative against beneficiaries of warranties under this section. What this last sentence forbids is exclusion of liability by the seller to the persons to whom the warranties which he has made to his buyer would extend under this section.

2. The purpose of this section is to give certain beneficiaries the benefit of the same warranty which the buyer received in the contract of sale, thereby freeing any such beneficiaries from any technical rules as to "privity." It seeks to accomplish this purpose without any derogation of any right or remedy resting on negligence. It rests primarily upon the merchant-seller's warranty under this Chapter that the goods sold are merchantable and fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used rather than the warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Implicit in the section is that any beneficiary of a warranty may bring a direct action for breach of warranty against the seller whose warranty extends to him.

3. The Montana alternative expressly includes as beneficiaries within its provisions the family, household and guests of the purchaser. Beyond this, the section in this form is neutral and is not intended to enlarge or restrict the developing case law on whether the seller's warranties, given to his buyer who resells, extend to other persons in the distributive chain.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Alternative Sections: Montana has adopted alternative A for this section, from the three alternatives proposed to the states.

Case Notes

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplements the Montana U.C.C. which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Breach of Casket Warranty — Mental Suffering: A contract for the sale of a casket is one of those rare contracts which could give rise to a cause of action for liability based on mental suffering alone and the seller's warranty of casket seal can be recovered upon by members of the family of the buyer. Hirst v. Elgin Metal Casket Co., 438 F. Supp. 906 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

30-2-319. F.O.B. and F.A.S. terms.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section is intended to negate the uncommercial line of decision which treats an "F.O.B." term as "merely a price term." The distinctions taken in subsection (1) handle most of the issues which have on occasion led to the unfortunate judicial language just referred to. Other matters which have led to sound results being based on unhappy language in regard to F.O.B. clauses are dealt with in this Act by Section 30-2-311(2) (seller's option rearrangements relating to shipment) and Sections 30-2-614 and 30-2-615 (substituted performance and seller's excuse).

2. Subsection (1)(c) not only specifies the duties of a seller who engages to deliver "F.O.B. vessel," or the like, but ought to make clear that no agreement is soundly drawn when it looks to reshipment from San Francisco or New York, but speaks merely of "F.O.B." the place.

3. The buyer's obligations stated in subsection (1) (c) and subsection (3) are, as shown in the text, obligations of cooperation. The last sentence of subsection (3) expressly, though perhaps unnecessarily, authorizes the seller, pending instructions, to go ahead with such preparatory moves as shipment from the interior to the named point of delivery. The sentence presupposes the usual case in which instructions "fail"; a prior repudiation by the buyer, giving notice that breach was intended, would remove the reason for the sentence, and would normally bring into play, instead, the second sentence of Section 30-2-704, which duly calls for lessening damages.

4. The treatment of "F.O.B. vessel" in conjunction with F.A.S. fits, in regard to the need for payment against documents, with standard practice and caselaw; but "F.O.B. vessel" is a term which by its very language makes express the need for an "on board" document. In this respect, that term is stricter than the ordinary overseas "shipment" contract (C.I.F., etc., Section 30-2-320).

30-2-320. C.I.F. and C.&F. terms.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-320, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To make it clear that:

1. The C.I.F. contract is not a destination but a shipment contract with risk of subsequent loss or damage to the goods passing to the buyer upon shipment if the seller has properly performed all his obligations with respect to the goods. Delivery to the carrier is delivery to the buyer for purposes of risk and "title". Delivery of possession of the goods is accomplished by delivery of the bill of lading, and upon tender of the required documents the buyer must pay the agreed price without awaiting the arrival of the goods and if they have been lost or damaged after proper shipment he must seek his remedy against the carrier or insurer. The buyer has no right of inspection prior to payment or acceptance of the documents.

2. The seller's obligations remain the same even though the C.I.F. term is "used only in connection with the stated price and destination".

3. The insurance stipulated by the C.I.F. term is for the buyer's benefit, to protect him against the risk of loss or damage to the goods in transit. A clause in a C.I.F. contract "insurance — for the account of sellers" should be viewed in its ordinary mercantile meaning that the sellers must pay for the insurance and not that it is intended to run to the seller's benefit.

4. A bill of lading covering the entire transportation from the port of shipment is explicitly required but the provision on this point must be read in the light of its reason to assure the buyer of as full protection as the conditions of shipment reasonably permit, remembering always that this type of contract is designed to move the goods in the channels commercially available. To enable the buyer to deal with the goods while they are afloat the bill of lading must be one that covers only the quantity of goods called for by the contract. The buyer is not required to accept his part of the goods without a bill of lading because the latter covers a larger quantity, nor is he required to accept a bill of lading for the whole quantity under a stipulation to hold the excess for the owner. Although the buyer is not compelled to accept either goods or documents under such circumstances he may of course claim his rights in any goods which have been identified to his contract.

5. The seller is given the option of paying or providing for the payment of freight. He has no option to ship "freight collect" unless the agreement so provides. The rule of the common law that the buyer need not pay the freight if the goods do not arrive is preserved.

Unless the shipment has been sent "freight collect" the buyer is entitled to receive documentary evidence that he is not obligated to pay the freight; the seller is therefore required to obtain a receipt "showing that the freight has been paid or provided for." The usual notation on the bill of lading that the freight has been prepaid is a sufficient receipt, as at common law. The phrase "provided for" is intended to cover the frequent situation in which the carrier extends credit to a shipper for the freight on successive shipments and receives periodical payments of the accrued freight charges from him.

6. The requirement that unless otherwise agreed the seller must procure insurance "of a kind and on terms then current at the port for shipment in the usual amount, in the currency of the contract, sufficiently shown to cover the same goods covered by the bill of lading", applies to both marine and war risk insurance. As applied to marine insurance, it means such insurance as is usual or customary at the port for shipment with reference to the particular kind of goods involved, the character and equipment of the vessel, the route of the voyage, the port of destination and any other considerations that affect the risk. It is the substantial equivalent of the ordinary insurance in the particular trade and on the particular voyage and is subject to agreed specifications of type or extent of coverage. The language does not mean that the insurance must be adequate to cover all risks to which the goods may be subject in transit. There are some types of loss or damage that are not covered by the usual marine insurance and are excepted in bills of lading or in applicable statutes from the causes of loss or damage for which the carrier or the vessel is liable. Such risks must be borne by the buyer under this Chapter.

Insurance secured in compliance with a C.I.F. term must cover the entire transportation of the goods to the named destination.

7. An additional obligation is imposed upon the seller in requiring him to procure customary war risk insurance at the buyer's expense. This changes the common law on the point. The seller is not required to assume the risk of including in the C.I.F. price the cost of such insurance, since it often fluctuates rapidly, but is required to treat it simply as a necessary for the buyer's account. What war risk insurance is "current" or usual turns on the standard forms of policy or rider in common use.

8. The C.I.F. contract calls for insurance covering the value of the goods at the time and place of shipment and does not include any increase in market value during transit or any anticipated profit to the buyer on a sale by him.

The contract contemplates that before the goods arrive at their destination they may be sold again and again on C.I.F. terms and that the original policy of insurance and bill of lading will run with the interest in the goods by being transferred to each successive buyer. A buyer who becomes the seller in such an intermediate contract for sale does not thereby, if his sub-buyer knows the circumstances, undertake to insure the goods again at an increased price fixed in the new contract or to cover the increase in price by additional insurance, and his buyer may not reject the documents on the ground that the original policy does not cover such higher price. If such a sub-buyer desires additional insurance he must procure it for himself.

Where the seller exercises an option to ship "freight collect" and to credit the buyer with the freight against the C.I.F. price, the insurance need not cover the freight since the freight is not at the buyer's risk. On the other hand, where the seller prepays the freight upon shipping under a bill of lading requiring prepayment and providing that the freight shall be deemed earned and shall be retained by the carrier "ship and/or cargo lost or not lost," or using words of similar import, he must procure insurance that will cover the freight, because notwithstanding that the goods are lost in transit the buyer is bound to pay the freight as part of the C.I.F. price and will be unable to recover it back from the carrier.

9. Insurance "for the account of whom it may concern" is usual and sufficient. However, for a valid tender the policy of insurance must be one which can be disposed of together with the bill of lading and so must be "sufficiently shown to cover the same goods covered by the bill of lading". It must cover separately the quantity of goods called for by the buyer's contract and not merely insure his goods as part of a larger quantity in which others are interested, a case provided for in American mercantile practice by the use of negotiable certificates of insurance which are expressly authorized by this section. By usage these certificates are treated as the equivalent of separate policies and are good tender under C.I.F. contracts. The term "certificate of insurance", however, does not of itself include certificates or "cover notes" issued by the insurance broker and stating that the goods are covered by a policy. Their sufficiency as substitutes for policies will depend upon proof of an established usage or course of dealing. The present section rejects the English rule that not only brokers' certificates and "cover notes" but also certain forms of American insurance certificates are not the equivalent of policies and are not good tender under a C.I.F. contract.

The seller's failure to tender a proper insurance document is waived if the buyer refuses to make payment on other and untenable grounds at a time when proper insurance could have been obtained and tendered by the seller if timely objection had been made. Even a failure to insure on shipment may be cured by seasonable tender of a policy retroactive in effect; e.g., one insuring the goods "lost or not lost." The provisions of this Chapter on cure of improper tender and on waiver of buyer's objections by silence are applicable to insurance tenders under a C.I.F. term. Where there is no waiver by the buyer as described above, however, the fact that the goods arrive safely does not cure the seller's breach of his obligations to insure them and tender to the buyer a proper insurance document.

10. The seller's invoice of the goods shipped under a C.I.F. contract is regarded as a usual and necessary document upon which reliance may properly be placed. It is the document which evidences points of description, quality and the like which do not readily appear in other documents. This Chapter rejects those statements to the effect that the invoice is a usual but not a necessary document under a C.I.F. term.

11. The buyer needs all of the documents required under a C.I.F. contract, in due form and, if a tangible document of title, with necessary endorsements, so that before the goods arrive he may deal with them by negotiating the documents or may obtain prompt possession of the goods after their arrival. If the goods are lost or damaged in transit the documents are necessary to enable him promptly to assert his remedy against the carrier or insurer. The seller is therefore obligated to do what is mercantilely reasonable in the circumstances and should make every reasonable exertion to send forward the documents as soon as possible after the shipment. The requirement that the documents be forwarded with "commercial promptness" expresses a more urgent need for action than that suggested by the phrase "reasonable time".

12. Under a C.I.F. contract the buyer, as under the common law, must pay the price upon tender of the required documents without first inspecting the goods, but his payment in these circumstances does not constitute an acceptance of the goods nor does it impair his right of subsequent inspection or his options and remedies in the case of improper delivery. All remedies and rights for the seller's breach are reserved to him. The buyer must pay before inspection and assert his remedy against the seller afterward unless the nonconformity of the goods amounts to a real failure of consideration, since the purpose of choosing this form of contract is to give the seller protection against the buyer's unjustifiable rejection of the goods at a distant port of destination which would necessitate taking possession of the goods and suing the buyer there.

13. A valid C.I.F. contract may be made which requires part of the transportation to be made on land and part on the sea, as where the goods are to be brought by rail from an inland point to a seaport and thence transported by vessel to the named destination under a "through" or combination bill of lading issued by the railroad company. In such a case shipment by rail from the inland point within the contract period is a timely shipment notwithstanding that the loading of the goods on the vessel is delayed by causes beyond the seller's control.

14. Although subsection (2) stating the legal effects of the C.I.F. term is an "unless otherwise agreed" provision, the express language used in an agreement is frequently a precautionary, fuller statement of the normal C.I.F. terms and hence not intended as a departure or variation from them. Moreover, the dominant outlines of the C.I.F. term are so well understood commercially that any variation should, whenever reasonably possible, be read as falling within those dominant outlines rather than as destroying the whole meaning of a term which essentially indicates a contract for proper shipment rather than one for delivery at destination. Particularly careful consideration is necessary before a printed form or clause is construed to mean agreement otherwise and where a C.I.F. contract is prepared on a printed form designed for some other type of contract, the C.I.F. terms must prevail over printed clauses repugnant to them.

15. Under subsection (4) the fact that the seller knows at the time of the tender of the documents that the goods have been lost in transit does not affect his rights if he has performed his contractual obligations. Similarly, the seller cannot perform under a C.I.F. term by purchasing and tendering landed goods.

16. Under the C. & F. term, as under the C.I.F. term, title and risk of loss are intended to pass to the buyer on shipment. A stipulation in a C. & F. contract that the seller shall effect insurance on the goods and charge the buyer with the premium (in effect that he shall act as the buyer's agent for that purpose) is entirely in keeping with the pattern. On the other hand, it often happens that the buyer is in a more advantageous position than the seller to effect insurance on the goods or that he has in force an "open" or "floating" policy covering all shipments made by him or to him, in either of which events the C. & F. term is adequate without mention of insurance.

17. It is to be remembered that in a French contract the term "C.A.F." does not mean "Cost and Freight" but has exactly the same meaning as the term "C.I.F." since it is merely the French equivalent of that term. The "A" does not stand for "and" but for "assurance" which means insurance.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-321. C.I.F. or C.&F. — "net landed weights" — "payment on arrival" — warranty of condition on arrival.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

This section deals with two variations of the C.I.F. contract which have evolved in mercantile practice but are entirely consistent with the basic C.I.F. pattern. Subsections (1) and (2), which provide for a shift to the seller of the risk of quality and weight deterioration during shipment, are designed to conform the law to the best mercantile practice and usage without changing the legal consequences of the C.I.F. or C. & F. term as to the passing of marine risks to the buyer at the point of shipment. Subsection (3) provides that where under the contract documents are to be presented for payment after arrival of the goods, this amounts merely to a postponement of the payment under the C.I.F. contract and is not to be confused with the "no arrival, no sale" contract. If the goods are lost, delivery of the documents and payment against them are due when the goods should have arrived. The clause for payment on or after arrival is not to be construed as such a condition precedent to payment that if the goods are lost in transit the buyer need never pay and the seller must bear the loss.

30-2-322. Delivery "ex-ship".

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The delivery term, "ex-ship", as between seller and buyer, is the reverse of the f.a.s. term covered.

2. Delivery need not be made from any particular vessel under a clause calling for delivery "ex-ship", even though a vessel on which shipment is to be made originally is named in the contract, unless the agreement by appropriate language, restricts the clause to delivery from a named vessel.

3. The appropriate place and manner of unloading at the port of destination depend upon the nature of the goods and the facilities and usages of the port.

4. A contract fixing a price "ex-ship" with payment "cash against documents" calls only for such documents as are appropriate to the contract. Tender of a delivery order and of a receipt for the freight after the arrival of the carrying vessel is adequate. The seller is not required to tender a bill of lading as a document of title nor is he required to insure the goods for the buyer's benefit, as the goods are not at the buyer's risk during the voyage.

30-2-323. Form of bill of lading required in overseas shipment — "overseas".

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-323, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) follows the "American" rule that a regular bill of lading indicating delivery of the goods at the dock for shipment is sufficient, except under a term "F.O.B. vessel." See Section 30-2-319 and comment thereto.

2. Subsection (2) deals with the problem of bills of lading covering deep water shipments, issued not as a single bill of lading but in a set of parts, each part referring to the other parts and the entire set constituting in commercial practice and at law a single bill of lading. Commercial practice in international commerce is to accept and pay against presentation of the first part of a set if the part is sent from overseas even though the contract of the buyer requires presentation of a full set of bills of lading provided adequate indemnity for the missing parts is forthcoming. In accord with the amendment to Section 7-304 [30-7-304], bills of lading in a set are limited to tangible bills.

This subsection codifies that practice as between buyer and seller. Chapter 5 (Section 30-5-113, now repealed) authorizes banks presenting drafts under letters of credit to give indemnities against the missing parts, and this subsection means that the buyer must accept and act on such indemnities if he in good faith deems them adequate. But neither this subsection nor Chapter 5 decides whether a bank which has issued a letter of credit is similarly bound. The issuing bank's obligation under a letter of credit is independent and depends on its own terms. See Chapter 5.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (2) near beginning inserted "tangible". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-2-324. "No arrival, no sale" term.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The "no arrival, no sale" term in a "destination" overseas contract leaves risk of loss on the seller but gives him an exemption from liability for nondelivery. Both the nature of the case and the duty of good faith require that the seller must not interfere with the arrival of the goods in any way. If the circumstances impose upon him the responsibility for making or arranging the shipment, he must have a shipment made despite the exemption clause. Further, the shipment made must be a conforming one, for the exemption under a "no arrival, no sale" term applies only to the hazards of transportation and the goods must be proper in all other respects.

The reason of this section is that where the seller is reselling the goods bought by him as shipped by another and this fact is known to the buyer, so that the seller is not under any obligation to make the shipment himself, the seller is entitled under the "no arrival, no sale" clause to exemption from payment of damages for non-delivery if the goods do not arrive or if the goods which actually arrive are non-conforming. This does not extend to sellers who arrange shipment by their own agents, in which case the clause is limited to casualty due to marine hazards. But sellers who make known that they are contracting only with respect to what will be delivered to them by parties over whom they assume no control are entitled to the full quantum of the exemption.

2. The provisions of this Chapter on identification must be read together with the present section in order to bring the exemption into application. Until there is some designation of the goods in a particular shipment or on a particular ship as being those to which the contract refers there can be no application of an exemption for their non-arrival.

3. The seller's duty to tender the agreed or declared goods if they do arrive is not impaired because of their delay in arrival or by their arrival after transshipment.

4. The phrase "to arrive" is often employed in the same sense as "no arrival, no sale" and may then be given the same effect. But a "to arrive" term, added to a C.I.F. or C. & F. contract, does not have the full meaning given by this section to "no arrival, no sale". Such a "to arrive" term is usually intended to operate only to the extent that the risks are not covered by the agreed insurance and the loss or casualty is due to such uncovered hazards. In some instances the "to arrive" term may be regarded as a time of payment term, or, in the case of the reselling seller discussed in point 1 above, as negating responsibility for conformity of the goods, if they arrive, to any description which was based on his good faith belief of the quality. Whether this is the intention of the parties is a question of fact based on all the circumstances surrounding the resale and in case of ambiguity the rules of Sections 30-2-316 and 30-2-317 apply to preclude dishonor.

5. Paragraph (b) applies where goods arrive impaired by damage or partial loss during transportation and makes the policy of this Chapter on casualty to identified goods applicable to such a situation. For the term cannot be regarded as intending to give the seller an unforeseen profit through casualty; it is intended only to protect him from loss due to causes beyond his control.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-325. "Letter of credit" term — "confirmed credit".

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To express the established commercial and banking understanding as to the meaning and effects of terms calling for "letters of credit" or "confirmed credit":

1. Subsection (2) follows the general policy of this Chapter and Chapter 3 (Section 30-3-802 [now repealed]) on conditional payment, under which payment by check or other short-term instrument is not ordinarily final as between the parties if the recipient duly presents the instrument and honor is refused. Thus the furnishing of a letter of credit does not substitute the financing agency's obligation for the buyer's, but the seller must first give the buyer reasonable notice of his intention to demand direct payment from him.

2. Subsection (3) requires that the credit be irrevocable and be a prime credit as determined by the standing of the issuer. It is not necessary, unless otherwise agreed, that the credit be a negotiation credit; the seller can finance himself by an assignment of the proceeds under Section 30-5-116(2) [substance now in 30-5-132].

3. The definition of "confirmed credit" is drawn on the supposition that the credit is issued by a bank which is not doing direct business in the seller's financial market; there is no intention to require the obligation of two banks both local to the seller.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-326. Sale on approval and sale or return — rights of creditors.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 19(3), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten in this and the succeeding section.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. Both a "sale on approval" and a "sale or return" should be distinguished from other types of transactions with which they frequently have been confused. A "sale on approval," sometimes also called a sale "on trial" or "on satisfaction," deals with a contract under which the seller undertakes a risk in order to satisfy its prospective buyer with the appearance or performance of the goods that are sold. The goods are delivered to the proposed purchaser but they remain the property of the seller until the buyer accepts them. The price has already been agreed. The buyer's willingness to receive and test the goods is the consideration for the seller's engagement to deliver and sell. A "sale or return," on the other hand, typically is a sale to a merchant whose unwillingness to buy is overcome by the seller's engagement to take back the goods (or any commercial unit of goods) in lieu of payment if they fail to be resold. A sale or return is a present sale of goods which may be undone at the buyer's option. Accordingly, subsection (2) provides that goods delivered on approval are not subject to the prospective buyer's creditors until acceptance, and goods delivered in a sale or return are subject to the buyer's creditors while in the buyer's possession.

These two transactions are so strongly delineated in practice and in general understanding that every presumption runs against a delivery to a consumer being a "sale or return" and against a delivery to a merchant for resale being a "sale on approval."

2. The right to return goods for failure to conform to the contract does not make the transaction a "sale on approval" or "sale or return" and has nothing to do with this section or Section 30-2-327. This section is not concerned with remedies for breach of contract. It deals instead with a power given by the contract to turn back the goods even though they are wholly as warranted. This section nevertheless presupposes that a contract for sale is contemplated by the parties although that contract may be of the peculiar character that this section addresses (i.e., a sale on approval or a sale or return).

If a buyer's obligation as a buyer is conditioned not on his personal approval but on the article's passing a described objective test, the risk of loss by casualty pending the test is properly the seller's and proper return is at his expense. On the point of "satisfaction" as meaning "reasonable satisfaction" when an industrial machine is involved, this Article takes no position.

3. Subsection (3) resolves a conflict in the pre-UCC case law by recognizing that an "or return" provision is so definitely at odds with any ordinary contract for sale of goods that if a written agreement is involved the "or return" term must be contained in a written memorandum. The "or return" aspect of a sales contract must be treated as a separate contract under the Statute of Frauds section and as contradicting the sale insofar as questions of parol or extrinsic evidence are concerned.

4. Certain true consignment transactions were dealt with in former Sections 30-2-326(3) and 30-9-114 [now repealed]. These provisions have been deleted and have been replaced by new provisions in Chapter 9A. See, e.g., Sections 30-9A-109(1)(d); 30-9A-103(2); 30-9A-319.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 at beginning of (2) deleted "Except as provided in subsection (3)"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) Where goods are delivered to a person for sale and such person maintains a place of business at which he deals in goods of the kind involved, under a name other than the name of the person making delivery, then with respect to claims of creditors of the person conducting the business the goods are deemed to be on sale or return. The provisions of this subsection are applicable even though an agreement purports to reserve title to the person making delivery until payment or resale or uses such words as "on consignment" or "on memorandum". However, this subsection is not applicable if the person making delivery:

(a) complies with an applicable law providing for a consignor's interest or the like to be evidenced by a sign; or

(b) establishes that the person conducting the business is generally known by his creditors to be substantially engaged in selling the goods of others; or

(c) complies with the filing provisions of the Chapter on Secured Transactions (Chapter 9)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Case Notes

Consignment — Not Sale or Return: Bobbie opened a business selling gift items, gourmet foods, and kitchen items. Bobbie began having financial problems and started taking in antiques and other collectibles on a consignment basis. Bobbie eventually went bankrupt. The bankruptcy trustee appealed the decision of the bankruptcy court which held that the property held on consignment was not part of the bankruptcy estate. On appeal, the federal District Court affirmed the decision, stating that the antiques were on consignment rather than a "sale or return" and that 30-2-326 does not apply because consignee did not maintain "a place of business at which she dealt in goods of the kind involved". 30-2-327. Special incidents of sale on approval and sale or return.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 19(3), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rewritten in preceding and this section.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. In the case of a sale on approval:

If all of the goods involved conform to the contract, the buyer's acceptance of part of the goods constitutes acceptance of the whole. Acceptance of part falls outside the normal intent of the parties in the "on approval" situation and the policy of this Chapter allowing partial acceptance of a defective delivery has no application here. A case where a buyer takes home two dresses to select one commonly involves two distinct contracts; if not, it is covered by the words "unless otherwise agreed".

2. In the case of a sale or return, the return of any unsold unit merely because it is unsold is the normal intent of the "sale or return" provision, and therefore the right to return for this reason alone is independent of any other action under the contract which would turn on wholly different considerations. On the other hand, where the return of goods is for breach, including return of items resold by the buyer and returned by the ultimate purchasers because of defects, the return procedure is governed not by the present section but by the provisions on the effects and revocation of acceptance.

3. In the case of a sale on approval the risk rests on the seller until acceptance of the goods by the buyer, while in a sale or return the risk remains throughout on the buyer.

4. Notice of election to return given by the buyer in a sale on approval is sufficient to relieve him of any further liability. Actual return by the buyer to the seller is required in the case of a sale or return contract. What constitutes due "giving" of notice, as required in "on approval" sales, is governed by the provisions on good faith and notice. "Seasonable" is used here as defined in Section 30-1-204. Nevertheless, the provisions of both this Chapter and of the contract on this point must be read with commercial reason and with full attention to good faith.

Part 4
Title, Creditors, and Good Faith Purchasers

30-2-401. Passing of title — reservation for security — limited application of this section.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-401, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See generally, Sections 17, 18, 19 and 20, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes: To make it clear that:

1. This Chapter deals with the issues between seller and buyer in terms of step by step performance or non-performance under the contract for sale and not in terms of whether or not "title" to the goods has passed. That the rules of this section in no way alter the rights of either the buyer, seller or third parties declared elsewhere in the Chapter is made clear by the preamble of this section. This section, however, in no way intends to indicate which line of interpretation should be followed in cases where the applicability of "public" regulation depends upon a "sale" or upon location of "title" without further definition. The basic policy of this Chapter that known purpose and reason should govern interpretation cannot extend beyond the scope of its own provisions. It is therefore necessary to state what a "sale" is and when title passes under this Chapter in case the courts deem any public regulation to incorporate the defined term of the "private" law.

2. "Future" goods cannot be the subject of a present sale. Before title can pass the goods must be identified in the manner set forth in Section 30-2-501. The parties, however, have full liberty to arrange by specific terms for the passing of title to goods which are existing.

3. The "special property" of the buyer in goods identified to the contract is excluded from the definition of "security interest"; its incidents are defined in provisions of this Chapter such as those on the rights of the seller's creditors, on good faith purchase, on the buyer's right to goods on the seller's insolvency, and on the buyer's right to specific performance or replevin.

4. The factual situations in subsections (2) and (3) upon which passage of title turn actually base the test upon the time when the seller has finally committed himself in regard to specific goods. Thus in a "shipment" contract he commits himself by the act of making the shipment. If shipment is not contemplated subsection (3) turns on the seller's final commitment, i.e. the delivery of documents or the making of the contract. As to delivery of an electronic document of title, see definition of delivery in Article 1, Section 1-201 [30-1-201]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 2] does not state a rule as to the place of title passage as to goods covered by an electronic document of title.

[This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Case Notes

Principal's Impairment or Suspension of Rights of Guarantor — Exoneration of Guarantor Proper: Ace Leasing, Inc. (Ace), funded a lease to O'Neill for $45,000 for business equipment. Boustead was guarantor of the lease agreement. If O'Neill failed to perform, the lease provided that Ace could proceed directly against Boustead. O'Neill failed to make timely payments. Ace canceled the lease. O'Neill and Ace then discussed the matter, and O'Neill explained that the late payments were the result of the late arrival of the ordered equipment. Ace agreed to accept several late payments, but Boustead was not part of the negotiations. O'Neill again missed several payments, and Ace requested that Boustead pay off the lease. Boustead refused to pay on grounds that the cancellation letter and acceptance of late payments without Boustead's knowledge, as well as the method of purchasing the equipment, constituted a material change in the agreement and in Boustead's obligations as guarantor. The District Court agreed and exonerated Boustead as guarantor under 28-11-211. The court also held that Boustead's risk was increased because Ace did not own the equipment, so the transaction between Ace and O'Neill constituted a loan rather than a lease. Ace appealed the findings regarding ownership and alteration of the agreement. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under this section, the title of goods passes to the buyer at the time that and place at which the seller completes performance with reference to physical delivery of the goods, unless the agreement provides otherwise. Here, neither Ace nor O'Neill conformed to the purchase provision of the agreement. Because Ace failed to obtain title, Ace could not assume the role of lessor and, while retaining title and ownership, transfer to O'Neill merely the right of possession and use of the equipment, so the transaction effectively became a loan agreement between the parties with O'Neill holding title to the equipment according to the default provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. Further, Ace's actions in accepting late payments after canceling the agreement and in failing to comply with the terms of the lease requiring Ace to purchase the equipment and retain ownership to secure its interest were a material alteration in the agreement as affecting Boustead. Ace impaired or suspended its rights and remedies against O'Neill and, without Boustead's consent, impaired or suspended Boustead's rights as well, which was sufficient to exonerate Boustead as guarantor under 28-11-211. Ace Leasing, Inc. v. Boustead, 2002 MT 213, 311 M 285, 55 P3d 371 (2002).

Determination of Vehicle Ownership — Installment Sales Contract Not Indicative of Ownership for Insurance Purposes: Jordet, an adult, jointly purchased a vehicle for the exclusive use of his minor sister-in-law, who made the downpayment, repaid registration and license fees, made the only installment payment, purchased separate insurance, possessed the only keys, and maintained sole use and control of the vehicle. The District Court decided that the term "owned vehicle" in Jordet's automobile policy included the jointly owned vehicle and that Jordet's signature on the installment sales contract conclusively placed the vehicle under his policy. The Supreme Court reversed, noting that the purchase of property and the insurance of property are distinct transactions and that Jordet's signature on the sales contract did not establish ownership for insurance purposes. Implicit in ownership is the ability to control how, when, where, and by whom the property will be used. Since Jordet never exercised any of the indicia of ownership that would be compatible with his insuring the vehicle, it was not an "owned vehicle" under the terms of his policy. Truck Ins. Exch. v. Nelson, 228 M 233, 743 P2d 572, 44 St. Rep. 1482 (1987).

Transfer of Car Ownership for Purposes of Garage Liability Insurance Policy: In action by insurance company to determine rights and obligations under garage liability insurance policy issued to dealer in relation to vehicle sold by dealership that later was involved in accident without purchaser acquiring registration or certificate of title, the court held that change in ownership occurred under a purchase contract although the certificate of title had not transferred. The presumption in 61-3-105 (now repealed) can be overcome by the facts in a particular case. Section 61-3-201 has no effect on ownership transfer for insurance purposes. Prospector Chevrolet, Inc., delivered the vehicle to Clive Lapp. Under the U.C.C., the sale was complete and Lapp became the owner. Lapp had the right to use or dispose of the automobile as he wished. Prospector had relinquished all its legal rights to the vehicle even though it still had the statutory duties relating to transfer of certificate of ownership. Legal title passed to Lapp on date of delivery. Safeco Ins. Co. v. Lapp, 215 M 196, 695 P2d 1310, 42 St. Rep. 289 (1985).

30-2-402. Rights of seller's creditors against sold goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (2)—Section 26, Uniform Sales Act; Subsections (1) and (3)—none.

Changes: Rephrased.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter: To avoid confusion on ordinary issues between current sellers and buyers and issues in the field of preference and hindrance by making it clear that:

1. Local law on questions of hindrance of creditors by the seller's retention of possession of the goods are outside the scope of this Chapter, but retention of possession in the current course of trade is legitimate. Transactions which fall within the law's policy against improper preferences are reserved from the protection of this Chapter.

2. The retention of possession of the goods by a merchant seller for a commercially reasonable time after a sale or identification in current course is exempted from attack as fraudulent. Similarly, the provisions of subsection (3) have no application to identification or delivery made in the current course of trade, as measured against general commercial understanding of what a "current" transaction is.

30-2-403. Power to transfer — good faith purchase of goods — "entrusting".

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-403, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 20(4), 23, 24, 25, Uniform Sales Act; Section 9, especially 9(2), Uniform Trust Receipts Act; Section 9, Uniform Conditional Sales Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To gather together a series of prior uniform statutory provisions and the case-law thereunder and to state a unified and simplified policy on good faith purchase of goods.

1. The basic policy of our law allowing transfer of such title as the transferor has is generally continued and expanded under subsection (1). In this respect the provisions of the section are applicable to a person taking by any form of "purchase" as defined by this Act. Moreover the policy of this Act expressly providing for the application of supplementary general principles of law to sales transactions wherever appropriate joins with the present section to continue unimpaired all rights acquired under the law of agency or of apparent agency or ownership or other estoppel, whether based on statutory provisions or on case law principles. The section also leaves unimpaired the powers given to selling factors under the earlier Factors Acts. In addition subsection (1) provides specifically for the protection of the good faith purchaser for value in a number of specific situations which have been troublesome under prior law.

On the other hand, the contract of purchase is of course limited by its own terms as in a case of pledge for a limited amount or of sale of a fractional interest in goods.

2. The many particular situations in which a buyer in ordinary course of business from a dealer has been protected against reservation of property or other hidden interest are gathered by subsections (2)-(4) into a single principle protecting persons who buy in ordinary course out of inventory. Consignors have no reason to complain, nor have lenders who hold a security interest in the inventory, since the very purpose of goods in inventory is to be turned into cash by sale.

The principle is extended in subsection (3) to fit with the abolition of the old law of "cash sale" by subsection (1)(c). It is also freed from any technicalities depending on the extended law of larceny; such extension of the concept of theft to include trick, particular types of fraud, and the like is for the purpose of helping conviction of the offender; it has no proper application to the long-standing policy of civil protection of buyers from persons guilty of such trick or fraud. Finally, the policy is extended, in the interest of simplicity and sense, to any entrusting by a bailor; this is in consonance with the explicit provisions of Section 30-7-205 on the powers of a warehouse who is also in the business of buying and selling fungible goods of the kind he stores. As to entrusting by a secured party, subsection (2) is limited by the more specific provisions of Section 30-9A-320(1), which deny protection to a person buying farm products from a person engaged in farming operations.

3. The definition of "buyer in ordinary course of business" (Section 30-1-201) is effective here and preserves the essence of the healthy limitations engrafted by the case-law on the older statutes. The older loose concept of good faith and wide definition of value combined to create apparent good faith purchasers in many situations in which the result outraged common sense; the court's solution was to protect the original title especially by use of "cash sale" or of over-technical construction of the enabling clauses of the statutes. But such rulings then turned into limitations on the proper protection of buyers in the ordinary market. Section 30-1-201(9) cuts down the category of buyer in ordinary course in such fashion as to take care of the results of the cases, but with no price either in confusion or in injustice to proper dealings in the normal market.

4. Except as provided in subsection (1), the rights of purchasers other than buyers in ordinary course are left to the Chapters on Secured Transactions, Documents of Title, and Bulk Sales.

Part 5
Performance

30-2-501. Insurable interest in goods — manner of identification of goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 17 and 19, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. The present section deals with the manner of identifying goods to the contract so that an insurable interest in the buyer and the rights set forth in the next section will accrue. Generally speaking, identification may be made in any manner "explicitly agreed to" by the parties. The rules of paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) apply only in the absence of such "explicit agreement".

2. In the ordinary case identification of particular existing goods as goods to which the contract refers is unambiguous and may occur in one of many ways. It is possible, however, for the identification to be tentative or contingent. In view of the limited effect given to identification by this Chapter, the general policy is to resolve all doubts in favor of identification.

3. The provision of this section as to "explicit agreement" clarifies the present confusion in the law of sales which has arisen from the fact that under prior uniform legislation all rules of presumption with reference to the passing of title or to appropriation (which in turn depended upon identification) were regarded as subject to the contrary intention of the parties or of the party appropriating. Such uncertainty is reduced to a minimum under this section by requiring "explicit agreement" of the parties before the rules of paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) are displaced — as they would be by a term giving the buyer power to select the goods. An "explicit" agreement, however, need not necessarily be found in the terms used in the particular transaction. Thus, where a usage of the trade has previously been made explicit by reduction to a standard set of "rules and regulations" currently incorporated by reference into the contracts of the parties, a relevant provision of those "rules and regulations" is "explicit" within the meaning of this section.

4. In view of the limited function of identification there is no requirement in this section that the goods be in deliverable state or that all of the seller's duties with respect to the processing of the goods be completed in order that identification occur. For example, despite identification the risk of loss remains on the seller under the risk of loss provisions until completion of his duties as to the goods and all of his remedies remain dependent upon his not defaulting under the contract.

5. Undivided shares in an identified fungible bulk, such as grain in an elevator or oil in a storage tank, can be sold. The mere making of the contract with reference to an undivided share in an identified fungible bulk is enough under subsection (a) to effect an identification if there is no explicit agreement otherwise. The seller's duty, however, to segregate and deliver according to the contract is not affected by such an identification but is controlled by other provisions of this Chapter.

6. Identification of crops under paragraph (c) is made upon planting only if they are to be harvested within the year or within the next normal harvest season. The phrase "next normal harvest season" fairly includes nursery stock raised for normally quick "harvest," but plainly excludes a "timber" crop to which the concept of a harvest "season" is inapplicable.

Paragraph (c) is also applicable to a crop of wool or the young of animals to be born within twelve months after contracting. The product of a lumbering, mining or fishing operation, though seasonal, is not within the concept of "growing". Identification under a contract for all or part of the output of such an operation can be effected early in the operation.

30-2-502. Buyer's right to goods on seller's insolvency.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Compare Sections 17, 18 and 19, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. This section gives an additional right to the buyer as a result of identification of the goods to the contract in the manner provided in Section 2-501. The buyer is given a right to recover the goods, conditioned upon making and keeping good a tender of any unpaid portion of the price, in two limited circumstances. First, the buyer may recover goods bought for personal, family, or household purposes if the seller repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods. Second, in any case, the buyer may recover the goods if the seller becomes insolvent within 10 days after the seller receives the first installment on their price. The buyer's right to recover the goods under this section is an exception to the usual rule, under which the disappointed buyer must resort to an action to recover damages.

2. The question of whether the buyer also acquires a security interest in identified goods and has rights to the goods when insolvency takes place after the ten-day period provided in this section depends upon compliance with the provisions of the Chapter on Secured Transactions (Chapter 9A).

3. Under subsection (2), the buyer's right to recover consumer goods under subsection (1)(a) vests upon acquisition of a special property, which occurs upon identification of the goods to the contract. See Section 30-2-501. Inasmuch as a secured party normally acquires no greater rights in its collateral that its debtor had or had power to convey, see Section 30-2-403(1) (first sentence), a buyer who acquires a right to recover under this section will take free of a security interest created by the seller if it attaches to the goods after the goods have been identified to the contract. The buyer will take free, even if the buyer does not buy in ordinary course and even if the security interest is perfected. Of course, to the extent that the buyer pays the price after the security interest attaches, the payments will constitute proceeds of the security interest.

4. Subsection (3) is included to preclude the possibility of unjust enrichment, which would exist if the buyer were permitted to recover goods even though they were greatly superior in quality or quantity to that called for by the contract for sale.

30-2-503. Manner of seller's tender of delivery.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-503, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 11, 19, 20, 43(3) and (4), 46 and 51, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: The general policy of the above sections is continued and supplemented but subsection (3) changes the rule of prior section 19(5) as to what constitutes a "destination" contract and subsection (4) incorporates a minor correction as to tender of delivery of goods in the possession of a bailee.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The major general rules governing the manner of proper or due tender of delivery are gathered in this section. The term "tender" is used in this Chapter in two different senses. In one sense it refers to "due tender" which contemplates an offer coupled with a present ability to fulfill all the conditions resting on the tendering party and must be followed by actual performance if the other party shows himself ready to proceed. Unless the context unmistakably indicates otherwise this is the meaning of "tender" in this Chapter and the occasional addition of the word "due" is only for clarity and emphasis. At other times it is used to refer to an offer of goods or documents under a contract as if in fulfillment of its conditions even though there is a defect when measured against the contract obligation. Used in either sense, however, "tender" connotes such performance by the tendering party as puts the other party in default if he fails to proceed in some manner. These concepts of tender would apply to tender of either tangible or electronic documents of title.

2. The seller's general duty to tender and deliver is laid down in Section 30-2-301 and more particularly in Section 30-2-507. The seller's right to a receipt if he demands one and receipts are customary is governed by Section 30-1-205. Subsection (1) of the present section proceeds to set forth two primary requirements of tender: first, that the seller "put and hold conforming goods at the buyer's disposition" and, second, that he "give the buyer any notice reasonably necessary to enable him to take delivery."

In cases in which payment is due and demanded upon delivery the "buyer's disposition" is qualified by the seller's right to retain control of the goods until payment by the provision of this Chapter on delivery on condition. However, where the seller is demanding payment on delivery he must first allow the buyer to inspect the goods in order to avoid impairing his tender unless the contract for sale is on C.I.F., C.O.D., cash against documents or similar terms negating the privilege of inspection before payment.

In the case of contracts involving documents the seller can "put and hold conforming goods at the buyer's disposition" under subsection (1) by tendering documents which give the buyer complete control of the goods under the provisions of Chapter 7 on due negotiation.

3. Under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) usage of the trade and the circumstances of the particular case determine what is a reasonable hour for tender and what constitutes a reasonable period of holding the goods available.

4. The buyer must furnish reasonable facilities for the receipt of the goods tendered by the seller under subsection (1), paragraph (b). This obligation of the buyer is no part of the seller's tender.

5. For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3) there is omitted from this Chapter the rule under prior uniform legislation that a term requiring the seller to pay the freight or cost of transportation to the buyer is equivalent to an agreement by the seller to deliver to the buyer or at an agreed destination. This omission is with the specific intention of negating the rule, for under this Chapter the "shipment" contract is regarded as the normal one and the "destination" contract as the variant type. The seller is not obligated to deliver at a named destination and bear the concurrent risk of loss until arrival, unless he has specifically agreed so to deliver or the commercial understanding of the terms used by the parties contemplates such delivery.

6. Paragraph (a) of subsection (4) continues the rule of the prior uniform legislation as to acknowledgment by the bailee. Paragraph (b) of subsection (4) adopts the rule that between the buyer and the seller the risk of loss remains on the seller during a period reasonable for securing acknowledgment of the transfer from the bailee, while as against all other parties the buyer's rights are fixed as of the time the bailee receives notice of the transfer.

7. Under subsection (5) documents are never "required" except where there is an express contract term or it is plainly implicit in the peculiar circumstances of the case or in a usage of trade. Documents may, of course, be "authorized" although not required, but such cases are not within the scope of this subsection. When documents are required, there are three main requirements of this subsection: (1) "All": each required document is essential to a proper tender; (2) "Such": the documents must be the ones actually required by the contract in terms of source and substance; (3) "Correct form": All documents must be in correct form. These requirements apply to both tangible and electronic documents of title. When tender is made through customary banking channels, a draft may accompany or be associated with a document of title. The language has been broadened to allow for drafts to be associated with an electronic document of title. Compare Section 2-104(2) [30-2-104(2)] definition of financing agency.

When a prescribed document cannot be procured, a question of fact arises under the provision of this Chapter on substituted performance as to whether the agreed manner of delivery is actually commercially impracticable and whether the substitute is commercially reasonable.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (4)(b) near beginning substituted "record directing" for "written direction to" and inserted "except as otherwise provided in chapter 9A"; in (5)(a) at end deleted "except as provided in this chapter with respect to bills of lading in a set (subsection (2) of 30-2-323)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

[This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-2-504. Shipment by seller.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 46, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To continue the general policy of the prior uniform statutory provision while incorporating certain modifications with respect to the requirement that the contract with the carrier be made expressly on behalf of the buyer and as to the necessity of giving notice of the shipment to the buyer, so that:

1. The section is limited to "shipment" contracts as contrasted with "destination" contracts or contracts for delivery at the place where the goods are located. The general principles embodied in this section cover the special cases of F.O.B. point of shipment contracts and C.I.F. and C. & F. contracts. Under the preceding section on manner of tender of delivery, due tender by the seller requires that he comply with the requirements of this section in appropriate cases.

2. The contract to be made with the carrier under paragraph (a) must conform to all express terms of the agreement, subject to any substitution necessary because of failure of agreed facilities as provided in the later provision on substituted performance. However, under the policies of this Chapter on good faith and commercial standards and on buyer's rights on improper delivery, the requirements of explicit provisions must be read in terms of their commercial and not their literal meaning. This policy is made express with respect to bills of lading in a set in the provision of this Chapter on form of bills of lading required in overseas shipment.

3. In the absence of agreement, the provision of this Chapter on options and cooperation respecting performance gives the seller the choice of any reasonable carrier, routing and other arrangements. Whether or not the shipment is at the buyer's expense the seller must see to any arrangements, reasonable in the circumstances, such as refrigeration, watering of live stock, protection against cold, the sending along of any necessary help, selection of specialized cars and the like for paragraph (a) is intended to cover all necessary arrangements whether made by contract with the carrier or otherwise. There is, however, a proper relaxation of such requirements if the buyer is himself in a position to make the appropriate arrangements and the seller gives him reasonable notice of the need to do so. It is an improper contract under paragraph (a) for the seller to agree with the carrier to a limited valuation below the true value and thus cut off the buyer's opportunity to recover from the carrier in the event of loss, when the risk of shipment is placed on the buyer by his contract with the seller.

4. Both the language of paragraph (b) and the nature of the situation it concerns indicate that the requirement that the seller must obtain and deliver promptly to the buyer in due form any document necessary to enable him to obtain possession of the goods is intended to cumulate with the other duties of the seller such as those covered in paragraph (a).

In this connection, in the case of pool car shipments a delivery order furnished by the seller on the pool car consignee, or on the carrier for delivery out of a larger quantity, satisfies the requirements of paragraph (b) unless the contract requires some other form of document.

5. This Chapter, unlike the prior uniform statutory provision, makes it the seller's duty to notify the buyer of shipment in all cases. The consequences of his failure to do so, however, are limited in that the buyer may reject on this ground only where material delay or loss ensues.

A standard and acceptable manner of notification in open credit shipments is the sending of an invoice and in the case of documentary contracts is the prompt forwarding of the documents as under paragraph (b) of this section. It is also usual to send on a straight bill of lading but this is not necessary to the required notification. However, should such a document prove necessary or convenient to the buyer, as in the case of loss and claim against the carrier, good faith would require the seller to send it on request.

Frequently the agreement expressly requires prompt notification as by wire or cable. Such a term may be of the essence and the final clause of paragraph (c) does not prevent the parties from making this a particular ground for rejection. To have this vital and irreparable effect upon the seller's duties, such a term should be part of the "dickered" terms written in any "form," or should otherwise be called seasonably and sharply to the seller's attention.

6. Generally, under the final sentence of the section, rejection by the buyer is justified only when the seller's dereliction as to any of the requirements of this section in fact is followed by material delay or damage. It rests on the seller, so far as concerns matters not within the peculiar knowledge of the buyer, to establish that his error has not been followed by events which justify rejection.

30-2-505. Seller's shipment under reservation.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-505, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 20(2), (3), (4), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Completely rephrased, the "powers" of the parties in cases of reservation being emphasized primarily rather than the "rightfulness" of reservation.

Purposes of Changes: To continue in general the policy of the prior uniform statutory provision with certain modifications of emphasis and language, so that:

1. The security interest reserved to the seller under subsection (1) is restricted to securing payment or performance by the buyer and the seller is strictly limited in his disposition and control of the goods as against the buyer and third parties. Under this Chapter, the provision as to the passing of interest expressly applies "despite any reservation of security title" and also provides that the "rights, obligations and remedies" of the parties are not altered by the incidence of title generally. The security interest, therefore, must be regarded as a means given to the seller to enforce his rights against the buyer which is unaffected by and in turn does not affect the location of title generally. The rules set forth in subsection (1) are not to be altered by any apparent "contrary intent" of the parties as to passing of title, since the rights and remedies of the parties to the contract of sale, as defined in this Chapter, rest on the contract and its performance or breach and not on stereotyped presumptions as to the location of title.

This Chapter does not attempt to regulate local procedure in regard to the effective maintenance of the seller's security interest when the action is in replevin by the buyer against the carrier.

2. Every shipment of identified goods under a negotiable bill of lading reserves a security interest in the seller under subsection (1) paragraph (a).

It is frequently convenient for the seller to make the bill of lading to the order of a nominee such as his agent at destination, the financing agency to which he expects to negotiate the document or the bank issuing a credit to him. In many instances, also, the buyer is made the order party. This Chapter does not deal directly with the question as to whether a bill of lading made out by the seller to the order of a nominee gives the carrier notice of any rights which the nominee may have so as to limit its freedom or obligation to honor the bill of lading in the hands of the seller as the original shipper if the expected negotiation fails. This is dealt with in the Chapter on Documents of Title (Chapter 7).

3. A non-negotiable bill of lading taken to a party other than the buyer under subsection (1) paragraph (b) reserves possession of the goods as security in the seller but if he seeks to withhold the goods improperly the buyer can tender payment and recover them.

4. In the case of a shipment by non-negotiable bill of lading taken to a buyer, the seller, under subsection (1) retains no security interest or possession as against the buyer and by the shipment he de facto loses control as against the carrier except where he rightfully and effectively stops delivery in transit. In cases in which the contract gives the seller the right to payment against delivery, the seller, by making an immediate demand for payment, can show that his delivery is conditional, but this does not prevent the buyer's power to transfer full title to a sub-buyer in ordinary course or other purchaser under Section 30-2-403.

5. Under subsection (2) an improper reservation by the seller which would constitute a breach in no way impairs such of the buyer's rights as result from identification of the goods. The security title reserved by the seller under subsection (1) does not protect his retaining possession or control of the document or the goods for the purpose of exacting more than is due him under the contract.

30-2-506. Rights of financing agency.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-506, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. "Financing agency" is broadly defined in this Chapter to cover every normal instance in which a party aids or intervenes in the financing of a sales transaction. The term as used in subsection (1) is not in any sense intended as a limitation and covers any other appropriate situation which may arise outside the scope of the definition.

2. "Paying" as used in subsection (1) is typified by the letter of credit, or "authority to pay" situation in which a banker, by arrangement with the buyer or other consignee, pays on his behalf a draft for the price of the goods. It is immaterial whether the draft is formally drawn on the party paying or his principal, whether it is a sight draft paid in cash or a time draft "paid" in the first instance by acceptance, or whether the payment is viewed as absolute or conditional. All of these cases constitute "payment" under this subsection. Similarly, "purchasing for value" is used to indicate the whole area of financing by the seller's banker, and the principle of subsection (1) is applicable without any niceties of distinction between "purchase," "discount," "advance against collection" or the like. But it is important to notice that the only right to have the draft honored that is acquired is that against the buyer; if any right against any one else is claimed it will have to be under some separate obligation of that other person. A letter of credit does not necessarily protect purchasers of drafts. See Chapter 5. And for the relations of the parties to documentary drafts see Part 5 of Chapter 4.

3. Subsection (1) is made applicable to payments or advances against a draft which "relates to" a shipment of goods and this has been chosen as a term of maximum breadth. In particular the term is intended to cover the case of a draft against an invoice or against a delivery order. Further, it is unnecessary that there be an explicit assignment of the invoice attached to the draft to bring the transaction within the reason of this subsection.

4. After shipment, "the rights of the shipper in the goods" are merely security rights and are subject to the buyer's right to force delivery upon tender of the price. The rights acquired by the financing agency are similarly limited and, moreover, if the agency fails to procure any outstanding negotiable document of title, it may find its exercise of these rights hampered or even defeated by the seller's disposition of the document to a third party. This section does not attempt to create any new rights in the financing agency against the carrier which would force the latter to honor a stop order from the agency, a stranger to the shipment, or any new rights against a holder to whom a document of title has been duly negotiated under Chapter 7.

5. The deletion of the language "on its face" from subsection (2) is designed to accommodate electronic documents of title without changing the requirement of regularity of the document.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (2) at end deleted "on its face". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

30-2-507. Effect of seller's tender — delivery on condition.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 11, 41, 42 and 69, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) continues the policies of the prior uniform statutory provisions with respect to tender and delivery by the seller. Under this Chapter the same rules in these matters are applied to present sales and to contracts for sale. But the provisions of this subsection must be read within the framework of the other sections of this Chapter which bear upon the question of delivery and payment.

2. The "unless otherwise agreed" provision of subsection (1) is directed primarily to cases in which payment in advance has been promised or a letter of credit term has been included. Payment "according to the contract" contemplates immediate payment, payment at the end of an agreed credit term, payment by a time acceptance or the like. Under this Act, "contract" means the total obligation in law which results from the parties' agreement including the effect of this Chapter. In this context, therefore, there must be considered the effect in law of such provisions as those on means and manner of payment and on failure of agreed means and manner of payment.

3. Subsection (2) deals with the effect of a conditional delivery by the seller and in such a situation makes the buyer's "right as against the seller" conditional upon payment. These words are used as words of limitation to conform with the policy set forth in the bona fide purchase sections of this Chapter. Should the seller after making such a conditional delivery fail to follow up his rights, the condition is waived. The provision of this Chapter for a ten day limit within which the seller may reclaim goods delivered on credit to an insolvent buyer is also applicable here.

30-2-508. Cure by seller of improper tender or delivery — replacement.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) permits a seller who has made a non-conforming tender in any case to make a conforming delivery within the contract time upon seasonable notification to the buyer. It applies even where the seller has taken back the non-conforming goods and refunded the purchase price. He may still make a good tender within the contract period. The closer, however, it is to the contract date, the greater is the necessity for extreme promptness on the seller's part in notifying of his intention to cure, if such notification is to be "seasonable" under this subsection.

The rule of this subsection, moreover, is qualified by its underlying reasons. Thus if, after contracting for June delivery, a buyer later makes known to the seller his need for shipment early in the month and the seller ships accordingly, the "contract time" has been cut down by the supervening modification and the time for cure of tender must be referred to this modified time term.

2. Subsection (2) seeks to avoid injustice to the seller by reason of a surprise rejection by the buyer. However, the seller is not protected unless he had "reasonable grounds to believe" that the tender would be acceptable. Such reasonable grounds can lie in prior course of dealing, course of performance or usage of trade as well as in the particular circumstances surrounding the making of the contract. The seller is charged with commercial knowledge of any factors in a particular sales situation which require him to comply strictly with his obligations under the contract as, for example, strict conformity of documents in an overseas shipment or the sale of precision parts of chemicals for use in manufacture. Further, if the buyer gives notice either implicitly, as by a prior course of dealing involving rigorous inspections, or expressly, as by the deliberate inclusion of a "no replacement" clause in the contract, the seller is to be held to rigid compliance. If the clause appears in a "form" contract evidence that it is out of line with trade usage or the prior course of dealing and was not called to the seller's attention may be sufficient to show that the seller had reasonable grounds to believe that the tender would be acceptable.

3. The words "a further reasonable time to substitute a conforming tender" are intended as words of limitation to protect the buyer. What is a "reasonable time" depends upon the attending circumstances. Compare Section 30-2-511 on the comparable case of a seller's surprise demand for legal tender.

4. Existing trade usages permitting variations without rejection but with price allowance enter into the agreement itself as contractual limitations of remedy and are not covered by this section.

Case Notes

Right to Rescind: Defendant/buyer did not lose his right to rescind by failing to give plaintiff/seller adequate opportunity to "cure". 30-2-509. Risk of loss in the absence of breach.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-509, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 22, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, subsection (3) of this section modifying prior law.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. The underlying theory of these sections on risk of loss is the adoption of the contractual approach rather than an arbitrary shifting of the risk with the "property" in the goods. The scope of the present section, therefore, is limited strictly to those cases where there has been no breach by the seller. Where for any reason his delivery or tender fails to conform to the contract, the present section does not apply and the situation is governed by the provisions on effect of breach on risk of loss.

2. The provisions of subsection (1) apply where the contract "requires or authorizes" shipment of the goods. This language is intended to be construed parallel to comparable language in the section on shipment by seller. In order that the goods be "duly delivered to the carrier" under paragraph (a) a contract must be entered into with the carrier which will satisfy the requirements of the section on shipment by the seller and the delivery must be made under circumstances which will enable the seller to take any further steps necessary to a due tender. The underlying reason of this subsection does not require that the shipment be made after contracting, but where, for example, the seller buys the goods afloat and later diverts the shipment to the buyer, he must identify the goods to the contract before the risk of loss can pass. To transfer the risk it is enough that a proper shipment and a proper identification come to apply to the same goods although, aside from special agreement, the risk will not pass retroactively to the time of shipment in such a case.

3. Whether the contract involves delivery at the seller's place of business or at the situs of the goods, a merchant seller cannot transfer risk of loss and it remains upon him until actual receipt by the buyer, even though full payment has been made and the buyer has been notified that the goods are at his disposal. Protection is afforded him, in the event of breach by the buyer, under the next section.

The underlying theory of this rule is that a merchant who is to make physical delivery at his own place continues meanwhile to control the goods and can be expected to insure his interest in them. The buyer, on the other hand, has no control of the goods and it is extremely unlikely that he will carry insurance on goods not yet in his possession.

4. Where the agreement provides for delivery of the goods as between the buyer and seller without removal from the physical possession of a bailee, the provisions on manner of tender of delivery apply on the point of transfer of risk. Due delivery of a negotiable document of title covering the goods or acknowledgment by the bailee that he holds for the buyer completes the "delivery" and passes the risk. See definition of delivery in Article 1, Section 1-201 [30-1-201] and the definition of control in Article 7, Section 7-106 [30-7-107].

5. The provisions of this section are made subject by subsection (4) to the "contrary agreement" of the parties. This language is intended as the equivalent of the phrase "unless otherwise agreed" used more frequently throughout this Act. "Contrary" is in no way used as a word of limitation and the buyer and seller are left free to readjust their rights and risks as declared by this section in any manner agreeable to them. Contrary agreement can also be found in the circumstances of the case, a trade usage or practice, or a course of dealing or performance.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (2)(a) at beginning substituted "on the buyer's receipt of possession or control" for "on his receipt"; in (2)(c) after "receipt of" inserted "possession or control of" and substituted "direction to deliver in a record" for "written direction to deliver"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

Case Notes

Delivery Versus Acceptance: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that Montana Seeds, Inc., failed to establish its claim for goods "sold and delivered" by not proving actual delivery. The determining factor was whether defendant "accepted" the goods. Here there were two shipments. Only the second shipment's acceptance was challenged by defendant based on his contention that it was misdelivered. However, defendant bore the risk of loss because he did not specify a particular destination. His cause of action for misdelivery was against the carrier. Mont. Seeds, Inc. v. Holliday, 178 M 119, 582 P2d 1223 (1978).

30-2-510. Effect of breach on risk of loss.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To make clear that:

1. Under subsection (1) the seller by his individual action cannot shift the risk of loss to the buyer unless his action conforms with all the conditions resting on him under the contract.

2. The "cure" of defective tenders contemplated by subsection (1) applies only to those situations in which the seller makes changes in goods already tendered, such as repair, partial substitution, sorting out from an improper mixture and the like since "cure" by repossession and new tender has no effect on the risk of loss of the goods originally tendered. The seller's privilege of cure does not shift the risk, however, until the cure is completed.

Where defective documents are involved a cure of the defect by the seller or a waiver of the defects by the buyer will operate to shift the risk under this section. However, if the goods have been destroyed prior to the cure or the buyer is unaware of their destruction at the time he waives the defect in the documents, the risk of the loss must still be borne by the seller, for the risk shifts only at the time of cure, waiver of documentary defects or acceptance of the goods.

3. In cases where there has been a breach of the contract, if the one in control of the goods is the aggrieved party, whatever loss or damage may prove to be uncovered by his insurance falls upon the contract breaker under subsections (2) and (3) rather than upon him. The word "effective" as applied to insurance coverage in those subsections is used to meet the case of supervening insolvency of the insurer. The "deficiency" referred to in the text means such deficiency in the insurance coverage as exists without subrogation. This section merely distributes the risk of loss as stated and is not intended to be disturbed by any subrogation of an insurer.

30-2-511. Tender of payment by buyer — payment by check.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 42, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten by this section and Section 30-2-507.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The requirement of payment against delivery in subsection (1) is applicable to non-commercial sales generally and to ordinary sales at retail although it has no application to the great body of commercial contracts which carry credit terms. Subsection (1) applies also to documentary contracts in general and to contracts which look to shipment by the seller but contain no term on time and manner of payment, in which situations the payment may, in proper case, be demanded against delivery of appropriate documents.

In the case of specific transactions such as C.O.D. sales or agreements providing for payment against documents, the provisions of this subsection must be considered in conjunction with the special sections of the Chapter dealing with such terms. The provision that tender of payment is a condition to the seller's duty to tender and complete "any delivery" integrates this section with the language and policy of the section on delivery in several lots which call for separate payment. Finally, attention should be directed to the provision on right to adequate assurance of performance which recognizes, even before the time for tender, an obligation on the buyer not to impair the seller's expectation of receiving payment in due course.

2. Unless there is agreement otherwise the concurrence of the conditions as to tender of payment and tender of delivery requires their performance at a single place or time. This Chapter determines that place and time by determining in various other sections the place and time for tender of delivery under various circumstances and in particular types of transactions. The sections dealing with time and place of delivery together with the section on right to inspection of goods answer the subsidiary question as to when payment may be demanded before inspection by the buyer.

3. The essence of the principle involved in subsection (2) is avoidance of commercial surprise at the time of performance. The section on substituted performance covers the peculiar case in which legal tender is not available to the commercial community.

4. Subsection (3) is concerned with the rights and obligations as between the parties to a sales transaction when payment is made by check. This Chapter recognizes that the taking of a seemingly solvent party's check is commercially normal and proper and, if due diligence is exercised in collection, is not to be penalized in any way. The conditional character of the payment under this section refers only to the effect of the transaction "as between the parties" thereto and does not purport to cut into the law of "absolute" and "conditional" payment as applied to such other problems as the discharge of sureties or the responsibilities of a drawee bank which is at the same time an agent for collection.

The phrase "by check" includes not only the buyer's own but any check which does not effect a discharge under Chapter 3 (Section 30-3-310). Similarly the reason of this subsection should apply and the same result should be reached where the buyer "pays" by sight draft on a commercial firm which is financing him.

5. Under subsection (3) payment by check is defeated if it is not honored upon due presentment. This corresponds to the provisions of Chapter on Commercial Paper. (Section 30-3-310). But if the seller procures certification of the check instead of cashing it, the buyer is discharged. (Section 30-3-411 [now repealed]).

6. Where the instrument offered by the buyer is not a payment but a credit instrument such as a note or a check postdated by even one day, the seller's acceptance of the instrument insofar as third parties are concerned, amounts to a delivery on credit and his remedies are set forth in the section on buyer's insolvency. As between the buyer and the seller, however, the matter turns on the present subsection and the section on conditional delivery and subsequent dishonor of the instrument gives the seller rights on it as well as for breach of the contract for sale.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (3) substituted reference to "30-3-310" for "30-3-802"; and made minor change in style.

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

30-2-512. Payment by buyer before inspection.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None, but see Sections 47 and 49, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) of the present section recognizes that the essence of a contract providing for payment before inspection is the intention of the parties to shift to the buyer the risks which would usually rest upon the seller. The basic nature of the transaction is thus preserved and the buyer is in most cases required to pay first and litigate as to any defects later.

2. "Inspection" under this section is an inspection in a manner reasonable for detecting defects in goods whose surface appearance is satisfactory.

3. Clause (a) of this subsection states an exception to the general rule based on common sense and normal commercial practice. The apparent non-conformity referred to is one which is evident in the mere process of taking delivery.

4. Clause (b) is concerned with contracts for payment against documents and incorporates the general clarification and modification of the case law contained in the section on excuse of a financing agency. Section 30-5-114 [now repealed].

5. Subsection (2) makes explicit the general policy of the Uniform Sales Act that the payment required before inspection in no way impairs the buyer's remedies or rights in the event of a default by the seller. The remedies preserved to the buyer are all of his remedies, which include as a matter of reason the remedy for total non-delivery after payment in advance.

The provision on performance or acceptance under reservation of rights does not apply to the situations contemplated here in which payment is made in due course under the contract and the buyer need not pay "under protest" or the like in order to preserve his rights as to defects discovered upon inspection.

6. This section applies to cases in which the contract requires payment before inspection either by the express agreement of the parties or by reason of the effect in law of that contract. The present section must therefore be considered in conjunction with the provision on right to inspection of goods which sets forth the instances in which the buyer is not entitled to inspection before payment.

30-2-513. Buyer's right to inspection of goods.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-513, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 47(2), (3), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, Subsections (2) and (3) being new.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter: To correspond in substance with the prior uniform statutory provision and to incorporate in addition some of the results of the better case law so that:

1. The buyer is entitled to inspect goods as provided in subsection (1) unless it has been otherwise agreed by the parties. The phrase "unless otherwise agreed" is intended principally to cover such situations as those outlined in subsections (3) and (4) and those in which the agreement of the parties negates inspection before tender of delivery. However, no agreement by the parties can displace the entire right of inspection except where the contract is simply for the sale of "this thing." Even in a sale of boxed goods "as is" inspection is a right of the buyer, since if the boxes prove to contain some other merchandise altogether the price can be recovered back; nor do the limitations of the provision on effect of acceptance apply in such a case.

2. The buyer's right of inspection is available to him upon tender, delivery or appropriation of the goods with notice to him. Since inspection is available to him on tender, where payment is due against delivery he may, unless otherwise agreed, make his inspection before payment of the price. It is also available to him after receipt of the goods and so may be postponed after receipt for a reasonable time. Failure to inspect before payment does not impair the right to inspect after receipt of the goods unless the case falls within subsection (4) on agreed and exclusive inspection provisions. The right to inspect goods which have been appropriated with notice to the buyer holds whether or not the sale was by sample.

3. The buyer may exercise his right of inspection at any reasonable time or place and in any reasonable manner. It is not necessary that he select the most appropriate time, place or manner to inspect or that his selection be the customary one in the trade or locality. Any reasonable time, place or manner is available to him and the reasonableness will be determined by trade usages, past practices between the parties and the other circumstances of the case.

The last sentence of subsection (1) makes it clear that the place of arrival of shipped goods is a reasonable place for their inspection.

4. Expenses of an inspection made to satisfy the buyer of the seller's performance must be assumed by the buyer in the first instance. Since the rule provides merely for an allocation of expense there is no policy to prevent the parties from providing otherwise in the agreement. Where the buyer would normally bear the expenses of the inspection but the goods are rightly rejected because of what the inspection reveals, demonstrable and reasonable costs of the inspection are part of his incidental damage caused by the seller's breach.

5. In the case of payment against documents, subsection (3) requires payment before inspection, since shipping documents against which payment is to be made will commonly be tendered while the goods are still in transit. This Chapter recognizes no exception in any peculiar case in which the goods happen to arrive before the documents are tendered. However, where by the agreement payment is to await the arrival of the goods, inspection before payment becomes proper since the goods are then "available for inspection."

Where by the agreement the documents are to be tendered after arrival of the goods, the buyer is entitled to inspect before payment since the goods are then "available for inspection". Proof of usage is not necessary to establish this right, but if inspection before payment is disputed the contrary must be established by usage or by an explicit contract term to that effect.

For the same reason, that the goods are available for inspection, a term calling for payment against storage documents or a delivery order does not normally bar the buyer's right to inspection before payment under subsection (3)(b). This result is reinforced by the buyer's right under subsection (1) to inspect goods which have been appropriated with notice to him.

6. Under subsection (4) an agreed place or method of inspection is generally held to be intended as exclusive. However, where compliance with such an agreed inspection term becomes impossible, the question is basically one of intention. If the parties clearly intend that the method of inspection named is to be a necessary condition without which the entire deal is to fail, the contract is at an end if that method becomes impossible. On the other hand, if the parties merely seek to indicate a convenient and reliable method but do not intend to give up the deal in the event of its failure, any reasonable method of inspection may be substituted under this Chapter.

Since the purpose of an agreed place of inspection is only to make sure at that point whether or not the goods will be thrown back, the "exclusive" feature of the named place is satisfied under this Chapter if the buyer's failure to inspect there is held to be an acceptance with the knowledge of such defects as inspection would have revealed within the section on waiver of buyer's objections by failure to particularize. Revocation of the acceptance is limited to the situations stated in the section pertaining to that subject. The reasonable time within which to give notice of defects within the section on notice of breach begins to run from the point of the "acceptance."

7. Clauses on time of inspection are commonly clauses which limit the time in which the buyer must inspect and give notice of defects. Such clauses are therefore governed by the section of this Chapter which requires that such a time limitation must be reasonable.

8. Inspection under this Chapter is not to be regarded as a "condition precedent to the passing of title" so that risk until inspection remains on the seller. Under subsection (4) such an approach cannot be sustained. Issues between the buyer and seller are settled in this Chapter almost wholly by special provisions and not by the technical determination of the locus of the title. Thus "inspection as a condition to the passing of title" becomes a concept almost without meaning. However, in peculiar circumstances inspection may still have some of the consequences hitherto sought and obtained under that concept.

9. "Inspection" under this section has to do with the buyer's check-up on whether the seller's performance is in accordance with a contract previously made and is not to be confused with the "examination" of the goods or of a sample or model of them at the time of contracting which may affect the warranties involved in the contract.

30-2-514. When documents deliverable on acceptance — when on payment.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 41, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To make the provision one of general application so that:

1. It covers any document against which a draft may be drawn, whatever may be the form of the document, and applies to interpret the action of a seller or consignor insofar as it may affect the rights and duties of any buyer, consignee or financing agency concerned with the paper. Supplementary or corresponding provisions are found in Sections 30-4-503 and 30-5-112 [now repealed].

2. An "arrival" draft is a sight draft within the purpose of this section.

30-2-515. Preserving evidence of goods in dispute.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. To meet certain serious problems which arise when there is a dispute as to the quality of the goods and thereby perhaps to aid the parties in reaching a settlement, and to further the use of devices which will promote certainty as to the condition of the goods, or at least aid in preserving evidence of their condition.

2. Under paragraph (a), to afford either party an opportunity for preserving evidence, whether or not agreement has been reached, and thereby to reduce uncertainty in any litigation and, in turn perhaps, to promote agreement.

Paragraph (a) does not conflict with the provisions on the seller's right to resell rejected goods or the buyer's similar right. Apparent conflict between these provisions which will be suggested in certain circumstances is to be resolved by requiring prompt action by the parties. Nor does paragraph (a) impair the effect of a term for payment before inspection. Short of such defects as amount to fraud or substantial failure of consideration, non-conformity is neither an excuse nor a defense to an action for non-acceptance of documents. Normally, therefore, until the buyer has made payment, inspected and rejected the goods, there is no occasion or use for the rights under paragraph (a).

3. Under paragraph (b), to provide for third party inspection upon the agreement of the parties, thereby opening the door to amicable adjustments based upon the findings of such third parties.

The use of the phrase "conformity or condition" makes it clear that the parties' agreement may range from a complete settlement of all aspects of the dispute by a third party to the use of a third party merely to determine and record the condition of the goods so that they can be resold or used to reduce the stake in controversy. "Conformity", at one end of the scale of possible issues, includes the whole question of interpretation of the agreement and its legal effect, the state of the goods in regard to quality and condition, whether any defects are due to factors which operate at the risk of the buyer, and the degree of non-conformity where that may be material. "Condition", at the other end of the scale, includes nothing but the degree of damage or deterioration which the goods show. Paragraph (b) is intended to reach any point in the gamut which the parties may agree upon.

The principle of the section on reservation of rights reinforces this paragraph in simplifying such adjustments as the parties wish to make in partial settlement while reserving their rights as to any further points. Paragraph (b) also suggests the use of arbitration, where desired, of any points left open, but nothing in this section is intended to repeal or amend any statute governing arbitration. Where any question arises as to the extent of the parties' agreement under the paragraph, the presumption should be that it was meant to extend only to the relation between the contract description and the goods as delivered, since that is what a craftsman in the trade would normally be expected to report upon. Finally, a written and authenticated report of inspection or tests by a third party, whether or not sampling has been practicable, is entitled to be admitted as evidence under this Act, for it is a third party document.

Breach, Repudiation, and Excuse

30-2-601. Buyer's rights on improper delivery.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: No one general equivalent provision but numerous provisions, dealing with situations of non-conformity where buyer may accept or reject, including Sections 11, 44 and 69(1), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Partial acceptance in good faith is recognized and the buyer's remedies on the contract for breach of warranty and the like, where the buyer has returned the goods after transfer of title, are no longer barred.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. A buyer accepting a non-conforming tender is not penalized by the loss of any remedy otherwise open to him. This policy extends to cover and regulate the acceptance of a part of any lot improperly tendered in any case where the price can reasonably be apportioned. Partial acceptance is permitted whether the part of the goods accepted conforms or not. The only limitation on partial acceptance is that good faith and commercial reasonableness must be used to avoid undue impairment of the value of the remaining portion of the goods. This is the reason for the insistence on the "commercial unit" in paragraph (c). In this respect, the test is not only what unit has been the basis of contract, but whether the partial acceptance produces so materially adverse an effect on the remainder as to constitute bad faith.

2. Acceptance made with the knowledge of the other party is final. An original refusal to accept may be withdrawn by a later acceptance if the seller has indicated that he is holding the tender open. However, if the buyer attempts to accept, either in whole or in part, after his original rejection has caused the seller to arrange for other disposition of the goods, the buyer must answer for any ensuing damage since the next section provides that any exercise of ownership after rejection is wrongful as against the seller. Further, he is liable even though the seller may choose to treat his action as acceptance rather than conversion, since the damage flows from the misleading notice. Such arrangements for resale or other disposition of the goods by the seller must be viewed as within the normal contemplation of a buyer who has given notice of rejection. However, the buyer's attempts in good faith to dispose of defective goods where the seller has failed to give instructions within a reasonable time are not to be regarded as an acceptance.

Case Notes

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

Timely Rejection of Defective Goods: Vendees who leased a printing press from the vendor stopped making payments, claiming they believed the press to be defective. When the vendor sued to make the vendees liable for a lump-sum payment, summary judgment was entered for the vendor. On appeal, the judgment was set aside and the agreement between the parties was determined to be a sales contract subject to the statutory U.C.C. provisions regulating sales. The cause was remanded for trial on the question of whether the vendees timely and properly rejected the press, under 30-2-601 and 30-2-602, when they stopped monthly payments after two payments. Lessees contend they notified the lessor immediately and more than once that the press was defective; the lessor has neither admitted nor denied these contentions, which are questions of fact for the trial court to determine upon remand. (See 1991 enactment of chapter 2A.) Beneficial Commercial Corp. v. Cottrell, 212 M 493, 688 P2d 1254, 41 St. Rep. 1888 (1984).

Sufficient Rejection of Nonconforming Goods: Plaintiff sold defendants an irrigation system and pump. Plaintiff substituted a different type of pump for the one ordered by defendants. Plaintiff and his supplier installed the system, and defendants paid for everything but the pump and its installation. Plaintiff and his supplier supervised the digging of the sump for the installation of the pump but did not test it. The pump became clogged before any water ever came out of it. The supplier cleaned the pump and had an agent reinstall it. Defendants tried unsuccessfully to get the system to work and called plaintiff to complain several times. Defendants finally told plaintiff to come and get the pump and refused to pay for it. They later purchased a different pump which operated the system properly. Plaintiff sued for the price of the pump and installation costs. The District Court entered judgment for the defendants. Plaintiff contends that the District Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law were insufficient in failing to adequately address the provisions of the U.C.C. governing rejection of nonconforming goods. The Supreme Court found that although the findings and conclusions could have been better, there was substantial evidence to support the conclusions that: (1) the goods were nonconforming; (2) there was a failure to cure the defects of the pump; and (3) the use of the pump was in fact a prolonged effort to determine why the pump failed to work and to cure the defect, and as such was not an act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. There was no acceptance by the defendants, no use inconsistent with the ownership of the plaintiff, and no delay in offering the return of the nonconforming pump significant enough to justify a conclusion that defendants had accepted the pump. Steinmetz v. Robertus, 196 M 311, 637 P2d 31, 38 St. Rep. 2067 (1981).

30-2-602. Manner and effect of rightful rejection.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 50, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. A tender or delivery of goods made pursuant to a contract of sale, even though wholly non-conforming, requires affirmative action by the buyer to avoid acceptance. Under subsection (1), therefore, the buyer is given a reasonable time to notify the seller of his rejection, but without such seasonable notification his rejection is ineffective. The sections of this Chapter dealing with inspection of goods must be read in connection with the buyer's reasonable time for action under this subsection. Contract provisions limiting the time for rejection fall within the rule of the section on "Time" and are effective if the time set gives the buyer a reasonable time for discovery of defects. What constitutes a due "notifying" of rejection by the buyer to the seller is defined in Section 30-1-201.

2. Subsection (2) lays down the normal duties of the buyer upon rejection, which flow from the relationship of the parties. Beyond his duty to hold the goods with reasonable care for the buyer's [seller's] disposition, this section continues the policy of prior uniform legislation in generally relieving the buyer from any duties with respect to them, except when the circumstances impose the limited obligation of salvage upon him under the next section.

3. The present section applies only to rightful rejection by the buyer. If the seller has made a tender which in all respects conforms to the contract, the buyer has a positive duty to accept and his failure to do so constitutes a "wrongful rejection" which gives the seller immediate remedies for breach. Subsection (3) is included here to emphasize the sharp distinction between the rejection of an improper tender and the non-acceptance which is a breach by the buyer.

4. The provisions of this section are to be appropriately limited or modified when a negotiation is in process.

Failure to Notify Seller of Nonconformity of Goods — Damages Unwarranted: Defendants claimed that a jury instruction should have been given regarding damages owing under the Uniform Commercial Code for a sale of nonconforming goods. However, defendants did not reject the goods upon delivery or notify the seller within a reasonable time regarding the nonconformity. Because no damages were owing, an instruction on the measure of damages was not appropriate. NW. Truck & Trailer Sales, Inc. v. Dvorak, 269 M 150, 887 P2d 260, 51 St. Rep. 1530 (1994).

30-2-603. Merchant buyer's duties as to rightfully rejected goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section recognizes the duty imposed upon the merchant buyer by good faith and commercial practice to follow any reasonable instructions of the seller as to reshipping, storing, delivery to a third party, reselling or the like. Subsection (1) goes further and extends the duty to include the making of reasonable efforts to effect a salvage sale where the value of the goods is threatened and the seller's instructions do not arrive in time to prevent serious loss.

2. The limitations on the buyer's duty to resell under subsection (1) are to be liberally construed. The buyer's duty to resell under this section arises from commercial necessity and thus is present only when the seller has "no agent or place of business at the market of rejection". A financing agency which is acting in behalf of the seller in handling the documents rejected by the buyer is sufficiently the seller's agent to lift the burden of salvage resale from the buyer. (See provisions of Sections 30-4-503 and 30-5-112 [now repealed] on bank's duties with respect to rejected documents.) The buyer's duty to resell is extended only to goods in his "possession or control", but these are intended as words of wide, rather than narrow, import. In effect, the measure of the buyer's "control" is whether he can practicably effect control without undue commercial burden.

3. The explicit provisions for reimbursement and compensation to the buyer in subsection (2) are applicable and necessary only where he is not acting under instructions from the seller. As provided in subsection (1) the seller's instructions to be "reasonable" must on demand of the buyer include indemnity for expenses.

4. Since this section makes the resale of perishable goods an affirmative duty in contrast to a mere right to sell as under the case law, subsection (3) makes it clear that the buyer is liable only for the exercise of good faith in determining whether the value of the goods is sufficiently threatened to justify a quick resale or whether he has waited a sufficient length of time for instructions, or what a reasonable means and place of resale is.

5. A buyer who fails to make a salvage sale when his duty to do so under this section has arisen is subject to damages pursuant to the section on liberal administration of remedies.

30-2-604. Buyer's options as to salvage of rightfully rejected goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

The basic purpose of this section is twofold: on the one hand it aims at reducing the stake in dispute and on the other at avoiding the pinning of a technical "acceptance" on a buyer who has taken steps towards realization on or preservation of the goods in good faith. This section is essentially a salvage section and the buyer's right to act under it is conditioned upon (1) non-conformity of the goods, (2) due notification of rejection to the seller under the section on manner of rejection, and (3) the absence of any instructions from the seller which the merchant-buyer has a duty to follow under the preceding section.

This section is designed to accord all reasonable leeway to a rightfully rejecting buyer acting in good faith. The listing of what the buyer may do in the absence of instructions from the seller is intended to be not exhaustive but merely illustrative. This is not a "merchant's" section and the options are pure options given to merchant and non-merchant buyers alike. The merchant-buyer, however, may in some instances be under a duty rather than an option to resell under the provisions of the preceding section.

30-2-605. Waiver of buyer's objections by failure to particularize.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-605, U.C.C.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The present section rests upon a policy of permitting the buyer to give a quick and informal notice of defects in a tender without penalizing him for omissions in his statement, while at the same time protecting a seller who is reasonably misled by the buyer's failure to state curable defects.

2. Where the defect in a tender is one which could have been cured by the seller, a buyer who merely rejects the delivery without stating his objections to it is probably acting in commercial bad faith and seeking to get out of a deal which has become unprofitable. Subsection (1) (a), following the general policy of this Chapter which looks to preserving the deal wherever possible, therefore insists that the seller's right to correct his tender in such circumstances be protected.

3. When the time for cure is past, subsection (1)(b) makes it plain that a seller is entitled upon request to a final statement of objections upon which he can rely. What is needed is that he make clear to the buyer exactly what is being sought. A formal demand under paragraph (b) will be sufficient in the case of a merchant-buyer.

4. Subsection (2) applies to the particular case of documents the same principle which the section on effects of acceptance applies to the case of goods. The matter is dealt with in this section in term of "waiver" of objections rather than of right to revoke acceptance, partly to avoid any confusion with the problems of acceptance of goods and partly because defects in documents which are not taken as grounds for rejection are generally minor ones. The only defects concerned in the present subsection are defects in the documents which are apparent. This rule applies to both tangible and electronic documents of title. Where payment is required against the documents they must be inspected before payment, and the payment then constitutes acceptance of the documents. Under the section dealing with this problem, such acceptance of the documents does not constitute an acceptance of the goods or impair any options or remedies of the buyer for their improper delivery. Where the documents are delivered without requiring such contemporary action as payment from the buyer, the reason of the next section on what constitutes acceptance of goods, applies. Their acceptance by non-objection is therefore postponed until after a reasonable time for their inspection. In either situation, however, the buyer "waives" only the defects apparent in the documents.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-2-606. What constitutes acceptance of goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 48, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, the qualification in paragraph (c) and subsection (2) being new; otherwise the general policy of the prior legislation is continued.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter: To make it clear that:

1. Under this Chapter "acceptance" as applied to goods means that the buyer, pursuant to the contract, takes particular goods which have been appropriated to the contract as his own, whether or not he is obligated to do so, and whether he does so by words, action, or silence when it is time to speak. If the goods conform to the contract, acceptance amounts only to the performance by the buyer of one part of his legal obligation.

2. Under this Chapter acceptance of goods is always acceptance of identified goods which have been appropriated to the contract or are appropriated by the contract. There is no provision for "acceptance of title" apart from acceptance in general, since acceptance of title is not material under this Chapter to the detailed rights and duties of the parties. (See Section 30-2-401). The refinements of the older law between acceptance of goods and of title become unnecessary in view of the provisions of the sections on effect and revocation of acceptance, on effects of identification and on risk of loss, and those sections which free the seller's and buyer's remedies from the complications and confusions caused by the question of whether title has or has not passed to the buyer before breach.

3. Under paragraph (a), payment made after tender is always one circumstance tending to signify acceptance of the goods but in itself it can never be more than one circumstance and is not conclusive. Also, a conditional communication of acceptance always remains subject to its expressed conditions.

4. Under paragraph (c), any action taken by the buyer, which is inconsistent with his claim that he has rejected the goods, constitutes an acceptance. However, the provisions of paragraph (c) are subject to the sections dealing with rejection by the buyer which permit the buyer to take certain actions with respect to the goods pursuant to his options and duties imposed by those sections, without effecting an acceptance of the goods. The second clause of paragraph (c) modifies some of the prior case law and makes it clear that "acceptance" in law based on the wrongful act of the acceptor is acceptance only as against the wrongdoer and then only at the option of the party wronged.

In the same manner in which a buyer can bind himself, despite his insistence that he is rejecting or has rejected the goods, by an act inconsistent with the seller's ownership under paragraph (c), he can obligate himself by a communication of acceptance despite a prior rejection under paragraph (a). However, the sections on buyer's rights on improper delivery and on the effect of rightful rejection, make it clear that after he once rejects a tender, paragraph (a) does not operate in favor of the buyer unless the seller has re-tendered the goods or has taken affirmative action indicating that he is holding the tender open. See also Comment 2 to Section 30-2-601.

5. Subsection (2) supplements the policy of the section on buyer's rights on improper delivery, recognizing the validity of a partial acceptance but insisting that the buyer exercise this right only as to whole commercial units.

Case Notes

Finding of Fact Inconsistent With Conclusions of Law: The lower court found that defendant allowed plaintiff to take a silage chopper on a "tryout" basis to determine whether the rpm requirements of the chopper were compatible with plaintiff's tractor power takeoff capacity. The Supreme Court held it was inconsistent for the lower court to proceed from that finding and conclude, as a matter of law, that defendant was liable based on breach of implied warranty of fitness, negligent misrepresentation, and constructive fraud. As to liability for breach of warranty, the claim would lie only after acceptance of goods. In this case, a finding of taking goods on a "tryout" basis was contradictory to the acceptance requirement. Because acceptance was critical to the outcome of that cause of action and the other causes of action, the conflicting findings and conclusions constituted error. Nelson v. Davis Modern Mach., 220 M 347, 715 P2d 1052, 43 St. Rep. 423 (1986).

Acceptance of Nonconforming Goods — Recovery of Damages Not Precluded — Notice: Respondent Meland received building materials on July 7, 1981. About 10 days later, he began assembling the building and discovered that the materials did not conform to the contract terms, at which time he immediately notified appellant Intermountain of the problem. He then proceeded with construction, using the component parts to produce a building height he desired. Under 30-2-606(1)(c), acceptance of goods occurs when the buyer does any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. Meland's use of the delivered goods to construct a building was inconsistent with Intermountain's ownership and constituted acceptance. Intermountain argued that once there is acceptance no damages may be had. The Supreme Court ruled that under 30-2-607(2) acceptance precludes rejection of the goods or revocation if made with the knowledge of the nonconformity unless there is a reasonable assumption that the nonconformity may be reasonably cured, but does not preclude recovery for damages due. When a buyer has accepted goods and given notification, he may recover damages for any nonconformity under 30-2-714(1). Section 30-2-607(3) requires that the buyer must notify the seller within a reasonable time after he discovers any breach. In this case, notice was sufficient and the award of damages was affirmed. Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Sufficient Rejection of Nonconforming Goods: Plaintiff sold defendants an irrigation system and pump. Plaintiff substituted a different type of pump for the one ordered by defendants. Plaintiff and his supplier installed the system, and defendants paid for everything but the pump and its installation. Plaintiff and his supplier supervised the digging of the sump for the installation of the pump but did not test it. The pump became clogged before any water ever came out of it. The supplier cleaned the pump and had an agent reinstall it. Defendants tried unsuccessfully to get the system to work and called plaintiff to complain several times. Defendants finally told plaintiff to come and get the pump and refused to pay for it. They later purchased a different pump which operated the system properly. Plaintiff sued for the price of the pump and installation costs. The District Court entered judgment for the defendants. Plaintiff contends that the District Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law were insufficient in failing to adequately address the provisions of the U.C.C. governing rejection of nonconforming goods. The Supreme Court found that although the findings and conclusions could have been better, there was substantial evidence to support the conclusions that: (1) the goods were nonconforming; (2) there was a failure to cure the defects of the pump; and (3) the use of the pump was in fact a prolonged effort to determine why the pump failed to work and to cure the defect, and as such was not an act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. There was no acceptance by the defendants, no use inconsistent with the ownership of the plaintiff, and no delay in offering the return of the nonconforming pump significant enough to justify a conclusion that defendants had accepted the pump. Steinmetz v. Robertus, 196 M 311, 637 P2d 31, 38 St. Rep. 2067 (1981).

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Delivery Versus Acceptance: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that Montana Seeds, Inc., failed to establish its claim for goods "sold and delivered" by not proving actual delivery. The determining factor was whether defendant "accepted" the goods. Here there were two shipments. Only the second shipment's acceptance was challenged by defendant based on his contention that it was misdelivered. However, defendant bore the risk of loss because he did not specify a particular destination. His cause of action for misdelivery was against the carrier. Mont. Seeds, Inc. v. Holliday, 178 M 119, 582 P2d 1223 (1978). See also Konitz v. Claver, 1998 MT 27, 287 M 301, 954 P2d 1138, 55 St. Rep. 95 (1998).

30-2-607. Effect of acceptance — notice of breach — burden of establishing breach after acceptance — notice of claim or litigation to person answerable over.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1)—Section 41, Uniform Sales Act; Subsections (2) and (3)—Sections 49 and 69, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To continue the prior basic policies with respect to acceptance of goods while making a number of minor though material changes in the interest of simplicity and commercial convenience so that:

1. Under subsection (1), once the buyer accepts a tender the seller acquires a right to its price on the contract terms. In cases of partial acceptance, the price of any part accepted is, if possible, to be reasonably apportioned, using the type of apportionment familiar to the courts in quantum valebat cases, to be determined in terms of "the contract rate," which is the rate determined from the bargain in fact (the agreement) after the rules and policies of this Chapter have been brought to bear.

2. Under subsection (2) acceptance of goods precludes their subsequent rejection. Any return of the goods thereafter must be by way of revocation of acceptance under the next section. Revocation is unavailable for a non-conformity known to the buyer at the time of acceptance, except where the buyer has accepted on the reasonable assumption that the non-conformity would be seasonably cured.

3. All other remedies of the buyer remain unimpaired under subsection (2). This is intended to include the buyer's full rights with respect to future installments despite his acceptance of any earlier non-conforming installment.

4. The time of notification is to be determined by applying commercial standards to a merchant buyer. "A reasonable time" for notification from a retail consumer is to be judged by different standards so that in his case it will be extended, for the rule of requiring notification is designed to defeat commercial bad faith, not to deprive a good faith consumer of his remedy.

The content of the notification need merely be sufficient to let the seller know that the transaction is still troublesome and must be watched. There is no reason to require that the notification which saves the buyer's rights under this section must include a clear statement of all the objections that will be relied on by the buyer, as under the section covering statements of defects upon rejection (Section 30-2-605). Nor is there reason for requiring the notification to be a claim for damages or of any threatened litigation or other resort to a remedy. The notification which saves the buyer's rights under this Chapter need only be such as informs the seller that the transaction is claimed to involve a breach, and thus opens the way for normal settlement through negotiation.

5. Under this Chapter various beneficiaries are given rights for injuries sustained by them because of the seller's breach of warranty. Such a beneficiary does not fall within the reason of the present section in regard to discovery of defects and the giving of notice within a reasonable time after acceptance, since he has nothing to do with acceptance. However, the reason of this section does extend to requiring the beneficiary to notify the seller that an injury has occurred. What is said above, with regard to the extended time for reasonable notification from the lay consumer after the injury is also applicable here; but even a beneficiary can be properly held to the use of good faith in notifying, once he has had time to become aware of the legal situation.

6. Subsection (4) unambiguously places the burden of proof to establish breach on the buyer after acceptance. However, this rule becomes one purely of procedure when the tender accepted was non-conforming and the buyer has given the seller notice of breach under subsection (3). For subsection (2) makes it clear that acceptance leaves unimpaired the buyer's right to be made whole, and that right can be exercised by the buyer not only by way of cross-claim for damages, but also by way of recoupment in diminution or extinction of the price.

7. Subsections (3)(b) and (5)(b) give a warrantor against infringement an opportunity to defend or compromise third-party claims or be relieved of his liability. Subsection (5)(a) codifies for all warranties the practice of voucher to defend. Compare Section 30-3-803 [now repealed]. Subsection (6) makes these provisions applicable to the buyer's liability for infringement under Section 30-2-312.

8. All of the provisions of the present section are subject to any explicit reservation of rights.

Failure to Notify Seller of Nonconformity of Goods — Damages Unwarranted: Defendants claimed that a jury instruction should have been given regarding damages owing under the Uniform Commercial Code for a sale of nonconforming goods. However, defendants did not reject the goods upon delivery or notify the seller within a reasonable time regarding the nonconformity. Because no damages were owing, an instruction on the measure of damages was not appropriate. NW. Truck & Trailer Sales, Inc. v. Dvorak, 269 M 150, 887 P2d 260, 51 St. Rep. 1530 (1994).

Acceptance of Nonconforming Goods — Recovery of Damages Not Precluded — Notice: Respondent Meland received building materials on July 7, 1981. About 10 days later, he began assembling the building and discovered that the materials did not conform to the contract terms, at which time he immediately notified appellant Intermountain of the problem. He then proceeded with construction, using the component parts to produce a building height he desired. Under 30-2-606(1)(c), acceptance of goods occurs when the buyer does any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. Meland's use of the delivered goods to construct a building was inconsistent with Intermountain's ownership and constituted acceptance. Intermountain argued that once there is acceptance no damages may be had. The Supreme Court ruled that under 30-2-607(2) acceptance precludes rejection of the goods or revocation if made with the knowledge of the nonconformity unless there is a reasonable assumption that the nonconformity may be reasonably cured, but does not preclude recovery for damages due. When a buyer has accepted goods and given notification, he may recover damages for any nonconformity under 30-2-714(1). Section 30-2-607(3) requires that the buyer must notify the seller within a reasonable time after he discovers any breach. In this case, notice was sufficient and the award of damages was affirmed. Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Reliance on Expertise — Implied Warranty of Fitness for Particular Purpose: Defendant relied on plaintiff's expertise to select an affordable fire alarm system that would provide reliable protection for the hotel's property and guests. Where the seller is aware that the buyer is relying upon the seller's judgment to select suitable goods, an implied warranty that the goods are fit for that particular purpose is created. The system installed was complicated, difficult to use, and frequently malfunctioned. Defendant advised plaintiff of the failure of the system after a fire in the snack bar, which was prior to the fire in a guest room that eventually resulted in this action.

Plaintiff's own records showed repeated notifications of problems with the system. This was reasonable notice under 30-2-607(3). The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose was breached, and defendant was entitled to recover loss in value of the goods plus consequential and incidental damages. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Timeliness of Notice of Breach: In action to recover for breach of warranty of semen sold to cattle rancher by artificial insemination service, buyer gave timely notice of breach of warranty by informing seller of calf crop failure 10 months after artificial insemination process. Waddell v. Am. Breeders Serv., Inc., 161 M 221, 505 P2d 417, 61 ALR 3d 801 (1973).

30-2-608. Revocation of acceptance in whole or in part.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 69(1)(d), (3), (4) and (5), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. Although the prior basic policy is continued, the buyer is no longer required to elect between revocation of acceptance and recovery of damages for breach. Both are now available to him. The non-alternative character of the two remedies is stressed by the terms used in the present section. The section no longer speaks of "rescission," a term capable of ambiguous application either to transfer of title to the goods or to the contract of sale and susceptible also of confusion with cancellation for cause of an executed or executory portion of the contract. The remedy under this section is instead referred to simply as "revocation of acceptance" of goods tendered under a contract for sale and involves no suggestion of "election" of any sort.

2. Revocation of acceptance is possible only where the non-conformity substantially impairs the value of the goods to the buyer. For this purpose the test is not what the seller had reason to know at the time of contracting; the question is whether the non-conformity is such as will in fact cause a substantial impairment of value to the buyer though the seller had no advance knowledge as to the buyer's particular circumstances.

3. "Assurances" by the seller under paragraph (b) of subsection (1) can rest as well in the circumstances or in the contract as in explicit language used at the time of delivery. The reason for recognizing such assurances is that they induce the buyer to delay discovery. These are the only assurances involved in paragraph (b). Explicit assurances may be made either in good faith or bad faith. In either case any remedy accorded by this Chapter is available to the buyer under the section on remedies for fraud.

4. Subsection (2) requires notification of revocation of acceptance within a reasonable time after discovery of the grounds for such revocation. Since this remedy will be generally resorted to only after attempts at adjustment have failed, the reasonable time period should extend in most cases beyond the time in which notification of breach must be given, beyond the time for discovery of non-conformity after acceptance and beyond the time for rejection after tender. The parties may by their agreement limit the time for notification under this section, but the same sanctions and considerations apply to such agreements as are discussed in the comment on manner and effect of rightful rejection.

5. The content of the notice under subsection (2) is to be determined in this case as in others by considerations of good faith, prevention of surprise, and reasonable adjustment. More will generally be necessary than the mere notification of breach required under the preceding section. On the other hand the requirements of the section on waiver of buyer's objections do not apply here. The fact that quick notification of trouble is desirable affords good ground for being slow to bind a buyer by his first statement. Following the general policy of this Chapter, the requirements of the content of notification are less stringent in the case of a non-merchant buyer.

6. Under subsection (2) the prior policy is continued of seeking substantial justice in regard to the condition of goods restored to the seller. Thus the buyer may not revoke his acceptance if the goods have materially deteriorated except by reason of their own defects. Worthless goods, however, need not be offered back and minor defects in the articles reoffered are to be disregarded.

7. The policy of the section allowing partial acceptance is carried over into the present section and the buyer may revoke his acceptance, in appropriate cases, as to the entire lot or any commercial unit thereof.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-609. Right to adequate assurance of performance.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 53, 54(1)(b), 55 and 63(2), Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. The section rests on the recognition of the fact that the essential purpose of a contract between commercial men is actual performance and they do not bargain merely for a promise, or for a promise plus the right to win a lawsuit and that a continuing sense of reliance and security that the promised performance will be forthcoming when due, is an important feature of the bargain. If either the willingness or the ability of a party to perform declines materially between the time of contracting and the time for performance, the other party is threatened with the loss of a substantial part of what he has bargained for. A seller needs protection not merely against having to deliver on credit to a shaky buyer, but also against having to procure and manufacture the goods, perhaps turning down other customers. Once he has been given reason to believe that the buyer's performance has become uncertain, it is an undue hardship to force him to continue his own performance. Similarly, a buyer who believes that the seller's deliveries have become uncertain cannot safely wait for the due date of performance when he has been buying to assure himself of materials for his current manufacturing or to replenish his stock of merchandise.

2. Three measures have been adopted to meet the needs of commercial men in such situations. First, the aggrieved party is permitted to suspend his own performance and any preparation therefor, with excuse for any resulting necessary delay, until the situation has been clarified. "Suspend performance" under this section means to hold up performance pending the outcome of the demand, and includes also the holding up of any preparatory action. This is the same principle which governs the ancient law of stoppage and seller's lien, and also of excuse of a buyer from prepayment if the seller's actions manifest that he cannot or will not perform. (Original Act, Section 63(2).)

Secondly, the aggrieved party is given the right to require adequate assurance that the other party's performance will be duly forthcoming. This principle is reflected in the familiar clauses permitting the seller to curtail deliveries if the buyer's credit becomes impaired, which when held within the limits of reasonableness and good faith actually express no more than the fair business meaning of any commercial contract.

Third, and finally, this section provides the means by which the aggrieved party may treat the contract as broken if his reasonable grounds for insecurity are not cleared up within a reasonable time. This is the principle underlying the law of anticipatory breach, whether by way of defective part performance or by repudiation. The present section merges these three principles of law and commercial practice into a single theory of general application to all sales agreements looking to future performance.

3. Subsection (2) of the present section requires that "reasonable" grounds and "adequate" assurance as used in subsection (1) be defined by commercial rather than legal standards. The express reference to commercial standards carries no connotation that the obligation of good faith is not equally applicable here.

Under commercial standards and in accord with commercial practice, a ground for insecurity need not arise from or be directly related to the contract in question. The law as to "dependence" or "independence" of promises within a single contract does not control the application of the present section.

Thus a buyer who falls behind in "his account" with the seller, even though the items involved have to do with separate and legally distinct contracts, impairs the seller's expectation of due performance. Again, under the same test, a buyer who requires precision parts which he intends to use immediately upon delivery, may have reasonable grounds for insecurity if he discovers that his seller is making defective deliveries of such parts to other buyers with similar needs. Thus, too, in a situation such as arose in Jay Dreher Corporation v. Delco Appliance Corporation, 93 F.2d 275 (C.C.A.2, 1937), where a manufacturer gave a dealer an exclusive franchise for the sale of his product but on two or three occasions breached the exclusive dealing clause, although there was no default in orders, deliveries or payments under the separate sales contract between the parties, the aggrieved dealer would be entitled to suspend his performance of the contract for sale under the present section and to demand assurance that the exclusive dealing contract would be lived up to. There is no need for an explicit clause tying the exclusive franchise into the contract for the sale of goods since the situation itself ties the agreements together.

The nature of the sales contract enters also into the question of reasonableness. For example, a report from an apparently trustworthy source that the seller had shipped defective goods or was planning to ship them would normally give the buyer reasonable grounds for insecurity. But when the buyer has assumed the risk of payment before inspection of the goods, as in a sales contract on C.I.F. or similar cash against documents terms, that risk is not to be evaded by a demand for assurance. Therefore no ground for insecurity would exist under this section unless the report went to a ground which would excuse payment by the buyer.

4. What constitutes "adequate" assurance of due performance is subject to the same test of factual conditions. For example, where the buyer can make use of a defective delivery, a mere promise by a seller of good repute that he is giving the matter his attention and that the defect will not be repeated, is normally sufficient. Under the same circumstances, however, a similar statement by a known corner-cutter might well be considered insufficient without the posting of a guaranty or, if so demanded by the buyer, a speedy replacement of the delivery involved. By the same token where a delivery has defects, even though easily curable, which interfere with easy use by the buyer, no verbal assurance can be deemed adequate which is not accompanied by replacement, repair, money-allowance, or other commercially reasonable cure.

A fact situation such as arose in Corn Products Refining Co. v. Fasola, 94 N.J.L. 181, 109 A. 505 (1920) offers illustration both of reasonable grounds for insecurity and "adequate" assurance. In that case a contract for the sale of oils on 30 days' credit, 2% off for payment within 10 days, provided that credit was to be extended to the buyer only if his financial responsibility was satisfactory to the seller. The buyer had been in the habit of taking advantage of the discount but at the same time that he failed to make his customary 10 day payment, the seller heard rumors, in fact false, that the buyer's financial condition was shaky. Thereupon, the seller demanded cash before shipment or security satisfactory to him. The buyer sent a good credit report from his banker, expressed willingness to make payments when due on the 30 day terms and insisted on further deliveries under the contract. Under this Chapter the rumors, although false, were enough to make the buyer's financial condition "unsatisfactory" to the seller under the contract clause. Moreover, the buyer's practice of taking the cash discounts is enough, apart from the contract clause, to lay a commercial foundation for suspicion when the practice is suddenly stopped. These matters, however, go only to the justification of the seller's demand for security, or his "reasonable grounds for insecurity".

The adequacy of the assurance given is not measured as in the type of "satisfaction" situation affected with intangibles, such as in personal service cases, cases involving a third party's judgment as final, or cases in which the whole contract is dependent on one party's satisfaction, as in a sale on approval. Here, the seller must exercise good faith and observe commercial standards. This Chapter thus approves the statement of the court in James B. Berry's Sons Co. of Illinois v. Monark Gasoline & Oil Co., Inc., 32 F.2d 74 (C.C.A.8, 1929), that the seller's satisfaction under such a clause must be based upon reason and must not be arbitrary or capricious; and rejects the purely personal "good faith" test of the Corn Products Refining Co. case, which held that in the seller's sole judgment, if for any reason he was dissatisfied, he was entitled to revoke the credit. In the absence of the buyer's failure to take the 2% discount as was his custom, the banker's report given in that case would have been "adequate" assurance under this Act, regardless of the language of the "satisfaction" clause. However, the seller is reasonably entitled to feel insecure at a sudden expansion of the buyer's use of a credit term, and should be entitled either to security or to a satisfactory explanation.

The entire foregoing discussion as to adequacy of assurance by way of explanation is subject to qualification when repeated occasions for the application of this section arise. This Act recognizes that repeated delinquencies must be viewed as cumulative. On the other hand, commercial sense also requires that if repeated claims for assurance are made under this section, the basis for these claims must be increasingly obvious.

5. A failure to provide adequate assurance of performance and thereby to re-establish the security of expectation, results in a breach only "by repudiation" under subsection (4). Therefore, the possibility is continued of retraction of the repudiation under the section dealing with that problem, unless the aggrieved party has acted on the breach in some manner.

The thirty day limit on the time to provide assurance is laid down to free the question of reasonable time from uncertainty in later litigation.

6. Clauses seeking to give the protected party exceedingly wide powers to cancel or readjust the contract when ground for insecurity arises must be read against the fact that good faith is a part of the obligation of the contract and not subject to modification by agreement and includes, in the case of a merchant, the reasonable observance of commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade. Such clauses can thus be effective to enlarge the protection given by the present section to a certain extent, to fix the reasonable time within which requested assurance must be given, or to define adequacy of the assurance in any commercially reasonable fashion. But any clause seeking to set up arbitrary standards for action is ineffective under this Chapter. Acceleration clauses are treated similarly in the Chapters on Commercial Paper and Secured Transactions.

30-2-610. Anticipatory repudiation.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 63(2) and 65, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes: To make it clear that:

1. With the problem of insecurity taken care of by the preceding section and with provision being made in this Chapter as to the effect of a defective delivery under an installment contract, anticipatory repudiation centers upon an overt communication of intention or an action which renders performance impossible or demonstrates a clear determination not to continue with performance.

Under the present section when such a repudiation substantially impairs the value of the contract, the aggrieved party may at any time resort to his remedies for breach, or he may suspend his own performance while he negotiates with, or awaits performance by, the other party. But if he awaits performance beyond a commercially reasonable time he cannot recover resulting damages which he should have avoided.

2. It is not necessary for repudiation that performance be made literally and utterly impossible. Repudiation can result from action which reasonably indicates a rejection of the continuing obligation. And, a repudiation automatically results under the preceding section on insecurity when a party fails to provide adequate assurance of due future performance within thirty days after a justifiable demand therefor has been made. Under the language of this section, a demand by one or both parties for more than the contract calls for in the way of counter-performance is not in itself a repudiation nor does it invalidate a plain expression of desire for future performance. However, when under a fair reading it amounts to a statement of intention not to perform except on conditions which go beyond the contract, it becomes a repudiation.

3. The test chosen to justify an aggrieved party's action under this section is the same as that in the section on breach in installment contracts — namely the substantial value of the contract. The most useful test of substantial value is to determine whether material inconvenience or injustice will result if the aggrieved party is forced to wait and receive an ultimate tender minus the part or aspect repudiated.

4. After repudiation, the aggrieved party may immediately resort to any remedy he chooses provided he moves in good faith (see Section 30-1-203). Inaction and silence by the aggrieved party may leave the matter open but it cannot be regarded as misleading the repudiating party. Therefore the aggrieved party is left free to proceed at any time with his options under this section, unless he has taken some positive action which in good faith requires notification to the other party before the remedy is pursued.

Case Notes

Oral Contract for Sale of Grain — Near Three-Month Delay Before Cancellation of Contract Commercially Reasonable Time — Contract Enforced: When a grain elevator manager became aware of a seller's failure to deliver grain under an oral contract, the elevator's regional office sent the seller a letter urging performance and setting a deadline for cancellation of the contract if performance was not made. The Supreme Court upheld the jury's finding that the deadline was a commercially reasonable time before considering the contract breached and that General Mills was entitled to price out the contract at the market price for the grain on the deadline date, not the earlier date on which General Mills became aware that the seller would not perform and when grain prices were lower. 30-2-611. Retraction of anticipatory repudiation.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To make it clear that:

1. The repudiating party's right to reinstate the contract is entirely dependent upon the action taken by the aggrieved party. If the latter has cancelled the contract or materially changed his position at any time after the repudiation, there can be no retraction under this section.

2. Under subsection (2) an effective retraction must be accompanied by any assurances demanded under the section dealing with right to adequate assurance. A repudiation is of course sufficient to give reasonable ground for insecurity and to warrant a request for assurance as an essential condition of the retraction. However, after a timely and unambiguous expression of retraction, a reasonable time for the assurance to be worked out should be allowed by the aggrieved party before cancellation.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-612. "Installment contract" — breach.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 45(2), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To continue prior law but to make explicit the more mercantile interpretation of many of the rules involved, so that:

1. The definition of an installment contract is phrased more broadly in this Chapter so as to cover installment deliveries tacitly authorized by the circumstances or by the option of either party.

2. In regard to the apportionment of the price for separate payment this Chapter applies the more liberal test of what can be apportioned rather than the test of what is clearly apportioned by the agreement. This Chapter also recognizes approximate calculation or apportionment of price subject to subsequent adjustment. A provision for separate payment for each lot delivered ordinarily means that the price is at least roughly calculable by units of quantity, but such a provision is not essential to an "installment contract." If separate acceptance of separate deliveries is contemplated, no generalized contrast between wholly "entire" and wholly "divisible" contracts has any standing under this Chapter.

3. This Chapter rejects any approach which gives clauses such as "each delivery is a separate contract" their legalistically literal effect. Such contracts nonetheless call for installment deliveries. Even where a clause speaks of "a separate contract for all purposes", a commercial reading of the language under the section on good faith and commercial standards requires that the singleness of the document and the negotiation, together with the sense of the situation, prevail over any uncommercial and legalistic interpretation.

4. One of the requirements for rejection under subsection (2) is non-conformity substantially impairing the value of the installment in question. However, an installment agreement may require accurate conformity in quality as a condition to the right to acceptance if the need for such conformity is made clear either by express provision or by the circumstances. In such a case the effect of the agreement is to define explicitly what amounts to substantial impairment of value impossible to cure. A clause requiring accurate compliance as a condition to the right to acceptance must, however, have some basis in reason, must avoid imposing hardship by surprise and is subject to waiver or to displacement by practical construction.

Substantial impairment of the value of an installment can turn not only on the quality of the goods but also on such factors as time, quantity, assortment, and the like. It must be judged in terms of the normal or specifically known purposes of the contract. The defect in required documents refers to such matters as the absence of insurance documents under a C.I.F. contract, falsity of a bill of lading, or one failing to show shipment within the contract period or to the contract destination. Even in such cases, however, the provisions on cure of tender apply if appropriate documents are readily procurable.

5. Under subsection (2) an installment delivery must be accepted if the non-conformity is curable and the seller gives adequate assurance of cure. Cure of non-conformity of an installment in the first instance can usually be afforded by an allowance against the price, or in the case of reasonable discrepancies in quantity either by a further delivery or a partial rejection. This Chapter requires reasonable action by a buyer in regard to discrepant delivery and good faith requires that the buyer make any reasonable minor outlay of time or money necessary to cure an overshipment by severing out an acceptable percentage thereof. The seller must take over a cure which involves any material burden; the buyer's obligation reaches only to cooperation. Adequate assurance for purposes of subsection (2) is measured by the same standards as under the section on right to adequate assurance of performance.

6. Subsection (3) is designed to further the continuance of the contract in the absence of an overt cancellation. The question arising when an action is brought as to a single installment only is resolved by making such action waive the right of cancellation. This involves merely a defect in one or more installments, as contrasted with the situation where there is a true repudiation within the section on anticipatory repudiation. Whether the non-conformity in any given installment justifies cancellation as to the future depends, not on whether such non-conformity indicates an intent or likelihood that the future deliveries will also be defective, but whether the non-conformity substantially impairs the value of the whole contract. If only the seller's security in regard to future installments is impaired, he has the right to demand adequate assurances of proper future performance but has not an immediate right to cancel the entire contract. It is clear under this Chapter, however, that defects in prior installments are cumulative in effect, so that acceptance does not wash out the defect "waived." Prior policy is continued, putting the rule as to buyer's default on the same footing as that in regard to seller's default.

7. Under the requirement of seasonable notification of cancellation under subsection (3), a buyer who accepts a non-conforming installment which substantially impairs the value of the entire contract should properly be permitted to withhold his decision as to whether or not to cancel pending a response from the seller as to his claim for cure or adjustment. Similarly, a seller may withhold a delivery pending payment for prior ones, at the same time delaying his decision as to cancellation. A reasonable time for notifying of cancellation, judged by commercial standards under the section on good faith, extends of course to include the time covered by any reasonable negotiation in good faith. However, during this period the defaulting party is entitled, on request, to know whether the contract is still in effect, before he can be required to perform further.

30-2-613. Casualty to identified goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 7 and 8, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, the basic policy being continued but the test of a "divisible" or "indivisible" sale or contract being abandoned in favor of adjustment in business terms.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Where goods whose continued existence is presupposed by the agreement are destroyed without fault of either party, the buyer is relieved from his obligation but may at his option take the surviving goods at a fair adjustment. "Fault" is intended to include negligence and not merely wilful wrong. The buyer is expressly given the right to inspect the goods in order to determine whether he wishes to avoid the contract entirely or to take the goods with a price adjustment.

2. The section applies whether the goods were already destroyed at the time of contracting without the knowledge of either party or whether they are destroyed subsequently but before the risk of loss passes to the buyer. Where under the agreement, including of course usage of trade, the risk has passed to the buyer before the casualty, the section has no application. Beyond this, the essential question in determining whether the rules of this section are to be applied is whether the seller has or has not undertaken the responsibility for the continued existence of the goods in proper condition through the time of agreed or expected delivery.

3. The section on the term "no arrival, no sale" makes clear that delay in arrival, quite as much as physical change in the goods, gives the buyer the options set forth in this section.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-614. Substituted performance.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) requires the tender of a commercially reasonable substituted performance where agreed to facilities have failed or become commercially impracticable. Under this Chapter, in the absence of specific agreement, the normal or usual facilities enter into the agreement either through the circumstances, usage of trade or prior course of dealing.

This section appears between Section 30-2-613 on casualty to identified goods and the next section on excuse by failure of presupposed conditions, both of which deal with excuse and complete avoidance of the contract where the occurrence or non-occurrence of a contingency which was a basic assumption of the contract makes the expected performance impossible. The distinction between the present section and those sections lies in whether the failure or impossibility of performance arises in connection with an incidental matter or goes to the very heart of the agreement. The differing lines of solution are contrasted in a comparison of International Paper Co. v. Rockefeller, 161 App. Div. 180, 146 N.Y.S. 371 (1914) and Meyer v. Sullivan, 40 Cal. App. 723, 181 P. 847 (1919). In the former case a contract for the sale of spruce to be cut from a particular tract of land was involved. When a fire destroyed the trees growing on that tract the seller was held excused since performance was impossible. In the latter case the contract called for delivery of wheat "f.o.b. Kosmos Steamer at Seattle." The war led to cancellation of that line's sailing schedule after space had been duly engaged and the buyer was held entitled to demand substituted delivery at the warehouse on the line's loading dock. Under this Chapter, of course, the seller would also be entitled, had the market gone the other way, to make a substituted tender in that manner.

There must, however, be a true commercial impracticability to excuse the agreed to performance and justify a substituted performance. When this is the case a reasonable substituted performance tendered by either party should excuse him from strict compliance with contract terms which do not go to the essence of the agreement.

2. The substitution provided in this section as between buyer and seller does not carry over into the obligation of a financing agency under a letter of credit, since such an agency is entitled to performance which is plainly adequate on its face and without need to look into commercial evidence outside of the documents. See Chapter 5, especially Sections 30-5-102, 30-5-103, 30-5-109, 30-5-110, 30-5-114 [all repealed, see 30-5-122 and 30-5-124].

3. Under subsection (2) where the contract is still executory on both sides, the seller is permitted to withdraw unless the buyer can provide him with a commercially equivalent return despite the governmental regulation. Where, however, only the debt for the price remains, a larger leeway is permitted. The buyer may pay in the manner provided by the regulation even though this may not be commercially equivalent provided that the regulation is not "discriminatory, oppressive or predatory."

30-2-615. Excuse by failure of presupposed conditions.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section excuses a seller from timely delivery of goods contracted for, where his performance has become commercially impracticable because of unforeseen supervening circumstances not within the contemplation of the parties at the time of contracting. The destruction of specific goods and the problem of the use of substituted performance on points other than delay or quantity, treated elsewhere in this Chapter, must be distinguished from the matter covered by this section.

2. The present section deliberately refrains from any effort at an exhaustive expression of contingencies and is to be interpreted in all cases sought to be brought within its scope in terms of its underlying reason and purpose.

3. The first test for excuse under this Chapter in terms of basic assumption is a familiar one. The additional test of commercial impracticability (as contrasted with "impossibility," "frustration of performance" or "frustration of the venture") has been adopted in order to call attention to the commercial character of the criterion chosen by this Chapter.

4. Increased cost alone does not excuse performance unless the rise in cost is due to some unforeseen contingency which alters the essential nature of the performance. Neither is a rise or a collapse in the market in itself a justification, for that is exactly the type of business risk which business contracts made at fixed prices are intended to cover. But a severe shortage of raw materials or of supplies due to a contingency such as war, embargo, local crop failure, unforeseen shutdown of major sources of supply or the like, which either causes a marked increase in cost or altogether prevents the seller from securing supplies necessary to his performance, is within the contemplation of this section. (See Ford & Sons, Ltd., v. Henry Leetham & Sons, Ltd., 21 Com. Cas. 55 (1915, K.B.D.).)

5. Where a particular source of supply is exclusive under the agreement and fails through casualty, the present section applies rather than the provision on destruction or deterioration of specific goods. The same holds true where a particular source of supply is shown by the circumstances to have been contemplated or assumed by the parties at the time of contracting. (See Davis Co. v. Hoffmann-LaRoche Chemical Works, 178 App.Div. 855, 166 N.Y.S. 179 (1917) and International Paper Co. v. Rockefeller, 161 App.Div. 180, 146 N.Y.S. 371 (1914).) There is no excuse under this section, however, unless the seller has employed all due measures to assure himself that his source will not fail. (See Canadian Industrial Alcohol Co., Ltd., v. Dunbar Molasses Co., 258 N.Y. 194, 179 N.E. 383, 80 A.L.R. 1173 (1932) and Washington Mfg. Co. v. Midland Lumber Co., 113 Wash. 593, 194 P. 777 (1921).)

In the case of failure of production by an agreed source for causes beyond the seller's control, the seller should, if possible, be excused since production by an agreed source is without more a basic assumption of the contract. Such excuse should not result in relieving the defaulting supplier from liability nor in dropping into the seller's lap an unearned bonus of damages over. The flexible adjustment machinery of this Chapter provides the solution under the provision on the obligation of good faith. A condition to his making good the claim of excuse is the turning over to the buyer of his rights against the defaulting source of supply to the extent of the buyer's contract in relation to which excuse is being claimed.

6. In situations in which neither sense nor justice is served by either answer when the issue is posed in flat terms of "excuse" or "no excuse," adjustment under the various provisions of this Chapter is necessary, especially the sections on good faith, on insecurity and assurance and on the reading of all provisions in the light of their purposes, and the general policy of this Act to use equitable principles in furtherance of commercial standards and good faith.

7. The failure of conditions which go to convenience or collateral values rather than to the commercial practicability of the main performance does not amount to a complete excuse. However, good faith and the reason of the present section and of the preceding one may properly be held to justify and even to require any needed delay involved in a good faith inquiry seeking a readjustment of the contract terms to meet the new conditions.

8. The provisions of this section are made subject to assumption of greater liability by agreement and such agreement is to be found not only in the expressed terms of the contract but in the circumstances surrounding the contracting, in trade usage and the like. Thus the exemptions of this section do not apply when the contingency in question is sufficiently foreshadowed at the time of contracting to be included among the business risks which are fairly to be regarded as part of the dickered terms, either consciously or as a matter of reasonable, commercial interpretation from the circumstances. (See Madeirense Do Brasil, S. A. v. Stulman-Emrick Lumber Co., 147 F.2d 399 (C.C.A., 2 Cir., 1945).) The exemption otherwise present through usage of trade under the present section may also be expressly negated by the language of the agreement. Generally, express agreements as to exemptions designed to enlarge upon or supplant the provisions of this section are to be read in the light of mercantile sense and reason, for this section itself sets up the commercial standard for normal and reasonable interpretation and provides a minimum beyond which agreement may not go.

Agreement can also be made in regard to the consequences of exemption as laid down in paragraphs (b) and (c) and the next section on procedure on notice claiming excuse.

9. The case of a farmer who has contracted to sell crops to be grown on designated land may be regarded as falling either within the section on casualty to identified goods or this section, and he may be excused, when there is a failure of the specific crop, either on the basis of the destruction of identified goods or because of the failure of a basic assumption of the contract.

Exemption of the buyer in the case of a "requirements" contract is covered by the "Output and Requirements" section both as to assumption and allocation of the relevant risks. But when a contract by a manufacturer to buy fuel or raw material makes no specific reference to a particular venture and no such reference may be drawn from the circumstances, commercial understanding views it as a general deal in the general market and not conditioned on any assumption of the continuing operation of the buyer's plant. Even when notice is given by the buyer that the supplies are needed to fill a specific contract of a normal commercial kind, commercial understanding does not see such a supply contract as conditioned on the continuance of the buyer's further contract for outlet. On the other hand, where the buyer's contract is in reasonable commercial understanding conditioned on a definite and specific venture or assumption as, for instance, a war procurement subcontract known to be based on a prime contract which is subject to termination, or a supply contract for a particular construction venture, the reason of the present section may well apply and entitle the buyer to the exemption.

10. Following its basic policy of using commercial practicability as a test for excuse, this section recognizes as of equal significance either a foreign or domestic regulation and disregards any technical distinctions between "law," "regulation," "order" and the like. Nor does it make the present action of the seller depend upon the eventual judicial determination of the legality of the particular governmental action. The seller's good faith belief in the validity of the regulation is the test under this Chapter and the best evidence of his good faith is the general commercial acceptance of the regulation. However, governmental interference cannot excuse unless it truly "supervenes" in such a manner as to be beyond the seller's assumption of risk. And any action by the party claiming excuse which causes or colludes in inducing the governmental action preventing his performance would be in breach of good faith and would destroy his exemption.

11. An excused seller must fulfill his contract to the extent which the supervening contingency permits, and if the situation is such that his customers are generally affected he must take account of all in supplying one. Subsections (a) and (b), therefore, explicitly permit in any proration a fair and reasonable attention to the needs of regular customers who are probably relying on spot orders for supplies. Customers at different stages of the manufacturing process may be fairly treated by including the seller's manufacturing requirements. A fortiori, the seller may also take account of contracts later in date than the one in question. The fact that such spot orders may be closed at an advanced price causes no difficulty, since any allocation which exceeds normal past requirements will not be reasonable. However, good faith requires, when prices have advanced, that the seller exercise real care in making his allocations, and in case of doubt his contract customers should be favored and supplies prorated evenly among them regardless of price. Save for the extra care thus required by changes in the market, this section seeks to leave every reasonable business leeway to the seller.

Standard for Excusable Delay and Default — Failure to Deliver Siding: Morin Building Products Company's failure to deliver the metal siding is not excused by the problems it experienced with its subcontractors and suppliers. It is this court's conclusion that the problems encountered in manufacturing this siding were or should have been contemplated by Morin at the time the contract was formed. As established in Eastern Air Lines, Inc. v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 532 F2d 957 (5th Cir. 1976), the standard for excusable delay and default is commercial impracticability. Morin Bldg. Prod. 30-2-616. Procedure on notice claiming excuse.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

This section seeks to establish simple and workable machinery for providing certainty as to when a supervening and excusing contingency "excuses" the delay, "discharges" the contract, or may result in a waiver of the delay by the buyer. When the seller notifies, in accordance with the preceding section, claiming excuse, the buyer may acquiesce, in which case the contract is so modified. No consideration is necessary in a case of this kind to support such a modification. If the buyer does not elect so to modify the contract, he may terminate it and under subsection (2) his silence after receiving the seller's claim of excuse operates as such a termination. Subsection (3) denies effect to any contract clause made in advance of trouble which would require the buyer to stand ready to take delivery whenever the seller is excused from delivery by unforeseen circumstances.

Part 7
Remedies

30-2-701. Remedies for breach of collateral contracts not impaired.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

Whether a claim for breach of an obligation collateral to the contract for sale requires separate trial to avoid confusion of issues is beyond the scope of this Chapter; but contractual arrangements which as a business matter enter vitally into the contract should be considered a part thereof in so far as cross-claims or defenses are concerned.

30-2-702. Seller's remedies on discovery of buyer's insolvency.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (1)—Sections 53(1)(b), 54(1)(c) and 57, Uniform Sales Act; Subsection (2)—none; Subsection (3)—Section 76(3), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, the protection given to a seller who has sold on credit and has delivered goods to the buyer immediately preceding his insolvency being extended.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter: To make it clear that:

1. The seller's right to withhold the goods or to stop delivery except for cash when he discovers the buyer's insolvency is made explicit in subsection (1) regardless of the passage of title, and the concept of stoppage has been extended to include goods in the possession of any bailee who has not yet attorned to the buyer.

2. Subsection (2) takes as its base line the proposition that any receipt of goods on credit by an insolvent buyer amounts to a tacit business misrepresentation of solvency and therefore is fraudulent as against the particular seller. This Chapter makes discovery of the buyer's insolvency and demand within a ten day period a condition of the right to reclaim goods on this ground. The ten day limitation period operates from the time of receipt of the goods.

An exception to this time limitation is made when a written misrepresentation of solvency has been made to the particular seller within three months prior to the delivery. To fall within the exception the statement of solvency must be in writing, addressed to the particular seller and dated within three months of the delivery.

3. Because the right of the seller to reclaim goods under this section constitutes preferential treatment as against the buyer's other creditors subsection (3) provides that such reclamation bars all his other remedies as to the goods involved.

30-2-703. Seller's remedies in general.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: No comparable index section. See Section 53, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. This section is an index section which gathers together in one convenient place all of the various remedies open to a seller for any breach by the buyer. This Chapter rejects any doctrine of election of remedy as a fundamental policy and thus the remedies are essentially cumulative in nature and include all of the available remedies for breach. Whether the pursuit of one remedy bars another depends entirely on the facts of the individual case.

2. The buyer's breach which occasions the use of the remedies under this section may involve only one lot or delivery of goods, or may involve all of the goods which are the subject matter of the particular contract. The right of the seller to pursue a remedy as to all the goods when the breach is as to only one or more lots is covered by the section on breach in installment contracts. The present section deals only with the remedies available after the goods involved in the breach have been determined by that section.

3. In addition to the typical case of refusal to pay or default in payment, the language in the preamble, "fails to make a payment due," is intended to cover the dishonor of a check on due presentment, or the non-acceptance of a draft, and the failure to furnish an agreed letter of credit.

4. It should also be noted that this Act requires its remedies to be liberally administered and provides that any right or obligation which it declares is enforceable by action unless a different effect is specifically prescribed (Section 30-1-106).

Case Notes

Instruction on Damages Given in Permissive Language Held Error: Where the defendant county refused to accept delivery of a rock crusher it had previously agreed to purchase and the plaintiff brought an action for damages, it was error for the District Court to instruct the jury that it could award damages for lost net profits and incidental damages. The possible measures of damages under the U.C.C. are not stated in permissive language but are mandatory and specifically state the amount of recoverable damage, depending upon the remedy the seller has pursued. The District Court's use of the words "may award any of the following" implied to the jury that they were not required by law to award specific damages. The instruction was therefore erroneous as contrary to the U.C.C. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

The plaintiff was not required to resell the bodies to the defendant. Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. Pepper, 480 F. Supp. 1364 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

30-2-704. Seller's right to identify goods to the contract notwithstanding breach or to salvage unfinished goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 63(3) and 64(4), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, the seller's rights being broadened.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section gives an aggrieved seller the right at the time of breach to identify to the contract any conforming finished goods, regardless of their resalability, and to use reasonable judgment as to completing unfinished goods. It thus makes the goods available for resale under the resale section, the seller's primary remedy, and in the special case in which resale is not practicable, allows the action for the price which would then be necessary to give the seller the value of his contract.

2. Under this Chapter the seller is given express power to complete manufacture or procurement of goods for the contract unless the exercise of reasonable commercial judgment as to the facts as they appear at the time he learns of the breach makes it clear that such action will result in a material increase in damages. The burden is on the buyer to show the commercially unreasonable nature of the seller's action in completing manufacture.

Duty to Mitigate Damages — Burden of Proof: Where the defendant county refused to accept delivery of a rock crusher it had earlier agreed to purchase and the plaintiff brought an action for damages, it was error for the District Court to instruct the jury on the duty of the plaintiff alone to mitigate damages. The county had the opportunity at an early date to take affirmative action to affirm or repudiate the contract and failed to do so. The comments to 30-2-704 state that the burden is upon the buyer to show the commercially unreasonable nature of the seller's action. The instruction placing the entire burden of mitigation upon the plaintiff was therefore in error. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

30-2-705. Seller's stoppage of delivery in transit or otherwise.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 2-705, U.C.C.]

[Code Commissioner Note: In 2005, Montana adopted Alternative B of the 2003 revision to Article 7 for this section.]

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 57-59, Uniform Sales Act; see also Sections 12, 14 and 42, Uniform Bills of Lading Act and Sections 9, 11 and 49, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: This section continues and develops the above sections of the Uniform Sales Act in the light of the other uniform statutory provisions noted.

Purposes: To make it clear that:

1. Subsection (1) applies the stoppage principle to other bailees as well as carriers.

It also expands the remedy to cover the situations, in addition to buyer's insolvency, specified in the subsection. But since stoppage is a burden in any case to carriers, and might be a very heavy burden to them if it covered all small shipments in all these situations, the right to stop for reasons other than insolvency is limited to carload, truckload, planeload or larger shipments. The seller shipping to a buyer of doubtful credit can protect himself by shipping C.O.D.

Where stoppage occurs for insecurity it is merely a suspension of performance, and if assurances are duly forthcoming from the buyer the seller is not entitled to resell or divert.

Improper stoppage is a breach by the seller if it effectively interferes with the buyer's right to due tender under the section on manner of tender of delivery. However, if the bailee obeys an unjustified order to stop he may also be liable to the buyer. The measure of his obligation is dependent on the provisions of the Documents of Title Chapter (Section 30-7-303). Subsection 3(b) therefore gives him a right of indemnity as against the seller in such a case.

2. "Receipt by the buyer" includes receipt by the buyer's designated representative, the sub-purchaser, when shipment is made direct to him and the buyer himself never receives the goods. It is entirely proper under this Chapter that the seller, by making such direct shipment to the sub-purchaser, be regarded as acquiescing in the latter's purchase and as thus barred from stoppage of the goods as against him.

As between the buyer and the seller, the latter's right to stop the goods at any time until they reach the place of final delivery is recognized by this section.

Under subsection (3)(c) and (d), the carrier is under no duty to recognize the stop order of a person who is a stranger to the carrier's contract. But the seller's right as against the buyer to stop delivery remains, whether or not the carrier is obligated to recognize the stop order. If the carrier does obey it, the buyer cannot complain merely because of that circumstance; and the seller becomes obligated under subsection (3)(b) to pay the carrier any ensuing damages or charges.

3. A diversion of a shipment is not a "reshipment" under subsection (2)(c) when it is merely an incident to the original contract of transportation. Nor is the procurement of "exchange bills" of lading which change only the name of the consignee to that of the buyer's local agent but do not alter the destination of a reshipment.

Acknowledgment by the carrier as a "warehouse" within the meaning of this Chapter requires a contract of a truly different character from the original shipment, a contract not in extension of transit but as a warehouse.

4. Subsection (3)(c) makes the bailee's obedience of a notification to stop conditional upon the surrender of possession or control of any outstanding negotiable document.

5. Any charges or losses incurred by the carrier in following the seller's orders, whether or not he was obligated to do so, fall to the seller's charge.

6. After an effective stoppage under this section the seller's rights in the goods are the same as if he had never made a delivery.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in (2)(c) at end substituted "a warehouse" for "warehouseman"; in (3)(c) near end inserted "possession or control of"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 93, Ch. 575, L. 2005, provided: "[This act] applies to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises on or after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a document of title that is issued or a bailment that arises before [the effective date of this act] even if the document of title or bailment would be subject to [this act] if the document of title had been issued or bailment had arisen after [the effective date of this act]. [This act] does not apply to a right of action that has accrued before [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 2005.

30-2-706. Seller's resale including contract for resale.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 60, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To simplify the prior statutory provision and to make it clear that:

1. The only condition precedent to the seller's right of resale under subsection (1) is a breach by the buyer within the section on the seller's remedies in general or insolvency. Other meticulous conditions and restrictions of the prior uniform statutory provision are disapproved by this Chapter and are replaced by standards of commercial reasonableness. Under this section the seller may resell the goods after any breach by the buyer. Thus, an anticipatory repudiation by the buyer gives rise to any of the seller's remedies for breach, and to the right of resale. This principle is supplemented by subsection (2) which authorizes a resale of goods which are not in existence or were not identified to the contract before the breach.

2. In order to recover the damages prescribed in subsection (1) the seller must act "in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner" in making the resale. This standard is intended to be more comprehensive than that of "reasonable care and judgment" established by the prior uniform statutory provision. Failure to act properly under this section deprives the seller of the measure of damages here provided and relegates him to that provided in Section 30-2-708.

Under this Chapter the seller resells by authority of law, in his own behalf, for his own benefit and for the purpose of fixing his damages. The theory of a seller's agency is thus rejected.

3. If the seller complies with the prescribed standard of duty in making the resale, he may recover from the buyer the damages provided for in subsection (1). Evidence of market or current prices at any particular time or place is relevant only on the question of whether the seller acted in a commercially reasonable manner in making the resale.

The distinction drawn by some courts between cases where the title had not passed to the buyer and the seller had resold as owner, and cases where the title had passed and the seller had resold by virtue of his lien on the goods, is rejected.

4. Subsection (2) frees the remedy of resale from legalistic restrictions and enables the seller to resell in accordance with reasonable commercial practices so as to realize as high a price as possible in the circumstances. By "public" sale is meant a sale by auction. A "private" sale may be effected by solicitation and negotiation conducted either directly or through a broker. In choosing between a public and private sale the character of the goods must be considered and relevant trade practices and usages must be observed.

5. Subsection (2) merely clarifies the common law rule that the time for resale is a reasonable time after the buyer's breach, by using the language "commercially reasonable." What is such a reasonable time depends upon the nature of the goods, the condition of the market and the other circumstances of the case; its length cannot be measured by any legal yardstick or divided into degrees. Where a seller contemplating resale receives a demand from the buyer for inspection under the section of preserving evidence of goods in dispute, the time for resale may be appropriately lengthened.

On the question of the place for resale, subsection (2) goes to the ultimate test, the commercial reasonableness of the seller's choice as to the place for an advantageous resale. This Chapter rejects the theory that the seller is required to resell at the agreed place for delivery and that a resale elsewhere can be permitted only in exceptional cases.

6. The purpose of subsection (2) being to enable the seller to dispose of the goods to the best advantage, he is permitted in making the resale to depart from the terms and conditions of the original contract for sale to any extent "commercially reasonable" in the circumstances.

7. The provision of subsection (2) that the goods need not be in existence to be resold applies when the buyer is guilty of anticipatory repudiation of a contract for future goods, before the goods or some of them have come into existence. In such a case the seller may exercise the right of resale and fix his damages by "one or more contracts to sell" the quantity of conforming future goods affected by the repudiation. The companion provision of subsection (2) that resale may be made although the goods were not identified to the contract prior to the buyer's breach, likewise contemplates an anticipatory repudiation by the buyer but occurring after the goods are in existence. If the goods so identified conform to the contract, their resale will fix the seller's damages quite as satisfactorily as if they had been identified before the breach.

8. Where the resale is to be by private sale, subsection (3) requires that reasonable notification of the seller's intention to resell must be given to the buyer. The length of notification of a private sale depends upon the urgency of the matter. Notification of the time and place of this type of sale is not required.

Subsection (4)(b) requires that the seller give the buyer reasonable notice of the time and place of a public resale so that he may have an opportunity to bid or to secure the attendance of other bidders. An exception is made in the case of goods "which are perishable or threaten to decline speedily in value."

9. Since there would be no reasonable prospect of competitive bidding elsewhere, subsection (4) requires that a public resale "must be made at a usual place or market for public sale if one is reasonably available;" i.e., a place or market which prospective bidders may reasonably be expected to attend. Such a market may still be "reasonably available" under this subsection, though at a considerable distance from the place where the goods are located. In such a case the expense of transporting the goods for resale is recoverable from the buyer as part of the seller's incidental damages under subsection (1). However, the question of availability is one of commercial reasonableness in the circumstances and if such "usual" place or market is not reasonably available, a duly advertised public resale may be held at another place if it is one which prospective bidders may reasonably be expected to attend, as distinguished from a place where there is no demand whatsoever for goods of the kind.

Paragraph (a) of subsection (4) qualifies the last sentence of subsection (2) with respect to resales of unidentified and future goods at public sale. If conforming goods are in existence the seller may identify them to the contract after the buyer's breach and then resell them at public sale. If the goods have not been identified, however, he may resell them at public sale only as "future" goods and only where there is a recognized market for public sale of futures in goods of the kind.

The provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection (4) are intended to permit intelligent bidding.

The provision of paragraph (d) of subsection (4) permitting the seller to bid and, of course, to become the purchaser, benefits the original buyer by tending to increase the resale price and thus decreasing the damages he will have to pay.

10. This Chapter departs in subsection (5) from the prior uniform statutory provision in permitting a good faith purchaser at resale to take a good title as against the buyer even though the seller fails to comply with the requirements of this section.

11. Under subsection (6), the seller retains profit, if any, without distinction based on whether or not he had a lien since this Chapter divorces the question of passage of title to the buyer from the seller's right of resale or the consequences of its exercise. On the other hand, where "a person in the position of a seller" or a buyer acting under the section on buyer's remedies, exercises his right of resale under the present section he does so only for the limited purpose of obtaining cash for his "security interest" in the goods. Once that purpose has been accomplished any excess in the resale price belongs to the seller to whom an accounting must be made as provided in the last sentence of subsection (6).

Damages Not Supported by Substantial Credible Evidence: Where the defendant county refused to accept delivery of a rock crusher it had earlier agreed to purchase and the plaintiff brought an action for damages, it was error for the jury to award the plaintiff $10,000 in damages. The measure of damages would be the contract price of $305,725 plus incidental damages less the resale price of $186,499.86 and expenses saved as a consequence of the breach, or would have been the plaintiff's anticipated profit of $78,879.56 plus incidental damages. Under either measure of damages, the record shows the damages to have been far in excess of the $10,000 awarded and there is no substantial credible evidence to support the verdict. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

30-2-708. Seller's damages for nonacceptance or repudiation.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 64, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. The prior uniform statutory provision is followed generally in setting the current market price at the time and place for tender as the standard by which damages for non-acceptance are to be determined. The time and place of tender is determined by reference to Section 30-2-503 on manner of tender of delivery, and to the sections on the effect of such terms as FOB, FAS, CIF, C & F, Ex Ship and No Arrival, No Sale.

In the event that there is no evidence available of the current market price at the time and place of tender, proof of a substitute market may be made under the section on determination and proof of market price. Furthermore, the section on the admissibility of market quotations is intended to ease materially the problem of providing competent evidence.

2. The provision of this section permitting recovery of expected profit including reasonable overhead where the standard measure of damages is inadequate, together with the new requirement that price actions may be sustained only where resale is impractical, are designed to eliminate the unfair and economically wasteful results arising under the older law when fixed price articles were involved. This section permits the recovery of lost profits in all appropriate cases, which would include all standard priced goods. The normal measure there would be list price less cost to the dealer or list price less manufacturing cost to the manufacturer. It is not necessary to a recovery of "profit" to show a history of earnings, especially if a new venture is involved.

3. In all cases the seller may recover incidental damages.

Case Notes

Interpretation and Adoption of Lost Volume Seller Theory — No Error in Instructing Jury on Theory in Conjunction With Instruction on Mitigation of Damages Doctrine: The lost volume seller theory (see Restatement (Second) of Contracts 347, 350) allows a jury to consider the fact that an injured party, under certain circumstances, may not be made whole if its subsequent contracts diminish its losses. The traditional rule is that an injured party may not recover damages for breach of contract that the injured party could reasonably have avoided by entering into a subsequent contract. The lost volume seller theory provides only a limited exception to the traditional rule and does not undermine the requirement that an injured party must attempt to mitigate its damages in breach of contract claims, but instead allows a party to keep the monetary benefits of a breached contract, undiminished by the doctrine of mitigation of damages, if the party could have and would have entered into a second contract simultaneously with the breached contract. In addition, the theory applies with equal force to goods and services. Defendant in this case asserted that it was error for the trial court to instruct the jury on the lost volume seller theory. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court gave instructions on both the mitigation of damages doctrine and the lost volume seller theory and held that both instructions represented correct statements of the law. It was the jury's role to resolve factual disputes regarding plaintiff's duty to mitigate its losses and its alleged ability to profitably service the contract entered with defendant and the contract entered after defendant's breach, but it was not error for the trial court to give both instructions as statements of the applicable law. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Ltd. v. W. Star Trucks, Inc., 2007 MT 48, 336 M 145, 153 P3d 627 (2007).

Damages Not Supported by Substantial Credible Evidence: Where the defendant county refused to accept delivery of a rock crusher it had earlier agreed to purchase and the plaintiff brought an action for damages, it was error for the jury to award the plaintiff $10,000 in damages. The measure of damages would be the contract price of $305,725 plus incidental damages less the resale price of $186,499.86 and expenses saved as a consequence of the breach, or would have been the plaintiff's anticipated profit of $78,879.56 plus incidental damages. Under either measure of damages, the record shows the damages to have been far in excess of the $10,000 awarded and there is no substantial credible evidence to support the verdict. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

Instruction on Damages Given in Permissive Language Held Error: Where the defendant county refused to accept delivery of a rock crusher it had previously agreed to purchase and the plaintiff brought an action for damages, it was error for the District Court to instruct the jury that it could award damages for lost net profits and incidental damages. The possible measures of damages under the U.C.C. are not stated in permissive language but are mandatory and specifically state the amount of recoverable damage, depending upon the remedy the seller has pursued. The District Court's use of the words "may award any of the following" implied to the jury that they were not required by law to award specific damages. The instruction was therefore erroneous as contrary to the U.C.C. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

30-2-709. Action for the price.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 63, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten, important commercially needed changes being incorporated.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. Neither the passing of title to the goods nor the appointment of a day certain for payment is now material to a price action.

2. The action for the price is now generally limited to those cases where resale of the goods is impracticable except where the buyer has accepted the goods or where they have been destroyed after risk of loss has passed to the buyer.

3. This section substitutes an objective test by action for the former "not readily resalable" standard. An action for the price under subsection (1)(b) can be sustained only after a "reasonable effort to resell" the goods "at reasonable price" has actually been made or where the circumstances "reasonably indicate" that such an effort will be unavailing.

4. If a buyer is in default not with respect to the price, but on an obligation to make an advance, the seller should recover not under this section for the price as such, but for the default in the collateral (though coincident) obligation to finance the seller. If the agreement between the parties contemplates that the buyer will acquire, on making the advance, a security interest in the goods, the buyer on making the advance has such an interest as soon as the seller has rights in the agreed collateral. See Section 30-9-204 [now repealed, see 30-9A-204].

5. "Goods accepted" by the buyer under subsection (1) (a) include only goods as to which there has been no justified revocation of acceptance, for such a revocation means that there has been a default by the seller which bars his rights under this section. "Goods lost or damaged" are covered by the section on risk of loss. "Goods identified to the contract" under subsection (1)(b) are covered by the section on identification and the section on identification notwithstanding breach.

6. This section is intended to be exhaustive in its enumeration of cases where an action for the price lies.

7. If the action for the price fails, the seller may nonetheless have proved a case entitling him to damages for non-acceptance. In such a situation, subsection (3) permits recovery of those damages in the same action.

Delivery Versus Acceptance: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that Montana Seeds, Inc., failed to establish its claim for goods "sold and delivered" by not proving actual delivery. The determining factor was whether defendant "accepted" the goods. Here there were two shipments. Only the second shipment's acceptance was challenged by defendant based on his contention that it was misdelivered. However, defendant bore the risk of loss because he did not specify a particular destination. His cause of action for misdelivery was against the carrier. Mont. Seeds, Inc. v. Holliday, 178 M 119, 582 P2d 1223 (1978).

Definite Balance Due — When Presumed: Although Montana law is that "the single indispensable ingredient in an account stated is an exact, certain, and definite balance arrived at by the debtor and creditor", Nelson v. Mont. Iron Mining Co., 140 M 331, 371 P2d 874 (1962), this ingredient may be presumed when the debtor acquiesces to a statement of the balance due submitted by the creditor. Mont. Seeds, Inc. v. Holliday, 178 M 119, 582 P2d 1223 (1978).

30-2-710. Seller's incidental damages.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 64 and 70, Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

To authorize reimbursement of the seller for expenses reasonably incurred by him as a result of the buyer's breach. The section sets forth the principal normal and necessary additional elements of damage flowing from the breach but intends to allow all commercially reasonable expenditures made by the seller.

Contract for Scrap Metal — Expenses of Resale — Vandalism: Where plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby defendant was to purchase crushed auto bodies from the plaintiff and where, as a result of defendant's refusal to accept approximately half of the bodies, the plaintiff was forced to resell the auto bodies to another buyer, the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the costs directly incurred in resale but not entitled to recover damages for vandalism done to his equipment, as the vandalism was not occasioned by the breach of contract or foreseen by the parties. Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. Pepper, 480 F. Supp. 1364 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

30-2-711. Buyer's remedies in general — buyer's security interest in rejected goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: No comparable index section; Subsection (3)—Section 69(5), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: The prior uniform statutory provision is generally continued and expanded in Subsection (3).

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. To index in this section the buyer's remedies, subsection (1) covering those remedies permitting the recovery of money damages, and subsection (2) covering those which permit reaching the goods themselves. The remedies listed here are those available to a buyer who has not accepted the goods or who has justifiably revoked his acceptance. The remedies available to a buyer with regard to goods finally accepted appear in the section dealing with breach in regard to accepted goods. The buyer's right to proceed as to all goods when the breach is as to only some of the goods is determined by the section on breach in installment contracts and by the section on partial acceptance.

Despite the seller's breach, proper retender of delivery under the section on cure of improper tender or replacement can effectively preclude the buyer's remedies under this section, except for any delay involved.

2. To make it clear in subsection (3) that the buyer may hold and resell rejected goods if he has paid a part of the price or incurred expenses of the type specified. "Paid" as used here includes acceptance of a draft or other time negotiable instrument or the signing of a negotiable note. His freedom of resale is coextensive with that of a seller under this Chapter except that the buyer may not keep any profit resulting from the resale and is limited to retaining only the amount of the price paid and the costs involved in the inspection and handling of the goods. The buyer's security interest in the goods is intended to be limited to the items listed in subsection (3), and the buyer is not permitted to retain such funds as he might believe adequate for his damages. The buyer's right to cover, or to have damages for non-delivery, is not impaired by his exercise of his right of resale.

3. It should also be noted that this Act requires its remedies to be liberally administered and provides that any right or obligation which it declares is enforceable by action unless a different effect is specifically prescribed (Section 30-1-106).

Case Notes

Finding of Fact Inconsistent With Conclusions of Law: The lower court found that defendant allowed plaintiff to take a silage chopper on a "tryout" basis to determine whether the rpm requirements of the chopper were compatible with plaintiff's tractor power takeoff capacity. The Supreme Court held it was inconsistent for the lower court to proceed from that finding and conclude, as a matter of law, that defendant was liable based on breach of implied warranty of fitness, negligent misrepresentation, and constructive fraud. As to liability for breach of warranty, the claim would lie only after acceptance of goods. In this case, a finding of taking goods on a "tryout" basis was contradictory to the acceptance requirement. Because acceptance was critical to the outcome of that cause of action and the other causes of action, the conflicting findings and conclusions constituted error. Nelson v. 30-2-712. "Cover" — buyer's procurement of substitute goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. This section provides the buyer with a remedy aimed at enabling him to obtain the goods he needs thus meeting his essential need. This remedy is the buyer's equivalent of the seller's right to resell.

2. The definition of "cover" under subsection (1) envisages a series of contracts or sales, as well as a single contract or sale; goods not identical with those involved but commercially usable as reasonable substitutes under the circumstances of the particular case; and contracts on credit or delivery terms differing from the contract in breach, but again reasonable under the circumstances. The test of proper cover is whether at the time and place the buyer acted in good faith and in a reasonable manner, and it is immaterial that hindsight may later prove that the method of cover used was not the cheapest or most effective.

The requirement that the buyer must cover "without unreasonable delay" is not intended to limit the time necessary for him to look around and decide as to how he may best effect cover. The test here is similar to that generally used in this Chapter as to reasonable time and seasonable action.

3. Subsection (3) expresses the policy that cover is not a mandatory remedy for the buyer. The buyer is always free to choose between cover and damages for non-delivery under the next section.

However, this subsection must be read in conjunction with the section which limits the recovery of consequential damages to such as could not have been obviated by cover. Moreover, the operation of the section on specific performance of contracts for "unique" goods must be considered in this connection for availability of the goods to the particular buyer for his particular needs is the test for that remedy and inability to cover is made an express condition to the right of the buyer to replevy the goods.

4. This section does not limit cover to merchants, in the first instance. It is the vital and important remedy for the consumer buyer as well. Both are free to use cover: the domestic or non-merchant consumer is required only to act in normal good faith while the merchant buyer must also observe all reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade, since this falls within the definition of good faith on his part.

Failure to Notify Grain Buyer of Intent to Breach Oral Agreement Within Reasonable Time — Oral Contract Enforceable: ConAgra, Inc. (ConAgra), contended that it had an oral telephone contract with Nierenberg to purchase 12,500 bushels of wheat and filed an action to recover losses incurred when Nierenberg sold the wheat to someone else, requiring ConAgra to purchase other wheat for resale at a higher price to fulfill its sale obligations pursuant to its purchase of Nierenberg's wheat. The District Court determined that Nierenberg was a merchant within the context of the Uniform Commercial Code and that, although both parties were merchants, the written sale confirmation received by Nierenberg 10 days after the telephone conversation was not within a reasonable time. Nierenberg never objected in writing to the written confirmation. The Supreme Court noted that the merchant exception in 30-2-201 does not dictate which party must send the written confirmation, but rather that in order to create an enforceable oral contract and avoid the signed writing requirement, one of the parties must send written confirmation to the other party. A farmer as well as a buyer may lock in an oral contract price as the market fluctuates up or down, and both parties equally possess the power to bind the other party. In this case, ConAgra did not immediately mail a written agreement, but instead waited about 6 days for Nierenberg to come to the elevator and sign the contract in person before mailing it. Although a court must look at the broad nature, purpose, and circumstances in determining whether written confirmation was received within a reasonable time, two specific factors may be examined: (1) the merchant's usual practice or policy following such transactions; and (2) the merchant's excuse for not following its practice or policy. The slight delay in Nierenberg's receipt of the confirmation because of an apparent misunderstanding was not seen as an unreasonable deviation from ConAgra's usual practices under the circumstances. However, Nierenberg chose to simply not honor his contractual obligation without notifying ConAgra of his true intentions. Nierenberg's mistake was to act outside of accepted commercial grain sales practices and not give ConAgra prompt notice of his breach so that his obligation for expectancy damages would be fixed. The written confirmation became an enforceable binding contract when Nierenberg failed to respond in writing with his objections within the stated 10-day period. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's finding that the oral agreement could not be enforced. ConAgra, Inc. v. Nierenberg, 2000 MT 213, 301 M 55, 7 P3d 369, 57 St. Rep. 842 (2000).

Summary Judgment That Plaintiff Not Entitled to Damages Upheld: Lewis entered into a contract to log the timber on property of the Nine Mile Mines. Nine Mile learned that Lewis was staking mining claims on adjacent property and, pursuant to a noninterference clause in the contract, refused to let Lewis on its property to log the timber. Lewis filed suit for damages due to the cancellation, and Nine Mile moved for summary judgment on the issue of damages. The Supreme Court held that the contract was subject to U.C.C. provisions and that Lewis was not entitled to damages because he had failed to cover by purchasing substitute goods and because he relied only on his own speculative testimony to prove that he could not reasonably have procured cover and therefore had not raised any genuine issue of material fact. Lewis v. Nine Mile Mines, Inc., 268 M 336, 886 P2d 912, 51 St. Rep. 1283 (1994).

Damages Based on Cost to Replace Undelivered Grain: Defendants orally agreed to sell 6,500 bushels of wheat to Columbia Grain International (Columbia Grain), a Great Falls grain elevator, at $4.05 a bushel. Relying on the oral agreement, Columbia Grain sold the wheat in open market. When defendants refused to deliver the wheat, Columbia Grain purchased wheat from another seller for $4.68 a bushel. In an action to recover damages for breach of contract, the District Court awarded Columbia Grain the difference between the contract price of $4.05 and the replacement price of $4.68. On appeal, defendants claimed that the District Court erred in recognizing the existence of a contract, in failing to apply the statute of frauds defense, and in calculating damages. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that an oral contract existed based on the parties' prior course of dealings and general industry practices and that defendants had waived their right to rely on the statute of frauds defense by not affirmatively pleading the defense. Damages are properly based on the cost of Columbia Grain to cover the undelivered grain. Columbia Grain Int'l v. Cereck, 258 M 414, 852 P2d 676, 50 St. Rep. 591 (1993).

30-2-713. Buyer's damages for nondelivery or repudiation.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 67(3), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes: To clarify the former rule so that:

1. The general baseline adopted in this section uses as a yardstick the market in which the buyer would have obtained cover had he sought that relief. So the place for measuring damages is the place of tender (or the place of arrival if the goods are rejected or their acceptance is revoked after reaching their destination) and the crucial time is the time at which the buyer learns of the breach.

2. The market or current price to be used in comparison with the contract price under this section is the price for goods of the same kind and in the same branch of trade.

3. When the current market price under this section is difficult to prove the section on determination and proof of market price is available to permit a showing of a comparable market price or, where no market price is available, evidence of spot sale prices is proper. Where the unavailability of a market price is caused by a scarcity of goods of the type involved, a good case is normally made for specific performance under this Chapter. Such scarcity conditions, moreover, indicate that the price has risen and under the section providing for liberal administration of remedies, opinion evidence as to the value of the goods would be admissible in the absence of a market price and a liberal construction of allowable consequential damages should also result.

4. This section carries forward the standard rule that the buyer must deduct from his damages any expenses saved as a result of the breach.

5. The present section provides a remedy which is completely alternative to cover under the preceding section and applies only when and to the extent that the buyer has not covered.

Case Notes

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

Buyer's Right to Rely on Contract — Damages for Breach: The seller argued on appeal from a verdict for the purchaser in a breach of contract action that the buyer's complaint sought damages due to the buyer's detrimental reliance upon the contract, in that the buyer had obligated himself to resell the calves, which obligation the buyer then was unable to fulfill and for which the buyer was liable. The seller argued that, based upon the buyer's own pleadings, the buyer could not recover because he could not detrimentally rely on the contract; the seller had warned him he could not fulfill the contract. The Supreme Court said that argument was beside the point. Damages were determined ultimately on the simple basis of difference between market prices on the date of delivery and the date of execution, as provided by 30-2-713. Although the trial court's method of resolving damages did not conform precisely with the buyer's complaint, the action was proper. Under former Rule 8(f), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), pleadings are to be construed to do substantial justice. The real purpose of the claim as a whole was to be considered and honored. Here the purpose and spirit behind the complaint were recovery for breach of contract, and damages based upon the changes in the market were within the scope of the complaint. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Determination of Damages — Resale Contract Not Germane: The seller argued on appeal in a breach of contract action that the buyer never purchased the replacement calves that had been discussed in order to fulfill his contract for resale of the seller's calves to a feeder. As a consequence, he contended the failure to mitigate damages should have been taken into consideration. But damages, the Supreme Court said, were calculated on the basis of change in market price alone, pursuant to 30-2-713. The buyer's capacity to fulfill his own contract for resale was not an issue here. Accordingly, the trial court was upheld. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

30-2-714. Buyer's damages for breach in regard to accepted goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 69(6) and (7), Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section deals with the remedies available to the buyer after the goods have been accepted and the time for revocation of acceptance has gone by. In general this section adopts the rule of the prior uniform statutory provision for measuring damages where there has been a breach of warranty as to goods accepted, but goes further to lay down an explicit provision as to the time and place for determining the loss.

The section on deduction of damages from price provides an additional remedy for a buyer who still owes part of the purchase price, and frequently the two remedies will be available concurrently. The buyer's failure to notify of his claim under the section on effects of acceptance, however, operates to bar his remedies under either that section or the present section.

2. The "non-conformity" referred to in subsection (1) includes not only breaches of warranties but also any failure of the seller to perform according to his obligations under the contract. In the case of such non-conformity, the buyer is permitted to recover for his loss "in any manner which is reasonable."

3. Subsection (2) describes the usual, standard and reasonable method of ascertaining damages in the case of breach of warranty but it is not intended as an exclusive measure. It departs from the measure of damages for non-delivery in utilizing the place of acceptance rather than the place of tender. In some cases the two may coincide, as where the buyer signifies his acceptance upon the tender. If, however, the non-conformity is such as would justify revocation of acceptance, the time and place of acceptance under this section is determined as of the buyer's decision not to revoke.

4. The incidental and consequential damages referred to in subsection (3), which will usually accompany an action brought under this section, are discussed in detail in the comment on the next section.

Case Notes

Jury Instruction Based on Statute Inapplicable: The trial court correctly refused to advise the jury on what damages a buyer may recover for nonconforming goods because there was no claim that the goods, in this case telephone systems, were inadequate. Rather, the claim was that the seller made untrue oral representations regarding distribution of the systems, installation and repair of the systems, refunds for unsold systems, and documentation and information permitting the telephone systems to be connected to telephone company lines. Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Finding of Fact Inconsistent With Conclusions of Law: The lower court found that defendant allowed plaintiff to take a silage chopper on a "tryout" basis to determine whether the rpm requirements of the chopper were compatible with plaintiff's tractor power takeoff capacity. The Supreme Court held it was inconsistent for the lower court to proceed from that finding and conclude, as a matter of law, that defendant was liable based on breach of implied warranty of fitness, negligent misrepresentation, and constructive fraud. As to liability for breach of warranty, the claim would lie only after acceptance of goods. In this case, a finding of taking goods on a "tryout" basis was contradictory to the acceptance requirement. Because acceptance was critical to the outcome of that cause of action and the other causes of action, the conflicting findings and conclusions constituted error. Nelson v. Davis Modern Mach., 220 M 347, 715 P2d 1052, 43 St. Rep. 423 (1986).

Acceptance of Nonconforming Goods — Recovery of Damages Not Precluded — Notice: Respondent Meland received building materials on July 7, 1981. About 10 days later, he began assembling the building and discovered that the materials did not conform to the contract terms, at which time he immediately notified appellant Intermountain of the problem. He then proceeded with construction, using the component parts to produce a building height he desired. Under 30-2-606(1)(c), acceptance of goods occurs when the buyer does any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership. Meland's use of the delivered goods to construct a building was inconsistent with Intermountain's ownership and constituted acceptance. Intermountain argued that once there is acceptance no damages may be had. The Supreme Court ruled that under 30-2-607(2) acceptance precludes rejection of the goods or revocation if made with the knowledge of the nonconformity unless there is a reasonable assumption that the nonconformity may be reasonably cured, but does not preclude recovery for damages due. When a buyer has accepted goods and given notification, he may recover damages for any nonconformity under 30-2-714(1). Section 30-2-607(3) requires that the buyer must notify the seller within a reasonable time after he discovers any breach. In this case, notice was sufficient and the award of damages was affirmed. Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

No Award of Attorney Fees Absent Statutory or Contract Provisions: Under 30-1-106, remedies under the U.C.C. shall be liberally administered to the end that the aggrieved party may be put in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed, but neither consequential, special, nor penal damages may be had except as specifically provided in the U.C.C. or by other rule of law. Although 30-2-714 allows recovery of incidental and consequential damages when accepted goods are in issue, the definitions of incidental and consequential damages contained in 30-2-715 do not include the award of attorney fees. In this case, the District Court awarded damages for delivery of nonconforming goods, plus attorney fees. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of damages but reversed the award of attorney fees as costs or damages absent any statutory or contract provisions, citing Martin v. Crown Life Ins. Co., 202 M 461, 658 P2d 1099 (1983). Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Reliance on Expertise — Implied Warranty of Fitness for Particular Purpose: Defendant relied on plaintiff's expertise to select an affordable fire alarm system that would provide reliable protection for the hotel's property and guests. Where the seller is aware that the buyer is relying upon the seller's judgment to select suitable goods, an implied warranty that the goods are fit for that particular purpose is created. The system installed was complicated, difficult to use, and frequently malfunctioned. Defendant advised plaintiff of the failure of the system after a fire in the snack bar, which was prior to the fire in a guest room that eventually resulted in this action. Plaintiff's own records showed repeated notifications of problems with the system. This was reasonable notice under 30-2-607(3). The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose was breached, and defendant was entitled to recover loss in value of the goods plus consequential and incidental damages. Fire Supply & Serv., Inc. v. Chico Hot Springs, 196 M 435, 639 P2d 1160, 39 St. Rep. 231 (1982).

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Breach of Casket Warranty — Mental Suffering: A contract for the sale of a casket is one of those rare contracts which could give rise to a cause of action for liability based on mental suffering alone and the seller's warranty of casket seal can be recovered upon by members of the family of the buyer. Hirst v. Elgin Metal Casket Co., 438 F. Supp. 906 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Subsection (2)(b)—Sections 69(7) and 70, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Subsection (1) is intended to provide reimbursement for the buyer who incurs reasonable expenses in connection with the handling of rightfully rejected goods or goods whose acceptance may be justifiably revoked, or in connection with effecting cover where the breach of the contract lies in non-conformity or non-delivery of the goods. The incidental damages listed are not intended to be exhaustive but are merely illustrative of the typical kinds of incidental damage.

2. Subsection (2) operates to allow the buyer, in an appropriate case, any consequential damages which are the result of the seller's breach. The "tacit agreement" test for the recovery of consequential damages is rejected. Although the older rule at common law which made the seller liable for all consequential damages of which he had "reason to know" in advance is followed, the liberality of that rule is modified by refusing to permit recovery unless the buyer could not reasonably have prevented the loss by cover or otherwise. Subparagraph (2) carries forward the provisions of the prior uniform statutory provision as to consequential damages resulting from breach of warranty, but modifies the rule by requiring first that the buyer attempt to minimize his damages in good faith, either by cover or otherwise.

3. In the absence of excuse under the section on merchant's excuse by failure of presupposed conditions, the seller is liable for consequential damages in all cases where he had reason to know of the buyer's general or particular requirements at the time of contracting. It is not necessary that there be a conscious acceptance of an insurer's liability on the seller's part, nor is his obligation for consequential damages limited to cases in which he fails to use due effort in good faith.

Particular needs of the buyer must generally be made known to the seller while general needs must rarely be made known to charge the seller with knowledge.

Any seller who does not wish to take the risk of consequential damages has available the section on contractual limitation of remedy.

4. The burden of proving the extent of loss incurred by way of consequential damage is on the buyer, but the section on liberal administration of remedies rejects any doctrine of certainty which requires almost mathematical precision in the proof of loss. Loss may be determined in any manner which is reasonable under the circumstances.

5. Subsection (2)(b) states the usual rule as to breach of warranty, allowing recovery for injuries "proximately" resulting from the breach. Where the injury involved follows the use of goods without discovery of the defect causing the damage, the question of "proximate" cause turns on whether it was reasonable for the buyer to use the goods without such inspection as would have revealed the defects. If it was not reasonable for him to do so, or if he did in fact discover the defect prior to his use, the injury would not proximately result from the breach of warranty.

6. In the case of sale of wares to one in the business of reselling them, resale is one of the requirements of which the seller has reason to know within the meaning of subsection (2)(a).

Case Notes

Foreseeability Not Required in Breach of Contract Action Under Uniform Commercial Code When Injury Results From Breach of Warranty: A breach of contract action under the Uniform Commercial Code does not require foreseeability if injury to person or property proximately results from any breach of warranty. Rothing v. Kallestad, 2007 MT 109, 337 M 193, 159 P3d 222 (2007).

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

Summary Judgment That Plaintiff Not Entitled to Damages Upheld: Lewis entered into a contract to log the timber on property of the Nine Mile Mines. Nine Mile learned that Lewis was staking mining claims on adjacent property and, pursuant to a noninterference clause in the contract, refused to let Lewis on its property to log the timber. Lewis filed suit for damages due to the cancellation, and Nine Mile moved for summary judgment on the issue of damages. The Supreme Court held that the contract was subject to U.C.C. provisions and that Lewis was not entitled to damages because he had failed to cover by purchasing substitute goods and because he relied only on his own speculative testimony to prove that he could not reasonably have procured cover and therefore had not raised any genuine issue of material fact. Lewis v. Nine Mile Mines, Inc., 268 M 336, 886 P2d 912, 51 St. Rep. 1283 (1994).

Doctrine of Avoidable Consequences — Prudent Person Standard: In determining whether consequential damages resulting from a seller's breach of warranty were justified, the Supreme Court cited Harrington v. Holiday Rambler Corp., 176 M 37, 575 P2d 578 (1978), regarding the doctrine of avoidable consequences, stating that the "duty to reduce or mitigate damages is a positive one upon the injured person, but it has limits". The test is what an ordinary prudent person would be expected to do, if capable, under the circumstances. Melotz v. Scheckla, 245 M 327, 801 P2d 593, 47 St. Rep. 2165 (1990).

No Award of Attorney Fees Absent Statutory or Contract Provisions: Under 30-1-106, remedies under the U.C.C. shall be liberally administered to the end that the aggrieved party may be put in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed, but neither consequential, special, nor penal damages may be had except as specifically provided in the U.C.C. or by other rule of law. Although 30-2-714 allows recovery of incidental and consequential damages when accepted goods are in issue, the definitions of incidental and consequential damages contained in 30-2-715 do not include the award of attorney fees. In this case, the District Court awarded damages for delivery of nonconforming goods, plus attorney fees. The Supreme Court affirmed the award of damages but reversed the award of attorney fees as costs or damages absent any statutory or contract provisions, citing Martin v. Crown Life Ins. Co., 202 M 461, 658 P2d 1099 (1983). Meland v. Intermtn. Sys., Inc., 219 M 242, 712 P2d 1295, 42 St. Rep. 1987 (1985).

Breach of Casket Warranty — Mental Suffering: A contract for the sale of a casket is one of those rare contracts which could give rise to a cause of action for liability based on mental suffering alone and the seller's warranty of casket seal can be recovered upon by members of the family of the buyer. Hirst v. Elgin Metal Casket Co., 438 F. Supp. 906 (D.C. Mont. 1977).

Consequential Damages — Defective Semen for Cattle Breeding: Consequential damages are those that ordinarily follow the breach of a contract in the usual course of events or that reasonable men would have foreseen as a probable result of the breach, and thus in the case of defective semen sold for artificial insemination, the loss of a calf crop would be reasonably foreseeable, but the loss of a second calf crop which might have been produced by the unborn calf crop is not reasonably foreseeable. Baden v. Curtiss Breeding Serv., 380 F. Supp. 243 (D. C. Mont. 1974).

30-2-716. Buyer's right to specific performance or recovery of goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 68, Uniform Sales Act.

Changes: Rephrased.

Purposes of Changes: To make it clear that:

1. The present section continues in general prior policy as to specific performance and injunction against breach. However, without intending to impair in any way the exercise of the court's sound discretion in the matter, this Chapter seeks to further a more liberal attitude than some courts have shown in connection with the specific performance of contracts of sale.

2. In view of this Chapter's emphasis on the commercial feasibility of replacement, a new concept of what are "unique" goods is introduced under this section. Specific performance is no longer limited to goods which are already specific or ascertained at the time of contracting. The test of uniqueness under this section must be made in terms of the total situation which characterizes the contract. Output and requirements contracts involving a particular or peculiarly available source or market present today the typical commercial specific performance situation, as contrasted with contracts for the sale of heirlooms or priceless works of art which were usually involved in the older cases. However, uniqueness is not the sole basis of the remedy under this section for the relief may also be granted "in other proper circumstances" and inability to cover is strong evidence of "other proper circumstances".

3. The legal remedy of replevin is given to the buyer in cases in which cover is reasonably unavailable and goods have been identified to the contract. This is in addition to the buyer's right to recover identified goods under Section 30-2-502. For consumer goods, the buyer's right to replevin vests upon the buyer's acquisition of a special property, which occurs upon identification of the goods to the contract. See Section 30-2-501. Inasmuch as a secured party normally acquires no greater rights in its collateral that its debtor had or had power to convey, see Section 30-2-403(1) (first sentence), a buyer who acquires a right of replevin under subsection (3) will take free of a security interest created by the seller if it attaches to the goods after the goods have been identified to the contract. The buyer will take free, even if the buyer does not buy in ordinary course and even if the security interest is perfected. Of course, to the extent that the buyer pays the price after the security interest attaches, the payments will constitute proceeds of the security interest.

4. This section is intended to give the buyer rights to the goods comparable to the seller's rights to the price.

5. If a negotiable document of title is outstanding, the buyer's right of replevin relates of course to the document not directly to the goods. See Chapter 7, especially Section 30-7-602.

30-2-717. Deduction of damages from the price.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Section 69(1) (a), Uniform Sales Act.

Purposes:

1. This section permits the buyer to deduct from the price damages resulting from any breach by the seller and does not limit the relief to cases of breach of warranty as did the prior uniform statutory provision. To bring this provision into application the breach involved must be of the same contract under which the price in question is claimed to have been earned.

2. The buyer, however, must give notice of his intention to withhold all or part of the price if he wishes to avoid a default within the meaning of the section on insecurity and right to assurances. In conformity with the general policies of this Chapter, no formality of notice is required and any language which reasonably indicates the buyer's reason for holding up his payment is sufficient.

Case Notes

Modular Home — Applicable Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of Title 30, ch. 11, part 2, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

30-2-718. Liquidation or limitation of damages — deposits.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Under subsection (1) liquidated damage clauses are allowed where the amount involved is reasonable in the light of the circumstances of the case. The subsection sets forth explicitly the elements to be considered in determining the reasonableness of a liquidated damage clause. A term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages is expressly made void as a penalty. An unreasonably small amount would be subject to similar criticism and might be stricken under the section on unconscionable contracts or clauses.

2. Subsection (2) refuses to recognize a forfeiture unless the amount of the payment so forfeited represents a reasonable liquidation of damages as determined under subsection (1). A special exception is made in the case of small amounts (20% of the price or $500, whichever is smaller) deposited as security. No distinction is made between cases in which the payment is to be applied on the price and those in which it is intended as security for performance. Subsection (2) is applicable to any deposit or down or part payment. In the case of a deposit or turn in of goods resold before the breach, the amount actually received on the resale is to be viewed as the deposit rather than the amount allowed the buyer for the trade in. However, if the seller knows of the breach prior to the resale of the goods turned in, he must make reasonable efforts to realize their true value, and this is assured by requiring him to comply with the conditions laid down in the section on resale by an aggrieved seller.

30-2-719. Contractual modification or limitation of remedy.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. Under this section parties are left free to shape their remedies to their particular requirements and reasonable agreements limiting or modifying remedies are to be given effect.

However, it is of the very essence of a sales contract that at least minimum adequate remedies be available. If the parties intend to conclude a contract for sale within this Chapter they must accept the legal consequence that there be at least a fair quantum of remedy for breach of the obligations or duties outlined in the contract. Thus any clause purporting to modify or limit the remedial provisions of this Chapter in an unconscionable manner is subject to deletion and in that event the remedies made available by this Chapter are applicable as if the stricken clause had never existed. Similarly, under subsection (2), where an apparently fair and reasonable clause because of circumstances fails in its purpose or operates to deprive either party of the substantial value of the bargain, it must give way to the general remedy provisions of this Chapter.

2. Subsection (1)(b) creates a presumption that clauses prescribing remedies are cumulative rather than exclusive. If the parties intend the term to describe the sole remedy under the contract, this must be clearly expressed.

3. Subsection (3) recognizes the validity of clauses limiting or excluding consequential damages but makes it clear that they may not operate in an unconscionable manner. Actually such terms are merely an allocation of unknown or undeterminable risks. The seller in all cases is free to disclaim warranties in the manner provided in Section 30-2-316.

Case Notes

Other Remedies Available When Not Limited by Parties: Vendees leased a printing press from the vendor under a lease agreement that contained an option to purchase for a small sum at the end of the lease agreement. On appeal, the agreement was considered a sales contract and thus subject to the sales provisions of the U.C.C. Although a disclaimer in the contract deprived the vendees/lessees from asserting a defense based on breach of implied warranties, the clause did not attempt to deprive them of all remedies available under the U.C.C. The parties did not further limit or modify the remedies available to either party upon breach under this section; therefore, under 30-2-601 and 30-2-602, the vendees still possessed the right to reject the printing press, provided the rejection was timely and proper. Beneficial Commercial Corp. v. Cottrell, 212 M 493, 688 P2d 1254, 41 St. Rep. 1888 (1984).

When Limitation of Remedies Permissible — Equipment Sales — Factors: In a case stemming from an accident involving a hay baler, one issue on appeal was the limitation of remedies. Although limitation of damages for personal injuries in the case of consumer goods is prima facie unconscionable under 30-2-719, farm equipment is defined as "equipment". The limitation of remedy provisions could as a matter of law be found unconscionable. Accordingly, the court ordered an evidentiary hearing on the remedy limitations. Factors under 30-2-302 were to be considered at the hearing. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Effect of "As Is" Clause in Used Car Sales Agreement: When defendant failed to inspect a car for defects before sale to plaintiff and the defect that was the proximate cause of plaintiff's accident and subsequent injuries would have been discovered in a reasonable safety inspection, defendant should not be allowed to hide behind the cloak of a simple "as is" disclaimer. Public policy requires a used car dealer to inspect the cars he sells and to make sure they are in safe, working condition. Kopischke v. First Cont. Corp., 187 M 471, 610 P2d 668 (1980).

Disclaimer Received After Sale Ineffective: A disclaimer or limitation of warranty contained in a manufacturer's manual received by the purchasers subsequent to the sale does not limit recovery for implied or express warranties made prior to or at the time of the sale. Whitaker v. Farmhand, Inc., 173 M 345, 567 P2d 916 (1977), followed in Vandalia Ranch, Inc. v. Farmers Union Oil & Supply Co., 221 M 253, 718 P2d 647, 43 St. Rep. 790 (1986).

Limitation of Damages: Clause in telephone company contract for "yellow pages" advertising, limiting liability for errors and omissions in advertising was a valid and binding limitation rather than a contract fixing damages. State ex rel. Mtn. St. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. District Court, 160 M 443, 503 P2d 526 (1972).

30-2-720. Effect of "cancellation" or "rescission" on claims for antecedent breach.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

This section is designed to safeguard a person holding a right of action from any unintentional loss of rights by the ill-advised use of such terms as "cancellation", "rescission", or the like. Once a party's rights have accrued they are not to be lightly impaired by concessions made in business decency and without intention to forego them. Therefore, unless the cancellation of a contract expressly declares that it is "without reservation of rights", or the like, it cannot be considered to be a renunciation under this section.

30-2-721. Remedies for fraud.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To correct the situation by which remedies for fraud have been more circumscribed than the more modern and mercantile remedies for breach of warranty. Thus the remedies for fraud are extended by this section to coincide in scope with those for non-fraudulent breach. This section thus makes it clear that neither rescission of the contract for fraud nor rejection of the goods bars other remedies unless the circumstances of the case make the remedies incompatible.

30-2-722. Who can sue third parties for injury to goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To adopt and extend somewhat the principle of the statutes which provide for suit by the real party in interest. The provisions of this section apply only after identification of the goods. Prior to that time only the seller has a right of action. During the period between identification and final acceptance (except in the case of revocation of acceptance) it is possible for both parties to have the right of action. Even after final acceptance both parties may have the right of action if the seller retains possession or otherwise retains an interest.

30-2-723. Proof of market price — time and place.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To eliminate the most obvious difficulties arising in connection with the determination of market price, when that is stipulated as a measure of damages by some provision of this Chapter. Where the appropriate market price is not readily available the court is here granted reasonable leeway in receiving evidence of prices current in other comparable markets or at other times comparable to the one in question. In accordance with the general principle of this Chapter against surprise, however, a party intending to offer evidence of such a substitute price must give suitable notice to the other party.

This section is not intended to exclude the use of any other reasonable method of determining market price or of measuring damages if the circumstances of the case make this necessary.

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

30-2-724. Admissibility of market quotations.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To make market quotations admissible in evidence while providing for a challenge of the material by showing the circumstances of its preparation.

No explicit provision as to the weight to be given to market quotations is contained in this section, but such quotations, in the absence of compelling challenge, offer an adequate basis for a verdict.

Market quotations are made admissible when the price or value of goods traded "in any established market" is in issue. The reason of the section does not require that the market be closely organized in the manner of a produce exchange. It is sufficient if transactions in the commodity are frequent and open enough to make a market established by usage in which one price can be expected to affect another and in which an informed report of the range and trend of prices can be assumed to be reasonably accurate.

This section does not in any way intend to limit or negate the application of similar rules of admissibility to other material, whether by action of the courts or by statute. The purpose of the present section is to assure a minimum of mercantile administration in this important situation and not to limit any liberalizing trend in modern law.

30-2-725. Statute of limitations in contracts for sale.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes: To introduce a uniform statute of limitations for sales contracts, thus eliminating the jurisdictional variations and providing needed relief for concerns doing business on a nationwide scale whose contracts have heretofore been governed by several different periods of limitation depending upon the state in which the transaction occurred. This Chapter takes sales contracts out of the general laws limiting the time for commencing contractual actions and selects a four year period as the most appropriate to modern business practice. This is within the normal commercial record keeping period.

Subsection (1) permits the parties to reduce the period of limitation. The minimum period is set at one year. The parties may not, however, extend the statutory period.

Subsection (2), providing that the cause of action accrues when the breach occurs, states an exception where the warranty extends to future performance.

Subsection (3) states the saving provision included in many state statutes and permits an additional short period for bringing new actions, where suits begun within the four year period have been terminated so as to leave a remedy still available for the same breach.

Subsection (4) makes it clear that this Chapter does not purport to alter or modify in any respect the law on tolling of the Statute of Limitations as it now prevails in the various jurisdictions.

Case Notes

Statute of Limitations Applicable to Contract for Sale of Wheat: The appropriate statute of limitations applicable to a proceeding concerning an alleged contract for the sale of wheat is the 4-year period provided for in this section that specifically applies to contracts for the sale of goods, rather than the general statute of limitations contained in 27-2-202 covering actions on contracts. Mogan v. Cargill, Inc., 259 M 400, 856 P2d 973, 50 St. Rep. 851 (1993).

Lack of Contract — Breach of Warranty Sounded in Tort Rather Than Contract: Plaintiff was injured in 1979 while spraying weeds. He brought suit in 1984 against the producers, distributors, and sellers of the herbicide and spraying equipment, claiming counts in strict liability in tort, tortious misrepresentation, negligence, and contract for breach of sellers' warranty. Plaintiff had no direct written contract with any of the defendants. The District Court found that there was no contract from which to imply the warranties which plaintiff claimed were breached. The court reasoned that without a contract the breach of warranty claims sounded in tort rather than contract; therefore, the warranty claims were barred by the 3-year tort Statute of Limitations. On appeal, plaintiff contended that one of the longer contract Statutes of Limitations in 27-2-202 or 30-2-725 should apply. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the implied covenants of good faith and fair dealing, fitness for a particular purpose, merchantability, and workmanlike performance are imposed by law regardless of contract and that, absent a contract, breach of the implied covenants sounds in tort, not contract. The District Court judgment was affirmed. Bennett v. Dow Chem. Co., 220 M 117, 713 P2d 992, 43 St. Rep. 221 (1986).

Motion In Limine — Irrelevant Evidence on Statute of Limitations and Release Properly Excluded: Where the plaintiff brought a third-party action against the defendant for breach of a warranty of performance of certain air pollution control equipment, the District Court properly granted the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's release from liability signed by the plaintiff in the original action and evidence that the date of delivery of the equipment was the starting time of the running of the Statute of Limitations. While the defendant argues that this evidence shows a lack of any real liability to the plaintiff in the original action and therefore a lack of liability of the defendant, the evidence shows that the release had nothing to do with the issue of the warranty and that the evidence concerning the date of delivery was excluded as irrelevant because the trial court properly found that a cause of action for breach of warranty of performance began when the breach was discovered and not when the equipment was delivered. Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Warranty of Performance — Action Not Barred by Statute: Where the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for breach of warranty of certain air pollution control equipment sold to the plaintiff more than 4 years prior to the commencement of the action, the District Court did not err in ruling that the action was not foreclosed by the Statute of Limitations. The warranty offered by the defendant was a warranty of performance, which contemplated operation of the equipment for at least as long as it would take to discover any breach. The District Court held that the statute ran from discovery of any breach, and this holding was correct. Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Breach of Contractual Warranties — Proper Parties — Statute of Frauds: Plaintiffs in an action for breach of express and implied warranties were farmers. Defendants manufactured farm implements. One of the plaintiffs had an arm severed in an accident involving the defendants' machinery. On appeal, the defendants argued that the injured plaintiff was not a party to the purchase contract. The plaintiff alleged the salesman knew that he and the party who actually signed the purchase order were to be co-owners of the hay baler in question. The signature was for the one co-owner for himself and as agent for the plaintiff as well. Because principal and agent law supplements the Montana U.C.C. which covers the purchase of the baler, the court considered applying 28-10-203, which prevents oral authorization to contract when the contract itself must be written, as here. It noted exceptions to the Statute of Frauds, however. The question of whether payment of the purchase price took this contract out of the Statute of Frauds was a genuine issue of material fact preventing a summary judgment for the defendants under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Holding the question one of law, the court said it had to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issues. Because the cause of action was based on breach of contractual warranties, this section rather than 27-2-204 was the applicable Statute of Limitations. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Laches and Statute of Limitations Adequately Pleaded: Plaintiffs' suit for rescission was barred by laches and their action for damages for breach of contract was barred by the 4-year Statute of Limitations. Since defendant's affirmative defenses revealed that plaintiffs had adequate notice of the defenses of laches and Statute of Limitations, although not specifically denominated as such, summary judgment was properly granted to defendants. Brabender v. Kit Mfg. Co., 174 M 63, 568 P2d 547 (1977).

Rationale for Codification:

There are several reasons for codifying the law with respect to leases of goods. An analysis of the case law as it applies to leases of goods suggests at least three significant issues to be resolved by codification. First, what is a lease? It is necessary to define lease to determine whether a transaction creates a lease or a security interest disguised as a lease. If the transaction creates a security interest disguised as a lease, the lessor will be required to file a financing statement or take other action to perfect its interest in the goods against third parties. There is no such requirement with respect to leases. Yet the distinction between a lease and a security interest disguised as a lease is not clear. Second, will the lessor be deemed to have made warranties to the lessee? If the transaction is a sale the express and implied warranties of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] of the Uniform Commercial Code apply. However, the warranty law with respect to leases is uncertain. Third, what remedies are available to the lessor upon the lessee's default? If the transaction is a security interest disguised as a lease, the answer is stated in Part 5 of the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]). There is no clear answer with respect to leases.

There are reasons to codify the law with respect to leases of goods in addition to those suggested by a review of the reported cases. The answer to this important question should not be limited to the issues raised in these cases. Is it not also proper to determine the remedies available to the lessee upon the lessor's default? It is, but that issue is not reached through a review of the reported cases. This is only one of the many issues presented in structuring, negotiating and documenting a lease of goods.

Statutory Analogue:

After it was decided to proceed with the codification project, the drafting committee of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws looked for a statutory analogue, gradually narrowing the focus to the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) and the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]). A review of the literature with respect to the sale of goods reveals that Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] is predicated upon certain assumptions: Parties to the sales transaction frequently are without counsel; the agreement of the parties often is oral or evidenced by scant writings; obligations between the parties are bilateral; applicable law is influenced by the need to preserve freedom of contract. A review of the literature with respect to personal property security law reveals that Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] is predicated upon very different assumptions: Parties to a secured transaction regularly are represented by counsel; the agreement of the parties frequently is reduced to a writing, extensive in scope; the obligations between the parties are essentially unilateral; and applicable law seriously limits freedom of contract.

The lease is closer in spirit and form to the sale of goods than to the creation of a security interest. While parties to a lease are sometimes represented by counsel and their agreement is often reduced to a writing, the obligations of the parties are bilateral and the common law of leasing is dominated by the need to preserve freedom of contract. Thus the drafting committee concluded that Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] was the appropriate statutory analogue.

Issues: The drafting committee then identified and resolved several issues critical to codification:

Scope: The scope of the Article was limited to leases (Section 2A-102 [30-2A-102]). There was no need to include leases intended as security, i.e., security interests disguised as leases, as they are adequately treated in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Further, even if leases intended as security were included, the need to preserve the distinction would remain, as policy suggests treatment significantly different from that accorded leases.

Definition of Lease: Lease was defined to exclude leases intended as security (Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]). Given the litigation to date a revised definition of security interest was suggested for inclusion in the Act. (Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]). This revision sharpens the distinction between leases and security interests disguised as leases.

Filing: The lessor was not required to file a financing statement against the lessee or take any other action to protect the lessor's interest in the goods (Section 2A-301 [30-2A-301]). The refined definition of security interest will more clearly signal the need to file to potential lessors of goods. Those lessors who are concerned will file a protective financing statement (Section 9-408 [30-9-408, now repealed]).

Warranties: All of the express and implied warranties of the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) were included (Sections 2A-210 through 2A-216 [30-2A-210 through 30-2A-216]), revised to reflect differences in lease transactions. The lease of goods is sufficiently similar to the sale of goods to justify this decision. Further, many courts have reached the same decision.

Certificate of Title Laws: Many leasing transactions involve goods subject to certificate of title statutes. To avoid conflict with those statutes, this Article is subject to them (Section 2A-104(1)(b) [30-2A-104(1)(b)]).

Consumer Leases: Many leasing transactions involve parties subject to consumer protection statutes. To avoid conflict with those statutes this Article is subject to them (Section 2A-104(1)(a) and (d) [30-2A-104(1)(a)]). Further, certain consumer protections have been incorporated in the Article.

Finance Leases: Certain leasing transactions substitute the seller of the goods for the lessor as the party responsible to the lessee with respect to warranties and the like. The definition of finance lease (Section 2A-103(1)(g) [30-2A-103(1)(g)]) was developed to describe these transactions. Various sections of the Article implement the substitution of the seller for the lessor, including Sections 2A-209 and 2A-407 [30-2A-209 and 30-2A-407]. No attempt was made to fashion a special rule where the finance lessor is an affiliate of the seller of goods; this is to be developed by the courts, case by case.

Sale and Leaseback: Sale and leaseback transactions are becoming increasingly common. A number of state statutes treat transactions where possession is retained by the seller as fraudulent per se or prima facie fraudulent. That position is not balanced and thus is changed by the Article "if the buyer bought for value and in good faith" (Section 2A-308(3) [30-2A-308(3)]).

Remedies: The Article has not only provided for lessor's remedies upon default by the lessee (Sections 2A-523 through 2A-531 [30-2A-523 through 30-2A-531]), but also for lessee's remedies upon default by the lessor (Sections 2A-508 through 2A-522 [30-2A-508 through 30-2A-522]). This is a significant departure from Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], which provides remedies only for the secured party upon default by the debtor. This difference is compelled by the bilateral nature of the obligations between the parties to a lease.

Damages: Many leasing transactions are predicated on the parties' ability to stipulate an appropriate measure of damages in the event of default. The rule with respect to sales of goods (Section 2-718 [30-2-718]) is not sufficiently flexible to accommodate this practice. Consistent with the common law emphasis upon freedom to contract, the Article has created a revised rule that allows greater flexibility with respect to leases of goods (Section 2A-504(1) [30-2A-504(1)]).

History:

This Article is a revision of the Uniform Personal Property Leasing Act, which was approved by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in August, 1985. However, it was believed that the subject matter of the Uniform Personal Property Leasing Act would be better treated as an article of this Act. Thus, although the Conference promulgated the Uniform Personal Property Leasing Act as a Uniform Law, activity was modest to allow time to restate the Uniform Personal Property Leasing Act as Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A].

In August, 1986 the Conference approved and recommended this Article (including conforming amendments to Article 1 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 1 and 9A]) for promulgation as an amendment to this Act. In December, 1986 the Council of the American Law Institute approved and recommended this Article (including conforming amendments to Article 1 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 1 and 9A]), with official comments, for promulgation as an amendment to this Act. In March, 1987 the Permanent Editorial Board for the Uniform Commercial Code approved and recommended this Article (including conforming amendments to Article 1 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 1 and 9A]), with official comments, for promulgation as an amendment to this Act. In May, 1987 the American Law Institute approved and recommended this Article (including conforming amendments to Article 1 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 1 and 9A]), with official comments, for promulgation as an amendment to this Act. In August, 1987 the Conference confirmed its approval of the final text of this Article.

Relationship of Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] to Other Articles:

The Article on Sales provided a useful point of reference for codifying the law of leases. Many of the provisions of that Article were carried over, changed to reflect differences in style, leasing terminology or leasing practices. Thus, the official comments to those sections of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] whose provisions were carried over are incorporated by reference in Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A], as well; further, any case law interpreting those provisions should be viewed as persuasive but not binding on a court when deciding a similar issue with respect to leases. Any change in the sequence that has been made when carrying over a provision from Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] should be viewed as a matter of style, not substance. This is not to suggest that in other instances Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] did not also incorporate substantially revised provisions of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2], Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] or otherwise where the revision was driven by a concern over the substance; but for the lack of a mandate, the drafting committee would have made the same or a similar change in the statutory analogue. Those sections in Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] include Sections 2A-104, 2A-105, 2A-106, 2A-108(2) and (4), 2A-109(2), 2A-208, 2A-214(2) and (3)(a), 2A-216, 2A-303, 2A-306, 2A-503, 2A-504(3)(b), 2A-506(2), and 2A-515 [30-2A-104 through 30-2A-106, 30-2A-108(2) and (4), 30-2A-109(2), 30-2A-208, 30-2A-214(2) and (3)(a), 30-2A-216, 30-2A-303, 30-2A-306, 30-2A-503, 30-2A-504(3)(b), 30-2A-506(2), and 30-2A-515]. For lack of relevance or significance not all of the provisions of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] were incorporated in Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A].

This codification was greatly influenced by the fundamental tenet of the common law as it has developed with respect to leases of goods: freedom of the parties to contract. Note that, like all other Articles of this Act, the principles of construction and interpretation contained in Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] are applicable throughout Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] (Section 2A-103(4) [30-2A-103(4)]). These principles include the ability of the parties to vary the effect of the provisions of Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A], subject to certain limitations including those that relate to the obligations of good faith, diligence, reasonableness and care (Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)]). Consistent with those principles no negative inference is to be drawn by the episodic use of the phrase "unless otherwise agreed" in certain provisions of Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A]. Section 1-102(4) [30-1-102(4)]. Indeed, the contrary is true, as the general rule in the Act, including this Article, is that the effect of the Act's provisions may be varied by agreement. Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)]. This conclusion follows even where the statutory analogue contains the phrase and the correlative provision in Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] does not.

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: This Article governs transactions as diverse as the lease of a hand tool to an individual for a few hours and the leveraged lease of a complex line of industrial equipment to a multi-national organization for a number of years.

To achieve that end it was necessary to provide that this Article applies to any transaction, regardless of form, that creates a lease. Since lease is defined as a transfer of an interest in goods (Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]) and goods is defined to include fixtures (Section 2A-103(1)(h) [30-2A-103(1)(h)]), application is limited to the extent the transaction relates to goods, including fixtures. Further, since the definition of lease does not include a sale (Section 2-106(1) [30-2-106(1)]) or retention or creation of a security interest (Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]), application is further limited; sales and security interests are governed by other Articles of this Act.

Finally, in recognition of the diversity of the transactions to be governed, the sophistication of many of the parties to these transactions, and the common law tradition as it applies to the bailment for hire or lease, freedom of contract has been preserved. DeKoven, Proceedings After Default by the Lessee Under a True Lease of Equipment, in 1C P. Coogan, W. Hogan, D. Vagts, Secured Transactions Under the Uniform Commercial Code, §29B.02[2] (1986). Thus, despite the extensive regulatory scheme established by this Article, the parties to a lease will be able to create private rules to govern their transaction. Sections 2A-103(4) [30-2A-103(4)] and 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)]. However, there are special rules in this Article governing consumer leases, as well as other state and federal statutes, that may further limit freedom of contract with respect to consumer leases.

A court may apply this Article by analogy to any transaction, regardless of form, that creates a lease of personal property other than goods, taking into account the expressed intentions of the parties to the transaction and any differences between a lease of goods and a lease of other property. Such application has precedent as the provisions of the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) have been applied by analogy to leases of goods. E.g., Hawkland, The Impact of the Uniform Commercial Code on Equipment Leasing, 1972 Ill. L.F. 446; Murray, Under the Spreading Analogy of Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] of the Uniform Commercial Code, 39 Fordham L.Rev. 447 (1971). Whether such application would be appropriate for other bailments of personal property, gratuitous or for hire, should be determined by the facts of each case. See Mieske v. Bartell Drug Co., 92 Wash.2d 40, 46-48, 593 P.2d 1308, 1312 (1979).

Further, parties to a transaction creating a lease of personal property other than goods, or a bailment of personal property may provide by agreement that this Article applies. Upholding the parties' choice is consistent with the spirit of this Article.

Sections 2A-106, 2A-108(2), 2A-108(4), 2A-109(2), 2A-221, 2A-309, 2A-406, 2A-407, 2A-504(3)(b), and 2A-516(3)(b) [30-2A-106, 30-2A-108(2) and (4), 30-2A-109(2), 30-2A-221, 30-2A-309, 30-2A-406, 30-2A-407, 30-2A-504(3)(b), and 30-2A-516(3)(b)].

For a transaction to qualify as a consumer lease it must first qualify as a lease. Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]. Note that this Article regulates the transactional elements of a lease, including a consumer lease; consumer protection statutes—present and future—are unaffected by this Article. Section 2A-104(1)(a) and (d) [30-2A-104(1)(a) and (1)(d)].

This definition is modeled after the definition of consumer lease in the Consumer Leasing Act, 15 U.S.C. §1667 (1982), and in the Unif. Consumer Credit Code §1.301(14), 7A U.L.A. 43 (1974). However, this definition of consumer lease differs from its models in several respects: the lessor can be a person regularly engaged either in the business of leasing or of selling goods, the lease need not be for a term exceeding four months, a lease primarily for an agricultural purpose is not covered and the limitation of $25,000 is not subject to adjustment as the Consumer Price Index changes.

This definition focuses on the parties as well as the transaction. If a lease is within this definition, the lessor must be regularly engaged in the business of leasing or selling, and the lessee must be an individual not an organization; note that a lease to two or more individuals having a common interest through marriage or the like should not be considered excluded as a lease to an organization under Section 1-201(28) [30-1-201(28)]. The lessee must take the interest primarily for a personal, family or household purpose. Further, total payments under the lease contract, excluding payments for options to renew or buy, cannot exceed $25,000.

(f) "Fault". Section 1-201(16) [30-1-201(16)].

(g) "Finance Lease". New. This Article includes a subset of rules that applies only to finance leases. Sections 2A-209, 2A-211(2), 2A-212(1), 2A-213, 2A-219(1), 2A-220(1)(a), 2A-221, 2A-405(c), 2A-407, 2A-516(2) and 2A-517(1)(a) [30-2A-209, 30-2A-211(2), 30-2A-212(1), 30-2A-213, 30-2A-219(1), 30-2A-220(1)(a), 30-2A-221, 30-2A-405(3), 30-2A-407, 30-2A-516(2), and 30-2A-517(1)(a)].

For a transaction to qualify as a finance lease it must first qualify as a lease. Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]. Unless the lessor is comfortable that the transaction will qualify as a finance lease, the lease agreement should include provisions giving the lessor the benefits created by the subset of rules applicable to the transaction that qualifies as a finance lease under this Article.

A finance lease is the product of a three party transaction. The supplier manufactures or supplies the goods pursuant to the lessee's specification, perhaps even pursuant to a purchase order, sales agreement or lease agreement between the supplier and the lessee. After the prospective finance lease is negotiated, a purchase order, sales agreement, or lease agreement is entered into by the lessor (as buyer or prime lessee) or an existing order, agreement or lease is assigned by the lessee to the lessor, and the lessor and the lessee then enter into a lease or sublease of the goods. Due to the limited function usually performed by the lessor, the lessee looks almost entirely to the supplier for representations, covenants and warranties. Yet, this definition does not restrict the lessor's function solely to the supply of funds; if the lessor undertakes or performs other functions, express warranties, covenants and the common law will protect the lessee.

This definition focuses on the transaction, not the status of the parties; to avoid confusion it is important to note that in other contexts, e.g., tax and accounting, the term finance lease has been used to connote different types of lease transactions, including leases that are disguised secured transactions. M. Rice, Equipment Financing, 62-71 (1981). A lessor who is a merchant with respect to goods of the kind subject to the lease may be a lessor under a finance lease. Many leases that are leases back to the seller of goods (Section 2A-308(3) [30-2A-308(3)]) will be finance leases. This conclusion is easily demonstrated by a hypothetical. Assume that B has bought goods from C pursuant to a sales contract. After delivery to and acceptance of the goods by B, B negotiates to sell the goods to A and simultaneously to lease the goods back from A, on terms and conditions that, we assume, will qualify the transaction as a lease. Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]. In documenting the sale and lease back, B assigns the original sales contract between B, as buyer, and C, as seller, to A. A review of these facts leads to the conclusion that the lease from A to B qualifies as a finance lease, as all three conditions of the definition are satisfied. Subparagraph (i) [subsection (1)(g)(i) of this section] is satisfied as A, the lessor, had nothing to do with the selection, manufacture, or supply of the equipment. Subparagraph (ii) [subsection (1)(g)(ii) of this section] is satisfied as A, the lessor, bought the equipment at the same time that A leased the equipment to B, which certainly is in connection with the lease. Finally, subparagraph (iii) [subsection (1)(g)(iii) of this section] is satisfied as A entered into the sales contract with B at the same time that A leased the equipment back to B. B, the lessee, will have received a copy of the sales contract in a timely fashion.

Subsection (i) [subsection (1)(g)(i) of this section] requires the lessor to remain outside the selection, manufacture and supply of the goods; that is the rationale for releasing the lessor from most of its traditional liability. The lessor is not prohibited from possession, maintenance or operation of the goods, as policy does not require such prohibition. To insure the lessee's reliance on the supplier, and not on the lessor, subsection (ii) [subsection (1)(g)(ii) of this section] requires that the goods (where the lessor is the buyer of the goods) or that the right to possession and use of the goods (where the lessor is the prime lessee and the sublessor of the goods) be acquired in connection with the lease (or sublease) to qualify as a finance lease. The scope of the phrase "in connection with" is to be developed by the courts, case by case. Finally, as the lessee generally relies almost entirely upon the supplier for representations, covenants and warranties with respect to the goods, subsection (iii) [subsection (1)(g)(iii) of this section] requires that the lessee receive a copy of the supply contract on or before signing the lease contract or that the lessee's approval of the supply contract is a condition to the effectiveness of the lease contract. Thus, even where oral supply orders or computer placed supply orders are compelled by custom and usage the transaction may still qualify as a finance lease if the lessee approves the supply contract before the lease contract is effective and such approval was a condition to the effectiveness of the lease contract.

If a transaction does not qualify as a finance lease, the parties may achieve the same result by agreement; no negative implications are to be drawn if the transaction does not qualify. Further, absent the application of special rules (fraud, duress, and the like), a lease that qualifies as a finance lease and is assigned by the lessor or the lessee to a third party does not lose its status as a finance lease under this Article. Finally, this Article creates no special rule where the lessor is an affiliate of the supplier; whether the transaction qualifies as a finance lease will be determined by the facts of each case.

(h) "Goods". Section 9-105(1)(h) [30-9-105(1)(h), now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. See Section 2A-103(3) [30-2A-103(3)] for reference to the definition of "Accounts", "Chattel paper", "Documents", "General intangibles" and "Instruments". See Section 2A-217 [30-2A-217] for determination of the time and manner of identification.

(i) "Installment lease contract". Section 2-612(1) [30-2-612(1)].

(j) "Lease". New. There are several reasons to codify the law with respect to leases of goods. An analysis of the case law as it applies to leases of goods suggests at least several significant issues to be resolved by codification. First and foremost is the definition of a lease. It is necessary to define lease to determine whether a transaction creates a lease or a security interest disguised as a lease. If the transaction creates a security interest disguised as a lease, the transaction will be governed by the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]) and the lessor will be required to file a financing statement or take other action to perfect its interest in the goods against third parties. There is no such requirement with respect to leases under the common law and, except with respect to leases of fixtures (Section 2A-309 [30-2A-309]), this Article imposes no such requirement. Yet the distinction between a lease and a security interest disguised as a lease is not clear from the case law at the time of the promulgation of this Article. DeKoven, Leases of Equipment: Puritan Leasing Company v. August, A Dangerous Decision, 12 U.S.F. L.Rev. 257 (1978).

At common law a lease of personal property is a bailment for hire. While there are several definitions of bailment for hire, all require a thing to be let and a price for the letting. Thus, in modern terms and as provided in this definition, a lease is created when the lessee agrees to furnish consideration for the right to the possession and use of goods over a specified period of time. Mooney, Personal Property Leasing: A Challenge, 36 Bus.Law. 1605, 1607 (1981). Further, a lease is neither a sale (Section 2-106(1) [30-2-106(1)]) nor a retention or creation of a security interest (Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]). Due to extensive litigation to distinguish true leases from security interests, an amendment to Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] has been promulgated with this Article to create a sharper distinction.

This section as well as Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] must be examined to determine whether the transaction in question creates a lease or a security interest. The following hypotheticals indicate the perimeters of the issue. Assume that A has purchased a number of copying machines, new, for $1,000 each; the machines have an estimated useful economic life of three years. A advertises that the machines are available to rent for a minimum of one month and that the monthly rental is $100.00. A intends to enter into leases where A provides all maintenance, without charge to the lessee. Further, the lessee will rent the machine, month to month, with no obligation to renew. At the end of the lease term the lessee will be obligated to return the machine to A's place of business. This transaction qualifies as a lease under the first half of the definition, for the transaction includes a transfer by A to a prospective lessee of possession and use of the machine for a stated term, month to month. The machines are goods (Section 2A-103(1)(h) [30-2A-103(1)(h)]). The lessee is obligated to pay consideration in return, $100.00 for each month of the term.

However, the second half of the definition provides that a sale or a security interest is not a lease. Since there is no passing of title, there is no sale. Sections 2A-103(3) and 2-106(1) [30-2A-103(3) and 30-2-106(1)]. Under pre-Act security law this transaction would have created a bailment for hire or a true lease and not a conditional sale. Da Rocha v. Macomber, 330 Mass. 611, 614-15, 116 N.E.2d 139, 142 (1953). Under Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)], as amended with the promulgation of this Article, the same result would follow. While the lessee is obligated to pay rent for the one month term of the lease, one of the other four conditions of the second paragraph of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] must be met and none is. The term of the lease is one month and the economic life of the machine is 36 months; thus, subparagraph (a) of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)(a)] is not now satisfied. Considering the amount of the monthly rent, absent economic duress or coercion, the lessee is not bound either to renew the lease for the remaining economic life of the goods or to become the owner. If the lessee did lease the machine for 36 months, the lessee would have paid the lessor $3,600 for a machine that could have been purchased for $1,000; thus, subparagraph (b) of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)(b)] is not satisfied. Finally, there are no options; thus, subparagraphs (c) and (d) of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)(c) and (37)(d)] are not satisfied. This transaction creates a lease, not a security interest. However, with each renewal of the lease the facts and circumstances at the time of each renewal must be examined to determine if that conclusion remains accurate, as it is possible that a transaction that first creates a lease, later creates a security interest.

Assume that the facts are changed and that A requires each lessee to lease the goods for 36 months, with no right to terminate. Under pre-Act security law this transaction would have created a conditional sale, and not a bailment for hire or true lease. Hervey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 93 U.S. 664, 672-73 (1876). Under this subsection, and Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)], as amended with the inclusion of this Article in the Act, the same result would follow. The lessee's obligation for the term is not subject to termination by the lessee and the term is equal to the economic life of the machine.

Between these extremes there are many transactions that can be created. Some of the transactions have not been properly categorized by the courts in applying the 1978 and earlier Official Texts of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. This subsection, together with Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)], as amended with the promulgation of this Article, draws a brighter line, which should create a clearer signal to the professional lessor and lessee.

(k) "Lease agreement". This definition is derived from the first sentence of Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3)]. Because the definition of lease is broad enough to cover future transfers, lease agreement includes an agreement contemplating a current or subsequent transfer. Thus it was not necessary to make an express reference to an agreement for the future lease of goods (Section 2-106(1) [30-2-106(1)]). This concept is also incorporated in the definition of lease contract. Note that the definition of lease does not include transactions in ordinary building materials that are incorporated into an improvement on land. Section 2A-309(2) [30-2A-309(2)].

The provisions of this Article, if applicable, determine whether a lease agreement has legal consequences; otherwise the law of bailments and other applicable law determine the same. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

(l) "Lease contract". This definition is derived from the definition of contract in Section 1-201(11) [30-1-201(11)]. Note that a lease contract may be for the future lease of goods, since this notion is included in the definition of lease.

(m) "Leasehold interest". New.

(n) "Lessee". New.

(o) "Lessee in ordinary course of business". Section 1-201(9) [sic. New.].

(p) "Lessor". New.

(q) "Lessor's residual interest". New.

(r) "Lien". New. This term is used in Section 2A-307 [30-2A-307] (Priority of Liens Arising by Attachment or Levy on, Security Interests in, and Other Claims to Goods).

(s) "Lot". Section 2-105(5) [30-2-105(5)].

(t) "Merchant lessee". New. This term is used in Section 2A-511 [30-2A-511] (Merchant Lessee's Duties as to Rightfully Rejected Goods). A person may satisfy the requirement of dealing in goods of the kind subject to the lease as lessor, lessee, seller, or buyer.

(u) "Present value". New. Authorities agree that present value should be used to determine fairly the damages payable by the lessor or the lessee on default. E.g., Taylor v. Commercial Credit Equip. Corp., 170 Ga.App. 322, 316 S.E.2d 788 (Ct.App.1984). Present value is defined to mean an amount that represents the discounted value as of a date certain of one or more sums payable in the future. This is a function of the economic principle that a dollar today is more valuable to the holder than a dollar payable in two years. While there is no question as to the principle, reasonable people would differ as to the rate of discount to apply in determining the value of that future dollar today. To minimize litigation, this Article allows the parties to specify the discount or interest rate, if the rate was not manifestly unreasonable at the time the transaction was entered into. In all other cases, the interest rate will be a commercially reasonable rate that takes into account the facts and circumstances of each case, as of the time the transaction was entered into.

(v) "Purchase". Section 1-201(32) [30-1-201(32)]. This definition omits the reference to lien contained in the definition of purchase in Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] (Section 1-201(32) [30-1-201(32)]). This should not be construed to exclude consensual liens from the definition of purchase in this Article; the exclusion was mandated by the scope of the definition of lien in Section 2A-103(1)(r) [30-2A-103(1)(r)]. Further, the definition of purchaser in this Article adds a reference to lease; as purchase is defined in Section 1-201(32) [30-2A-201(32)] to include any other voluntary transaction creating an interest in property, this addition is not substantive.

(w) "Sublease". New.

(x) "Supplier". New.

(y) "Supply contract". New.

(z) "Termination". Section 2-106(3) [30-2-106(3)].

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 575 in definition of buyer in ordinary course of business near middle of second sentence substituted "acquiring" for "receiving"; in definition of lessee at end substituted "sublease" for "sublessee"; in definition of lessee in ordinary course of business in second sentence substituted "acquiring" for "receiving"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 92, Ch. 575, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 in (3) in reference to "account" substituted "30-9-122(1)(b)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(b)) for "30-9-106", in reference to "chattel paper" substituted "30-9-122(1)(k)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(k)) for "30-9-105(1)(b)", in reference to "consumer goods" substituted "30-9-122(1)(w)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(w)) for "30-9-109(1)", in reference to "document" substituted "30-9-122(1)(dd)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(dd)) for "30-9-105(1)(f)", in reference to "general intangible" substituted "30-9-122(1)(pp)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(pp)) for "30-9-106", in reference to "instrument" substituted "30-9-122(1)(uu)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(uu)) for "30-9-105(1)(i)", and in reference to "mortgage" substituted "30-9-122(1)(ccc)" (renumbered 30-9A-102(1)(ccc)) for "30-9-105(1)(j)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Case Notes

Principal's Impairment or Suspension of Rights of Guarantor — Exoneration of Guarantor Proper: Ace Leasing, Inc. (Ace), funded a lease to O'Neill for $45,000 for business equipment. Boustead was guarantor of the lease agreement. If O'Neill failed to perform, the lease provided that Ace could proceed directly against Boustead. O'Neill failed to make timely payments. Ace canceled the lease. O'Neill and Ace then discussed the matter, and O'Neill explained that the late payments were the result of the late arrival of the ordered equipment. Ace agreed to accept several late payments, but Boustead was not part of the negotiations. O'Neill again missed several payments, and Ace requested that Boustead pay off the lease. Boustead refused to pay on grounds that the cancellation letter and acceptance of late payments without Boustead's knowledge, as well as the method of purchasing the equipment, constituted a material change in the agreement and in Boustead's obligations as guarantor. The District Court agreed and exonerated Boustead as guarantor under 28-11-211. The court also held that Boustead's risk was increased because Ace did not own the equipment, so the transaction between Ace and O'Neill constituted a loan rather than a lease. Ace appealed the findings regarding ownership and alteration of the agreement. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under 30-2-401, the title of goods passes to the buyer at the time that and place at which the seller completes performance with reference to physical delivery of the goods, unless the agreement provides otherwise. Here, neither Ace nor O'Neill conformed to the purchase provision of the agreement. Because Ace failed to obtain title, Ace could not assume the role of lessor and, while retaining title and ownership, transfer to O'Neill merely the right of possession and use of the equipment, so the transaction effectively became a loan agreement between the parties with O'Neill holding title to the equipment according to the default provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. Further, Ace's actions in accepting late payments after canceling the agreement and in failing to comply with the terms of the lease requiring Ace to purchase the equipment and retain ownership to secure its interest were a material alteration in the agreement as affecting Boustead. Ace impaired or suspended its rights and remedies against O'Neill and, without Boustead's consent, impaired or suspended Boustead's rights as well, which was sufficient to exonerate Boustead as guarantor under 28-11-211. Ace Leasing, Inc. v. Boustead, 2002 MT 213, 311 M 285, 55 P3d 371 (2002).

30-2A-104. Leases subject to other law.

Source: Section 2A-104, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Sections 9-203(4) and 9-302(3)(b) and (c)[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: This Article creates a comprehensive scheme for the regulation of transactions that create leases. Section 2A-102 [30-2A-102]. Thus, the Article supersedes all prior legislation dealing with leases, except to the extent set forth in this Section.

Subsection (1) states the general rule that a lease, although governed by the scheme of this Article, is also governed by certain other applicable statutes. This may occur in the case of a consumer lease. Section 2A-103(1)(e) [30-2A-103(1)(e)].

An illustration of a statute of the United States that governs consumer leases is the Consumer Leasing Act, 15 U.S.C. §§1667-1667(e) (1982) and its implementing regulation, Regulation M, 12 C.F.R. §§213 (1986); the statute mandates disclosures of certain lease terms, delimits the liability of a lessee in leasing personal property, and regulates the advertising of lease terms. An illustration of a state statute that governs consumer leases is the Unif. Consumer Credit Code, which includes many provisions similar to those of the Consumer Leasing Act, e.g., Unif. Consumer Credit Code §§3.202, 3.209, 3.401, 7A U.L.A. 108-09, 115, 125 (1974), as well as provisions in addition to those of the Consumer Leasing Act, e.g., Unif. Consumer Credit Code §§5.109-.111, 7A U.L.A. 171-76 (1974) (the right to cure a default). Such statutes may define consumer lease so as to govern transactions within and without the definition of consumer lease under this Article.

Under subsection (2), subject to certain limited exclusions, in case of conflict the provisions of such a statute prevail over the provisions of this Article. For example, a provision like Unif. Consumer Credit Code, §5.112, 7A U.L.A. 176 (1974), limiting self-help repossession, prevails over Section 2A-525(3) [30-2A-525(3)].

Consumer protection in lease transactions is primarily left to other law. However, several provisions of this Article do contain special rules that may not be varied by agreement in the case of a consumer lease. E.g., Sections 2A-106, 2A-108, and 2A-109(2) [30-2A-106, 30-2A-108, and 30-2A-109(2)]. Were that not so, the ability of the parties to govern their relationship by agreement together with the position of the lessor in a consumer lease too often could result in a one-sided lease agreement.

In construing this provision the reference to statute should be deemed to include applicable regulations.

30-2A-105. Territorial application of chapter to goods covered by certificate of title.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-105, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 9-103(2)(a) and (b)[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised. The provisions of the last sentence of Section 9-103(2)(b) [30-9-103(2)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-303] have not been incorporated as it is superfluous in this context. The provisions of Section 9-103(2)(d) [30-9-103(2)(d), now repealed, see 30-9A-337] have not been incorporated because the problems dealt with are adequately addressed by this section and Sections 2A-304(3) and 305(3) [30-2A-304(3) and 30-2A-305(3)].

Purposes: The new certificate referred to in (b) [subsection (2) of this section] must be permanent, not temporary. Generally, the lessor or creditor whose interest is indicated on the most recently issued certificate of title will prevail over interests indicated on certificates issued previously by other jurisdictions. This provision reflects a policy that it is reasonable to require holders of interests in goods covered by a certificate of title to police the goods or risk losing their interests when a new certificate of title is issued by another jurisdiction.

30-2A-106. Limitation on power of parties to consumer lease to choose applicable law and judicial forum.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-106, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Unif. Consumer Credit Code §1.201(8), 7A U.L.A. 36 (1974).

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: There is a real danger that a lessor may induce a consumer lessee to agree that the applicable law will be a jurisdiction that has little effective consumer protection, or to agree that the applicable forum will be a forum that is inconvenient for the lessee in the event of litigation. As a result, this section invalidates these choice of law or forum clauses, except where the law chosen is that of the state of the consumer's residence or where the goods will be kept, or the forum chosen is one that otherwise would have jurisdiction over the lessee.

Subsection (1) limits potentially abusive choice of law clauses in consumer leases. The 30-day rule in subsection (1) was suggested by Section 9-103(1)(c) [30-9-103(1)(c), now repealed]. This section has no effect on choice of law clauses in leases that are not consumer leases. Such clauses would be governed by other law.

Subsection (2) prevents enforcement of potentially abusive jurisdictional consent clauses in consumer leases. By using the term judicial forum, this section does not limit selection of a nonjudicial forum, such as arbitration. This section has no effect on choice of forum clauses in leases that are not consumer leases; such clauses are, as a matter of current law, "prima facie valid". The Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore, Co., 407 U.S. 1, 10 (1972). Such clauses would be governed by other law, including the Model Choice of Forum Act (1968).

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-107, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 1-107[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Revised to reflect leasing practices and terminology. This clause is used throughout the official comments to this Article to indicate the scope of change in the provisions of the Uniform Statutory Source included in the section; these changes range from one extreme, e.g., a significant difference in practice (a warranty as to merchantability is not implied in a finance lease (Section 2A-212 [30-2A-212])) to the other extreme, e.g., a modest difference in style or terminology (the transaction governed is a lease not a sale (Section 2A-203 [30-2A-203])).

30-2A-108. Unconscionability.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-108, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-302[, U.C.C.] and Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.108, 7A U.L.A. 167-69 (1974).

Changes: Subsection (1) is taken almost verbatim from the provisions of Section 2-302(1) [30-2-302(1)]. Subsection (2) is suggested by the provisions of Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.108(1), (2), 7A U.L.A. 167 (1974). Subsection (3), taken from the provisions of Section 2-302(2) [30-2-302(2)], has been expanded to cover unconscionable conduct. Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.108(3), 7A U.L.A. 167 (1974). The provision for the award of attorney's fees to consumers, subsection (4), covers unconscionability under subsection (1) as well as (2). Subsection (4) is modeled on the provisions of Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.108(6), 7A U.L.A. 169 (1974).

Purposes: Subsections (1) and (3) of this section apply the concept of unconscionability reflected in the provisions of Section 2-302 [30-2-302] to leases. See Dillman & Assocs. v. Capitol Leasing Co., 110 Ill.App.3d 335, 342, 442 N.E.2d 311, 316 (App.Ct.1982). Subsection (3) omits the adjective "commercial" found in subsection 2-302(2) [30-2-302(2)] because subsection (3) is concerned with all leases and the relevant standard of conduct is determined by the context.

The balance of the section is modeled on the provisions of Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.108, 7A U.L.A. 167-69 (1974). Thus subsection (2) recognizes that a consumer lease or a clause in a consumer lease may not itself be unconscionable but that the agreement would never have been entered into if unconscionable means had not been employed to induce the consumer to agree. To make a statement to induce the consumer to lease the goods, in the expectation of invoking an integration clause in the lease to exclude the statement's admissibility in a subsequent dispute, may be unconscionable. Subsection (2) also provides a consumer remedy for unconscionable conduct, such as using or threatening to use force or violence, in the collection of a claim arising from a lease contract. These provisions are not exclusive. The remedies of this section are in addition to remedies otherwise available for the same conduct under other law, for example, an action in tort for abusive debt collection or under another statute of this State for such conduct. The reference to appropriate relief in subsection (2) is intended to foster liberal administration of this remedy. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-106(1) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-106(1)].

Subsection (4) authorizes an award of reasonable attorney's fees if the court finds unconscionability with respect to a consumer lease under subsections (1) or (2). Provision is also made for recovery by the party against whom the claim was made if the court does not find unconscionability and does find that the consumer knew the action to be groundless. Further, subsection (4)(b) is independent of, and thus will not override, a term in the lease agreement that provides for the payment of attorney's fees.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 1-208[, U.C.C.] and Unif. Consumer Credit Code §5.109(2), 7A U.L.A. 171 (1974).

Purposes: Subsection (1) reflects modest changes in style to the provisions of the first sentence of Section 1-208 [30-1-208].

Subsection (2), however, reflects a significant change in the provisions of the second sentence of Section 1-208 [30-1-208] by creating a new rule with respect to a consumer lease. A lease provision allowing acceleration at the will of the lessor or when the lessor deems itself insecure is of critical importance to the lessee. In a consumer lease it is a provision that is not usually agreed to by the parties but is usually mandated by the lessor. Therefore, where its invocation depends not on specific criteria but on the discretion of the lessor, its use should be regulated to prevent abuse. Subsection (1) imposes a duty of good faith upon its exercises. Subsection (2) shifts the burden of establishing good faith to the lessor in the case of a consumer lease, but not otherwise.

Part 2
Formation and Construction of Lease Contract

30-2A-201. Statute of frauds.

Source: Section 2A-201, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Sections 2-201, 9-203(1) and 9-110[, U.C.C.].

Changes: This section is modeled on Section 2-201 [30-2-201], with changes to reflect the differences between a lease contract and a contract for the sale of goods. In particular, subsection (1)(b) adds a requirement that the writing "describe the goods leased and the lease term", borrowing that concept, with revisions, from the provisions of Section 9-203(1)(a) [30-9-203(1)(a), now repealed, see 30-9A-203]. Subsection (2), relying on the statutory analogue in Section 9-110 [30-9-110, now repealed, see 30-9A-108], sets forth the minimum criterion for satisfying that requirement.

Purposes: The changes in this section conform the provisions of Section 2-201 [30-2-201] to custom and usage in lease transactions. Section 2-201(2) [30-2-201(2)], stating a special rule between merchants, was not included in this section as the number of such transactions involving leases, as opposed to sales, was thought to be modest. Subsection (4) creates no exception for transactions where payment has been made and accepted. This represents a departure from the analogue, Section 2-201(3)(c) [30-2-201(3)(c)]. The rationale for the departure is grounded in the distinction between sales and leases. Unlike a buyer in a sales transaction, the lessee does not tender payment in full for goods delivered, but only payment of rent for one or more months. It was decided that, as a matter of policy, this act of payment is not a sufficient substitute for the required memorandum. Subsection (5) was needed to establish the criteria for supplying the lease term if it is omitted, as the lease contract may still be enforceable under subsection (4).

Case Notes

Lessor Fully Compensated for Loss of Truck Under Rental Agreement — Agreed Value of Truck Inapplicable to Damage Claim: Plaintiff leased a truck to defendant for construction work. The truck had an agreed value of $250,000 and a rental rate of $12,000 a month. While in defendant's possession, the truck was heavily damaged. Plaintiff initially sought to repair the truck, but eventually it was stripped of usable parts, and the remaining shell was sold for $15,000. Plaintiff received $114,500 from its insurer, based on the insurer's calculation that the truck had a $126,000 cash replacement value minus the $2,500 policy deductible owed to plaintiff by defendant and minus a $9,000 salvage value. Plaintiff then sued defendant for the unpaid balance of the agreed value, including the monthly payments because the agreed value had not been paid. The District Court noted that even though the parties did not have a signed, enforceable, written contract, defendant had properly insured the truck pursuant to a reasonable lease term, identifying plaintiff as beneficiary, and held that defendant had no independent obligation to pay damages beyond the deductible. Because plaintiff had recovered all damages to which it was entitled, judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court found that the language of the rental agreement did not require the lessee to pay the agreed value if the truck was damaged or destroyed, so defendant was not liable for the agreed value. Plaintiff failed to show the actual replacement cost of the truck and failed to establish that the District Court's finding was clearly erroneous, so the court did not err in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to additional compensation for replacing the truck. Additionally, plaintiff did not demonstrate what additional rental payments were owed, so defendant had no further obligation to pay damages for loss of use. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff was fully compensated under the rental agreement, and judgment was affirmed. Performance Mach. Co., Inc. v. Yellowstone Mtn. Club, LLC, 2007 MT 250, 339 M 259, 169 P3d 394 (2007).

This provision was not incorporated as it is unfair to allow an oral modification to make the entire lease contract unenforceable, e.g., if the modification takes it a few dollars over the dollar limit. At the same time, the problem could not be solved by providing that the lease contract would still be enforceable in its pre-modification state (if it then satisfied the statute of frauds) since in some cases that might be worse than no enforcement at all. Resolution of the issue is left to the courts based on the facts of each case.

30-2A-209. Lessee under finance lease as beneficiary of supply contract.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-209, U.C.C.

Changes: This section is modeled on Section 9-318 [30-9-318, now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406], the Restatement (Second) of Contracts §§302-315 (1981), and leasing practices. See Earman Oil Co. v. Burroughs Corp., 625 F.2d 1291, 1296-97 (5th Cir.1980).

Purposes: The function performed by the lessor in a finance lease is extremely limited. Section 2A-103(1)(g) [30-2A-103(1)(g)]. The lessee looks to the supplier of the goods for warranties and the like. That expectation is reflected in subsection (1), which is self-executing. As a matter of policy, the operation of this provision may not be excluded, modified or limited; however, an exclusion, modification, or limitation of any term of the supply contract, including any with respect to rights and remedies, effective against the lessor as buyer under the supply contract, is also effective against the lessee as the beneficiary designated under this provision. The supplier is not precluded from excluding or modifying an express or implied warranty under a supply contract. Sections 2-312(2) and 2-316 [30-2-312(2) and 30-2-316]. Further, the supplier is not precluded from limiting the rights and remedies of the lessor, as buyer, and from liquidating damages. Sections 2-718 and 2-719 [30-2-718 and 30-2-719]. If the supply contract excludes or modifies warranties, limits remedies for breach, or liquidates damages with respect to the lessor, such provisions are enforceable against the lessee as beneficiary. Thus, only selective discrimination against the beneficiaries designated under this section is precluded, i.e., exclusion of the supplier's liability to the lessee with respect to warranties made to the lessor.

Enforcement of this benefit is by action. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-106(2) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-106(2)].

The benefit extended by these provisions is not without a price, as this Article also provides in the case of a finance lease that is not a consumer lease that the lessee's promises to the lessor under the lease contract become irrevocable and independent upon the lessee's acceptance of the goods. Section 2A-407 [30-2A-407].

Subsection (2) limits the effect of subsection (1) on the supplier and the lessor by preserving, notwithstanding the transfer of the benefits of the supply contract to the lessee, all of the supplier's and the lessor's rights and obligations with respect to each other and others; it further absolves the lessee of any duties with respect to the supply contract that might have been inferred from the extension of the benefits thereof.

Subsections (2) and (3) also deal with difficult issues related to modification or rescission of the supply contract. Subsection (2) states a rule that determines the impact of the statutory extension of benefit contained in subsection (1) upon the relationship of the parties to the supply contract and, in a limited respect, upon the lessee. This statutory extension of benefit, like that contained in Sections 2A-216 and 2-318 [30-2A-216 and 30-2-318], is not a modification of the supply contract by the parties. Thus, subsection (3) states the rules that apply to a modification or rescission of the supply contract by the parties. Subsection (3) recognizes the lessee's potential causes of action against the lessor and the supplier arising from modification or rescission of the supply contract. The existence and extent of a cause of action by the supplier against the lessor is left to resolution by the courts based on the facts of each case.

Changes: Revised to reflect leasing practices and terminology.

Purposes: All of the express and implied warranties of the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) are included in this Article, revised to reflect the differences between a sale of goods and a lease of goods. Sections 2A-210 through 2A-216 [30-2A-210 through 30-2A-216]. The lease of goods is sufficiently similar to the sale of goods to justify this decision. Hawkland, The Impact of the Uniform Commercial Code on Equipment Leasing, 1972 Ill.L.F. 446, 459-60. Many state and federal courts have reached the same conclusion.

Value of the goods, as used in subsection (2), includes rental value.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-312[, U.C.C.].

Changes: This section is modeled on the provisions of Section 2-312 [30-2-312], with modifications to reflect the limited interest transferred by a lease contract and the total interest transferred by a sale. Section 2-312(2) [30-2-312(2)], which is omitted here, is incorporated in Section 2A-214 [30-2A-214]. The warranty of quiet possession was abolished with respect to sales of goods. Section 2-312 [30-2-312] official comment 1. Section 2A-211(1) [30-2A-211(1)] reinstates the warranty of quiet possession with respect to leases. Inherent in the nature of the limited interest transferred by the lease—the right to possession and use of the goods—that is the need of the lessee for protection greater than that afforded to the buyer. Since the scope of the protection is limited to claims or interests that arose from acts or omissions of the lessor, the lessor will be in position to evaluate the potential cost, certainly a far better position than that enjoyed by the lessee. Further, to the extent the market will allow, the lessor can attempt to pass on the anticipated additional cost to the lessee in the guise of higher rent.

Purposes: General language was chosen for subsection (1) that expresses the essence of the lessee's expectation: with an exception for infringement and the like, no person holding a claim or interest that arose from an act or omission of the lessor will be able to interfere with the lessee's use and enjoyment of the goods for the lease term. Subsection (2), like other similar provisions in later sections, excludes the finance lessor from extending this warranty; with few exceptions (Sections 2A-210 and 2A-211(1) [30-2A-210 and 30-2A-211(1)]), the lessee under a finance lease is to look to the supplier for warranties and the like. Subsections (2) and (3) are derived from Section 2-312(3) [30-2-312(3)]. These subsections, as well as the analogue, should be construed so that applicable principles of law and equity supplement their provisions. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

Condition of Rental Equipment Not Misrepresented: Carl Weissman & Sons (CWS) agreed to rent a rock drill to D&L Thomas Equipment (D&L). A clause in the rental agreement required D&L to inspect the drill and notify CWS within 10 days specifying any defects and provided that if CWS was not notified, the drill would be conclusively presumed to have been accepted in its condition at the time of receipt. D&L contended that there were problems with the drill immediately after it was received, but did not notify CWS in writing within the 10-day period specified in the rental agreement. D&L asserted that CWS violated this section by delivering the drill in a condition not fit for its intended purpose and misrepresenting the condition of the drill. However, by accepting the drill in its condition upon receipt, D&L waived all warranties. Even if CWS had misrepresented the condition of the drill, D&L was required to assess its condition upon receipt and, under the contract terms, could not rely on previous representations by CWS. Changes: Subsection (2) requires that a disclaimer of the warranty of merchantability be conspicuous and in writing as is the case for a disclaimer of the warranty of fitness; this is contrary to the rule stated in Section 2-316(2) [30-2-316(2)] with respect to the disclaimer of the warranty of merchantability. This section also provides that to exclude or modify the implied warranty of merchantability, fitness or against interference or infringement the language must be in writing and conspicuous. There are, however, exceptions to the rule. E.g., course of dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade may exclude or modify an implied warranty. Section 2A-214(3)(c) [30-2A-214(3)(c)]. The analogue of Section 2-312(2) [30-2-312(2)] has been moved to subsection (4) of this section for a more unified treatment of disclaimers; there is no policy with respect to leases of goods that would justify continuing certain distinctions found in the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) regarding the treatment of the disclaimer of various warranties. Compare Sections 2-312(2) and 2-316(2) [30-2-312(2) and 30-2-316(2)]. Finally, the example of a disclaimer of the implied warranty of fitness stated in subsection (2) differs from the analogue stated in Section 2-316(2) [30-2-316(2)]; this example should promote a better understanding of the effect of the disclaimer.

Purposes: These changes were made to reflect leasing practices. E.g., FMC Finance Corp. v. Murphree, 632 F.2d 413, 418 (5th Cir. 1980) (disclaimer of implied warranty under lease transactions must be conspicuous and in writing). The omission of the provisions of Section 2-316(4) [30-2-316(4)] was not substantive. Sections 2A-503 and 2A-504 [30-2A-503 and 30-2A-504].

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-318[, U.C.C.].

Changes: The provisions of Section 2-318 [30-2-318] have been included in this section, modified in two respects: first, to reflect leasing practice, including the special practices of the lessor under a finance lease; second, to reflect and thus codify elements of the official comment to Section 2-318 [30-2-318] with respect to the effect of disclaimers and limitations of remedies against third parties.

Purposes: Alternative A is based on the 1962 version of Section 2-318 [30-2-318] and is least favorable to the injured person as the doctrine of privity imposed by other law is abrogated to only a limited extent. Alternatives B and C are based on later additions to Section 2-318 [30-2-318] and are more favorable to the injured person. In determining which alternative to select, the state legislature should consider making its choice parallel to the choice it made with respect to Section 2-318 [30-2-318], as interpreted by the courts.

The last sentence of each of Alternatives A, B and C does not preclude the lessor from excluding or modifying an express or implied warranty under a lease. Section 2A-214 [30-2A-214]. Further, that sentence does not preclude the lessor from limiting the rights and remedies of the lessee and from liquidating damages. Sections 2A-503 and 2A-504 [30-2A-503 and 30-2A-504]. If the lease excludes or modifies warranties, limits remedies for breach, or liquidates damages with respect to the lessee, such provisions are enforceable against the beneficiaries designated under this section. However, this last sentence forbids selective discrimination against the beneficiaries designated under this section, i.e., exclusion of the lessor's liability to the beneficiaries with respect to warranties made by the lessor to the lessee.

Other law, including the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]), may apply in determining the extent to which a warranty to or for the benefit of the lessor extends to the lessee and third parties. This is in part a function of whether the lessor has bought or leased the goods.

This Article does not purport to change the development of the relationship of the common law, with respect to products liability, including strict liability in tort (as restated in Restatement (Second) of Torts, §402A (1965)), to the provisions of this Act. Compare Cline v. Prowler Indus. of Maryland, 418 A.2d 968 (Del.1980) and Hawkins Constr. Co. v. Matthews Co., 190 Neb. 546, 209 N.W.2d 643 (1973) with *Dippel v. Changes: This section, together with Section 2A-218 [30-2A-218], is derived from the provisions of Section 2-501 [30-2-501], with changes to reflect lease terminology; however, this section omits as irrelevant to leasing practice the treatment of special property.

Purposes: With respect to subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] there is a certain amount of ambiguity in the reference to when goods are designated, e.g., when the lessor is both selling and leasing goods to the same lessee/buyer and has marked goods for delivery but has not distinguished between those related to the lease contract and those related to the sales contract. As in Section 2-501(1)(b) [30-2-501(1)(b)], this issue has been left to be resolved by the courts, case by case.

Changes: This section, together with Section 2A-217 [30-2A-217], is derived from the provisions of Section 2-501 [30-2-501], with changes and additions to reflect leasing practices and terminology.

Purposes: Subsection (2) states a rule allowing substitution of goods by the lessor under certain circumstances, until default or insolvency of the lessor, or until notification to the lessee that identification is final. Subsection (3) states a rule regarding the lessor's insurable interest that, by virtue of the difference between a sale and a lease, necessarily is different from the rule stated in Section 2-501(2) [30-2-501(2)] regarding the seller's insurable interest. For this purpose the option to buy shall be deemed to have been exercised by the lessee when the resulting sale is closed, not when the lessee gives notice to the lessor. Further, subsection (5) is new and reflects the common practice of shifting the responsibility and cost of insuring the goods between the parties to the lease transaction.

Case Notes

Lessor Fully Compensated for Loss of Truck Under Rental Agreement — Agreed Value of Truck Inapplicable to Damage Claim: Plaintiff leased a truck to defendant for construction work. The truck had an agreed value of $250,000 and a rental rate of $12,000 a month. While in defendant's possession, the truck was heavily damaged. Plaintiff initially sought to repair the truck, but eventually it was stripped of usable parts, and the remaining shell was sold for $15,000. Plaintiff received $114,500 from its insurer, based on the insurer's calculation that the truck had a $126,000 cash replacement value minus the $2,500 policy deductible owed to plaintiff by defendant and minus a $9,000 salvage value. Plaintiff then sued defendant for the unpaid balance of the agreed value, including the monthly payments because the agreed value had not been paid. The District Court noted that even though the parties did not have a signed, enforceable, written contract, defendant had properly insured the truck pursuant to a reasonable lease term, identifying plaintiff as beneficiary, and held that defendant had no independent obligation to pay damages beyond the deductible. Because plaintiff had recovered all damages to which it was entitled, judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court found that the language of the rental agreement did not require the lessee to pay the agreed value if the truck was damaged or destroyed, so defendant was not liable for the agreed value. Plaintiff failed to show the actual replacement cost of the truck and failed to establish that the District Court's finding was clearly erroneous, so the court did not err in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to additional compensation for replacing the truck.

Additionally, plaintiff did not demonstrate what additional rental payments were owed, so defendant had no further obligation to pay damages for loss of use. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff was fully compensated under the rental agreement, and judgment was affirmed. Performance Mach. Co., Inc. v. Yellowstone Mtn. Club, LLC, 2007 MT 250, 339 M 259, 169 P3d 394 (2007).

Part 3
Effect of Lease Contract

30-2A-301. Enforceability of lease contract.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-301, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 9-201[, U.C.C.].

Changes: The first sentence of Section 9-201 [30-9-201, now repealed, see 30-9A-201] was incorporated, modified to reflect leasing terminology. The second sentence of Section 9-201 [30-9-201, now repealed, see 30-9A-201] was eliminated as not relevant to leasing practices.

Purposes: This section establishes a general rule regarding the validity and enforceability of a lease contract. The lease contract is effective and enforceable between the parties and against third parties. Exceptions to this general rule arise where there is a specific rule to the contrary in this Article. Enforceability is, thus, dependent upon the lease contract meeting the requirements of the Statute of Frauds provisions of Section 2A-201 [30-2A-201]. Enforceability is also a function of the lease contract conforming to the principles of construction and interpretation contained in the Article on General Provisions (Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]). Section 2A-103(4) [30-2A-103(4)].

The effectiveness or enforceability of the lease contract is not dependent upon the lease contract or any financing statement or the like being filed or recorded; however, the priority of the interest of a lessor of fixtures with respect to the interests of certain third parties in such fixtures is subject to the provisions of the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]). Section 2A-309 [30-2A-309]. Prior to the adoption of this Article filing or recording was not required with respect to leases, only leases intended as security. The definition of security interest, as amended concurrently with the adoption of this Article, more clearly delineates leases and leases intended as security and thus signals the need to file. Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. Those lessors who are concerned about whether the transaction creates a lease or a security interest will continue to file a protective financing statement. Section 9-408 [30-9-408, now repealed]. Coogan, Leasing and the Uniform Commercial Code, in Equipment Leasing-Leveraged Leasing 681, 744-46 (2d ed. 1980).

Hypothetical: 1. In construing this section it is important to recognize its relationship to other sections in this Article. This is best demonstrated by reference to a hypothetical. Assume that on February 1 A, a manufacturer of combines and other farm equipment, leased a fleet of six combines to B, a corporation engaged in the business of farming, for a 12 month term. Under the lease agreement between A and B, A agreed to defer B's payment of the first two months' rent to April 1. On March 1 B recognized that it would need only four combines and thus subleased two combines to C for an 11 month term.

2. This hypothetical raises a number of issues that are answered by the sections contained in this part. Since lease is defined to include sublease (Section 2A-103(1)(j) and (w) [30-2A-103(1)(j) and (1)(w)]), this section provides that the prime lease between A and B and the sublease between B and C are enforceable in accordance with their terms, except as otherwise provided in this Article; that exception, in this case, is one of considerable scope.

3. The separation of ownership, which is in A, and possession, which is in B with respect to four combines and which is in C with respect to two combines, is not relevant. Section 2A-302 [30-2A-302]. A's interest in the six combines cannot be challenged simply because A parted with possession to B, who in turn parted with possession of some of the combines to C. Yet it is important to note that by the terms of Section 2A-302 [30-2A-302] this conclusion is subject to change if otherwise provided in this Article.

4. B's entering the sublease with C raises an issue that is treated by this part. In a dispute over the leased combines A may challenge B's right to sublease. The general rule is permissive as to transfers of interests under a lease contract, including subleases. Section 2A-303(1) [30-2A-303(1)]. However, the rule creates two significant exceptions. If the prime lease contract between A and B prohibits B from subleasing the combines, Section 2A-303(1)(a) [30-2A-303(1)(a)] applies, as the transfer is voluntary and prohibited; thus, B's interest under the prime lease may not be transferred under the sublease to C. Absent a prohibition in the prime lease contract A might be able to argue that the sublease to C materially increases A's risk; thus B's interest under the prime lease may not be transferred under the sublease to C, if after demand by A, C fails to provide the assurances required by Section 2A-303(2) [30-2A-303(2)]. Section 2A-303(1)(b) [30-2A-303(1)(b)].

5. Resolution of this issue is also a function of the section dealing with the sublease of goods by a prime lessee (Section 2A-305 [30-2A-305]). Subsection (1) of Section 2A-305 [30-2A-305(1)], which is subject to the rule of Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303] stated above, provides that C takes subject to the interest of A under the prime lease between A and B. However, there are two exceptions. First, if B is a merchant (Sections 2A-103(3) and 2-104(1) [30-2A-103(3) and 30-2-104(1)]) dealing in goods of that kind and C is a sublessee in the ordinary course of business (Sections 2A-103(1)(o) and 2A-103(1)(n) [30-2A-103(1)(o) and (1)(n)]), C takes free of the prime lease between A and B. Second, if B has rejected the six combines under the prime lease with A, and B disposes of the goods by sublease to C, C takes free of the prime lease if C can establish good faith. Section 2A-511(4) [30-2A-511(4)].

6. If the facts of this hypothetical are expanded and we assume that the prime lease obligated B to maintain the combines, an additional issue may be presented. Prior to entering the sublease, B, in satisfaction of its maintenance covenant, brought the two combines that it desired to sublease to a local independent dealer of A's. The dealer did the requested work for B. C inspected the combines on the dealer's lot after the work was completed. C signed the sublease with B two days later. C, however, was prevented from taking delivery of the two combines as B refused to pay the dealer's invoice for the repairs. The dealer furnished the repair service to B in the ordinary course of the dealer's business. If under applicable law the dealer has a lien on repaired goods in the dealer's possession, the dealer's lien will take priority over A's, B's and C's interests. Section 2A-306 [30-2A-306].

7. Now assume that C is in financial straits and one of C's creditors obtains a judgment against C. If the creditor levies on C's subleasehold interest in the two combines, who will prevail? Unless the levying creditor also holds a lien covered by Section 2A-306 [30-2A-306], discussed above, the judgment creditor will take its interest subject to B's rights under the sublease and A's rights under the prime lease. Section 2A-307(1) [30-2A-307(1)]. The hypothetical becomes more complicated if we assume that B is in financial straits and B's creditor holds the judgment. Here the judgment creditor takes subject to the sublease unless the lien attached to the two combines before the sublease contract became enforceable. Section 2A-307(2)(a) [30-2A-307(2)(a)]. However, B's judgment creditor cannot prime A's interest in the goods because, with respect to A, the judgment creditor is a creditor of B in its capacity as lessee under the prime lease between A and B. Thus, here the judgment creditor's interest is subject to the lease between A and B. Section 2A-307(1) [30-2A-307(1)].

8. Finally, assume that on April 1 B is unable to pay A the deferred rent then due under the prime lease, but that C is current in its payments under the sublease from B. What effect will B's default under the prime lease between A and B have on C's rights under the sublease between B and C? Section 2A-301 [30-2A-301] provides that a lease contract is effective against the creditors of either party. Since a lease contract includes a sublease contract (Section 2A-103(1)(l) [30-2A-103(1)(l)]), the sublease contract between B and C arguably could be enforceable against A, a prime lessor who has extended unsecured credit to B, the prime lessee/sublessor, if the sublease contract meets the requirements of Section 2A-201 [30-2A-201]. However, the rule stated in Section 2A-301 [30-2A-301] is subject to other provisions in this Article. Under Section 2A-305 [30-2A-305], C, as sublessee, would take subject to the prime lease contract in most cases. Thus, B's default under the prime lease will in most cases lead to A's recovery of the goods from C. Section 2A-523 [30-2A-523]. C's recourse will be to assert a claim for damages against B. Section 2A-508 [30-2A-508].

Relationship Between Sections: 1. As the analysis of the hypothetical demonstrates, Part 3 of the Article focuses on issues that relate to the enforceability of the lease contract (Sections 2A-301, 2A-302 and 2A-303 [30-2A-301 through 30-2A-303]) and to the priority of various claims to the goods subject to the lease contract (Sections 2A-304, 2A-305, 2A-306, 2A-307, 2A-308, 2A-309 and 2A-310 [30-2A-304 through 30-2A-310]).

2. This section states a general rule of enforceability, which is subject to specific rules to the contrary stated elsewhere in the Article. Section 2A-302 [30-2A-302] negates any notion that the separation of title and possession is fraudulent as a rule of law. Finally, Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303] states a permissive rule with respect to the transfer of the lessor's interest (as well as the residual interest in the goods) or the lessee's interest under the lease contract. Conditions are imposed as a function of various issues including whether the transfer is voluntary or involuntary. In addition, a system of rules is created to deal with the rights and duties among assignor, assignee and the other party to the lease contract.

3. Sections 2A-304 and 2A-305 [30-2A-304 and 30-2A-305] are twins that deal with good faith transferees of goods subject to the lease contract. Section 2A-304 [30-2A-304] creates a set of rules with respect to transfers by the lessor of goods subject to a lease contract; the transferee considered is a subsequent lessee of the goods. The priority dispute covered here is between the subsequent lessee and the original lessee of the goods (or persons claiming through the original lessee). Section 2A-305 [30-2A-305] creates a set of rules with respect to transfers by the lessee of goods subject to a lease contract; the transferees considered are buyers of the goods or sublessees of the goods. The priority dispute covered here is between the transferee and the lessor of the goods (or persons claiming through the lessor).

4. Section 2A-306 [30-2A-306] creates a rule with respect to priority disputes between holders of liens for services or materials furnished with respect to goods subject to a lease contract and the lessor or the lessee under that contract. Section 2A-307 [30-2A-307] creates a rule with respect to priority disputes between the lessee and creditors of the lessor and priority disputes between the lessor and creditors of the lessee.

5. Section 2A-308 [30-2A-308] creates a series of rules relating to allegedly fraudulent transfers and preferences. The most significant rule is that set forth in subsection (3) [30-2A-308(2)] which validates sale-leaseback transactions if the buyer-lessor can establish that he or she bought for value and in good faith.

6. Finally, Sections 2A-309 and 2A-310 [30-2A-309 and 30-2A-310] create a series of rules with respect to priority disputes between various third parties and a lessor of fixtures or accessions, respectively, with respect thereto.

Changes: Section 9-202 [30-9-202, now repealed, see 30-9A-202] was modified to reflect leasing terminology and to clarify the law of leases with respect to fraudulent conveyances or transfers.

Purposes: The separation of ownership and possession of goods between the lessor and the lessee (or a third party) has created problems under certain fraudulent conveyance statutes. See, e.g., In re Ludlum Enters., 510 F.2d 996 (5th Cir.1975); Suburbia Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Bel-Air Conditioning Co., 385 So.2d 1151 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App.1980). This section provides, among other things, that separation of ownership and possession per se does not affect the enforceability of the lease contract. 30-2A-303. Alienability of party's interest under lease contract or of lessor's residual interest in goods — delegation of performance — transfer of rights.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-303, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-210[, U.C.C.].

Changes: The provisions of Sections 2-210 [30-2-210] and 9-311 [30-9-311, now repealed, see 30-9A-401] were incorporated in this section, with substantial modifications to reflect leasing terminology and practice and to harmonize the principles of the respective provisions, i.e., limitations on delegation of performance on the one hand and alienability of rights on the other. In addition, unlike Section 2-210 [30-2-210] which deals only with voluntary transfers, this section deals with involuntary as well as voluntary transfers. Moreover, the principle of Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4) now repealed, see 30-9A-406] denying effectiveness to contractual terms prohibiting assignments of receivables due and to become due also is implemented.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (2) states a rule, consistent with Section 9-401(b) [30-9A-401(2)], that voluntary and involuntary transfers of an interest of a party under the lease contract or of the lessor's residual interest, including by way of the creation or enforcement of a security interest, are effective, notwithstanding a provision in the lease agreement prohibiting the transfer or making the transfer an event of default. Although the transfers are effective, the provision in the lease agreement is nevertheless enforceable, but only as provided in subsection (4). Under subsection (4) the prejudiced party is limited to the remedies on "default under the lease contract" in this Article [Title 30, Chapter 2A] and, except as limited by this Article [Title 30, Chapter 2A], as provided in the lease agreement, if the transfer has been made an event of default. Section 2A-501(2) [30-2A-501(2)]. Usually, there will be a specific provision to this effect or a general provision making a breach of a covenant an event of default. In those cases where the transfer is prohibited, but not made an event of default, the prejudiced party may recover damages; or, if the damage remedy would be ineffective adequately to protect that party, the court can order cancellation of the lease contract or enjoin the transfer. This rule that such provisions generally are enforceable is subject to subsection (3) and Section 9-407 [30-9A-407], which make such provisions unenforceable in certain instances.

2. Under Section 9-407 [30-9A-407], a provision in a lease agreement which prohibits the creation or enforcement of a security interest, including sales of lease contracts subject to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] (Section 9-109(a)(3) [30-9A-109(1)(c)]), or makes it an event of default is generally not enforceable, reflecting the policy of Section 9-406 and former Section 9-318(4) [30-9A-406 and 30-9-318(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-406].

3. Subsection (3) is based upon Section 2-210(2) [30-2-210(2)] and Section 9-406 [30-9A-406]. It makes unenforceable a prohibition against transfers of certain rights to payment or a provision making the transfer an event of default. It also provides that such transfers do not materially impair the prospect of obtaining return performance by, materially change the duty of, or materially increase the burden or risk imposed on, the other party to the lease contract so as to give rise to the rights and remedies stated in subsection (4). Accordingly, a transfer of a right to payment cannot be prohibited or made an event of default, or be one that materially impairs performance, changes duties or increases risk, if the right is already due or will become due without further performance being required by the party to receive payment. Thus, a lessor can transfer the right to future payments under the lease contract, including by way of a grant of a security interest, and the transfer will not give rise to the rights and remedies stated in subsection (4) if the lessor has no remaining performance under the lease contract. The mere fact that the lessor is obligated to allow the lessee to remain in possession and to use the goods as long as the lessee is not in default does not mean that there is remaining performance on the part of the lessor. Likewise, the fact that the lessor has potential liability under a "non-operating" lease contract for breaches of warranty does not mean that there is remaining performance. In contrast, the lessor would have remaining performance under a lease contract requiring the lessor to regularly maintain and service the goods or to provide "upgrades" of the equipment on a periodic basis in order to avoid obsolescence. The basic distinction is between a mere potential duty to respond which is not remaining performance, and an affirmative duty to render stipulated performance. Although the distinction may be difficult to draw in some cases, it is instructive to focus on the difference between "operating" and "non-operating" leases as generally understood in the marketplace. Even if there is remaining performance under a lease contract, a transfer for security of a right to payment that is made an event of default or that is in violation of a prohibition against transfer does not give rise to the rights and remedies under subsection (4) if it does not constitute an actual delegation of a material performance under Section 9-407 [30-9A-407].

4. The application of either the rule of Section 9-407 [30-9A-407] or the rule of subsection (3) to the grant by the lessor of a security interest in the lessor's right to future payment under the lease contract may produce the same result. Both provisions generally protect security transfers by the lessor in particular because the creation by the lessor of a security interest or the enforcement of that interest generally will not prejudice the lessee's rights if it does not result in a delegation of the lessor's duties. To the contrary, the receipt of loan proceeds or relief from the enforcement of an antecedent debt normally should enhance the lessor's ability to perform its duties under the lease contract. Nevertheless, there are circumstances where relief might be justified. For example, if ownership of the goods is transferred pursuant to enforcement of a security interest to a party whose ownership would prevent the lessee from continuing to possess the goods, relief might be warranted. See 49 U.S.C. §1401(a) and (b) which places limitations on the operation of aircraft in the United States based on the citizenship or corporate qualification of the registrant.

5. Relief on the ground of material prejudice when the lease agreement does not prohibit the transfer or make it an event of default should be afforded only in extreme circumstances, considering the fact that the party asserting material prejudice did not insist upon a provision in the lease agreement that would protect against such a transfer.

6. Subsection (4) implements the rule of subsection (2). Subsection (2) provides that, even though a transfer is effective, a provision in the lease agreement prohibiting it or making it an event of default may be enforceable as provided in subsection (4). See Brummond v. First National Bank of Clovis, 656 P.2d 884, 35 U.C.C.Rep.Serv. (Callaghan) 1311 (N.Mex.1983), stating the analogous rule for Section 9-311 [30-9A-311]. If the transfer prohibited by the lease agreement is made an event of default, then, under subsection (4)(a), unless the default is waived or there is an agreement otherwise, the aggrieved party has the rights and remedies referred to in Section 2A-501(2) [30-2A-501(2)], viz. those in this Article [Title 30, chapter 2A] and, except as limited in the Article [Title 30, chapter 2A], those provided in the lease agreement. In the unlikely circumstance that the lease agreement prohibits the transfer without making a violation of the prohibition an event of default or, even if there is no prohibition against the transfer, and the transfer is one that materially impairs performance, changes duties, or increases risk (for example, a sublease or assignment to a party using the goods improperly or for an illegal purpose), then subsection (4)(b) is applicable. In that circumstance, unless the party aggrieved by the transfer has otherwise agreed in the lease contract, such as by assenting to a particular transfer or to transfers in general, or agrees in some other manner, the aggrieved party has the right to recover damages from the transferor and a court may, in appropriate circumstances, grant other relief, such as cancellation of the lease contract or an injunction against the transfer.

7. If a transfer gives rise to the rights and remedies provided in subsection (4), the transferee as an alternative may propose, and the other party may accept, adequate cure or compensation for past defaults and adequate assurance of future due performance under the lease contract. Subsection (4) does not preclude any other relief that may be available to a party to the lease contract aggrieved by a transfer subject to an enforceable prohibition, such as an action for interference with contractual relations.

8. Subsection (7) requires that a provision in a consumer lease prohibiting a transfer, or making it an event of default, must be specific, written and conspicuous. See Section 1-201(10) [30-1-201(10)]. This assists in protecting a consumer lessee against surprise assertions of default.

9. Subsection (5) is taken almost verbatim from the provisions of Section 2-210(5) [30-2-210(5)]. The subsection states a rule of construction that distinguishes a commercial assignment, which substitutes the assignee for the assignor as to rights and duties, and an assignment for security or financing assignment, which substitutes the assignee for the assignor only as to rights. Note that the assignment for security or financing assignment is a subset of all security interests. Security interest is defined to include "any interest of a buyer of . . . chattel paper". Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. Chattel paper is defined to include a lease. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Thus, a buyer of leases is the holder of a security interest in the leases. That conclusion should not influence this issue, as the policy is quite different. Whether a buyer of leases is the holder of a commercial assignment, or an assignment for security or financing assignment should be determined by the language of the assignment or the circumstances of the assignment.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 at end of (1) substituted "30-9-129(1)(c)" (renumbered 30-9A-109(1)(c)) for "30-9-102(1)(b)"; in exception clause in (2) inserted reference to 30-9-447 (renumbered 30-9A-407); deleted former (3) that read: "(3)(a) A provision in a lease agreement that prohibits the creation or enforcement of a security interest in an interest of a party under the lease contract or in the lessor's residual interest in the goods or that makes such a transfer an event of default is not enforceable unless, and then only to the extent that, there is an actual transfer by the lessee of the lessee's right of possession or use of the goods in violation of the provision or an actual delegation of a material performance of either party to the lease contract in violation of the provision.

(b) Neither the granting nor the enforcement of a security interest in the lessor's interest under the lease contract or the lessor's residual interest in the goods is a transfer that materially impairs the prospect of obtaining return performance by, materially changes the duty of, or materially increases the burden or risk imposed on the lessee within the purview of subsection (5) unless, and then only to the extent that, there is an actual delegation of a material performance of the lessor"; in (4) inserted reference to 30-9-447 (renumbered 30-9A-407); and made minor changes in style. 30-2A-304. Subsequent lease of goods by lessor.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-403[, U.C.C.].

Changes: While Section 2-403 [30-2-403] was used as a model for this section, the provisions of Section 2-403 [30-2-403] were significantly revised to reflect leasing practices and to integrate this Article with certificate of title statutes.

Purposes: This section must be read in conjunction with, as it is subject to, the provisions of Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303], which govern voluntary and involuntary transfers of rights and duties under a lease contract, including the lessor's residual interest in the goods.

This section must also be read in conjunction with Section 2-403 [30-2-403]. This section and Section 2A-305 [30-2A-305] are derived from Section 2-403 [30-2-403], which states a unified policy on good faith purchases of goods. Given the scope of the definition of purchaser (Section 1-201(33) [30-1-201(33)]), a person who bought goods to lease as well as a person who bought goods subject to an existing lease from a lessor will take pursuant to Section 2-403 [30-2-403]. Further, a person who leases such goods from the person who bought them should also be protected under Section 2-403 [30-2-403], first because the lessee's rights are derivative and second because the definition of purchaser should be interpreted to include one who takes by lease; no negative implication should be drawn from the inclusion of lease in the definition of purchase in this Article. Section 2A-103(1)(v) [30-2A-103(1)(v)].

There are hypotheticals that relate to an entrustee's unauthorized lease of entrusted goods to a third party that are outside the provisions of Sections 2-403, 2A-304 and 2A-305 [30-2-403, 30-2A-304, and 30-2A-305]. Consider a sale of goods by M, a merchant, to B, a buyer. After paying for the goods B allows M to retain possession of the goods as B is short of storage. Before B calls for the goods M leases the goods to L, a lessee. This transaction is not governed by Section 2-403(2) [30-2-403(2)] as L is not a buyer in the ordinary course of business. Section 1-201(9) [30-1-201(9)]. Further, this transaction is not governed by Section 2A-304(2) [30-2A-304(2)] as B is not an existing lessee. Finally, this transaction is not governed by Section 2A-305(2) [30-2A-305(2)] as B is not M's lessor. Section 2A-307(2) [30-2A-307(2)] resolves the potential dispute between B, M and L. By virtue of B's entrustment of the goods to M and M's lease of the goods to L, B has a cause of action against M under the common law. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103]. See, e.g., Restatement (Second) of Torts §§222A-243. Thus, B is a creditor of M. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-201(12) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-201(12)]. Section 2A-307(2) [30-2A-307(2)] provides that B, as M's creditor, takes subject to M's lease to L. Thus, if L does not default under the lease, L's enjoyment and possession of the goods should be undisturbed. However, B is not without recourse. B's action should result in a judgment against M providing, among other things, a turnover of all proceeds arising from M's lease to L, as well as a transfer of all of M's right, title and interest as lessor under M's lease to L, including M's residual interest in the goods. Section 2A-103(1)(q) [30-2A-103(1)(q)].

Subsection (1) states a rule with respect to the leasehold interest obtained by a subsequent lessee from a lessor of goods under an existing lease contract. The interest will include such leasehold interest as the lessor has in the goods as well as the leasehold interest that the lessor had the power to transfer. Thus, the subsequent lessee obtains unimpaired all rights acquired under the law of agency, apparent agency, ownership or other estoppel, whether based upon statutory provisions or upon case law principles. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103]. In general, the subsequent lessee takes subject to the existing lease contract, including the existing lessee's rights thereunder. Furthermore, the subsequent lease contract is, of course, limited by its own terms, and the subsequent lessee takes only to the extent of the leasehold interest transferred thereunder.

Subsection (1) further provides that a lessor with voidable title has power to transfer a good leasehold interest to a good faith subsequent lessee for value. In addition, subsections (1)(a) through (d) provide specifically for the protection of the good faith subsequent lessee for value in a number of specific situations which have been troublesome under prior law.

The position of an existing lessee who entrusts leased goods to its lessor is not distinguishable from the position of other entrusters. Thus, subsection (2) provides that the subsequent lessee in the ordinary course of business takes free of the existing lease contract between the lessor entrustee and the lessee entruster, if the lessor is a merchant dealing in goods of that kind. Further, the subsequent lessee obtains all of the lessor entrustee's and the lessee entruster's rights to the goods, but only to the extent of the leasehold interest transferred by the lessor entrustee. Thus, the lessor entrustee retains the residual interest in the goods. Section 2A-103(1)(q) [30-2A-103(1)(q)]. However, entrustment by the existing lessee must have occurred before the interest of the subsequent lessee became enforceable against the lessor. Entrusting is defined in Section 2-403(3) [30-2-403(3)] and that definition applies here. Section 2A-103(3) [30-2A-103(3)].

Subsection (3) states a rule with respect to a transfer of goods from a lessor to a subsequent lessee where the goods are subject to an existing lease and covered by a certificate of title. The subsequent lessee's rights are no greater than those provided by this section and the applicable certificate of title statute, including any applicable case law construing such statute. Where the relationship between the certificate of title statute and Section 2-403 [30-2-403], the statutory analogue to this section, has been construed by a court, that construction is incorporated here. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-102(1) and (2) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-102(1) and (2)]. The better rule is that the certificate of title statutes are in harmony with Section 2-403 [30-2-403] and thus would be in harmony with this section. E.g., Atwood Chevrolet-Olds v. Aberdeen Mun. School Dist., 431 So.2d 926, 928 (Miss.1983); Godfrey v. Gilsdorf, 476 P.2d 3, 6, 86 Nev. 714, 718 (1970); Martin v. Nager, 192 N.J. Super. 189, 197-98, 469 A.2d 519, 523 (Super.Ct. Ch. Div.1983). Where the certificate of title statute is silent on this issue of transfer, this section will control.

Changes: While Section 2-403 [30-2-403] was used as a model for this section, the provisions of Section 2-403 [30-2-403] were significantly revised to reflect leasing practice and to integrate this Article with certificate of title statutes.

Purposes: This section, a companion to Section 2A-304 [30-2A-304], states the rule with respect to the leasehold interest obtained by a buyer or sublessee from a lessee of goods under an existing lease contract. Cf. Section 2A-304 [30-2A-304] official comment. Note that this provision is consistent with existing case law, which prohibits the bailee's transfer of title to a good faith purchaser for value under Section 2-403(1) [30-2-403(1)]. Rohweder v. Aberdeen Product. Credit Ass'n, 765 F.2d 109 (8th Cir.1985).

Subsection (2) is also consistent with existing case law. American Standard Credit, Inc. v. National Cement Co., 643 F.2d 248, 269-70 (5th Cir.1981); but cf. Exxon Co., U.S.A. v. TLW

Computer Indus., 37 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. (Callaghan) 1052, 1057-58 (D.Mass.1983). Unlike Section 2A-304(2) [30-2A-304(2)], this subsection does not contain any requirement with respect to the time that the goods were entrusted to the merchant. In Section 2A-304(2) [30-2A-304(2)] the competition is between two customers of the merchant lessor; the time of entrusting was added as a criterion to create additional protection to the customer who was first in time: the existing lessee. In subsection (2) the equities between the competing interests were viewed as balanced.

There appears to be some overlap between Section 2-403(2) [30-2-403(2)] and Section 2A-305(2) [30-2A-305(2)] with respect to a buyer in the ordinary course of business. However, an examination of this Article's definition of buyer in the ordinary course of business (Section 2A-103(1)(a) [30-2A-103(1)(a)]) makes clear that this reference was necessary to treat entrusting in the context of a lease.

Subsection (3) states a rule of construction with respect to a transfer of goods from a lessee to a buyer or sublessee, where the goods are subject to an existing lease and covered by a certificate of title. Cf. Section 2A-304 [30-2A-304] official comment.

Changes: The approach reflected in the provisions of Section 9-310 [30-9-310, now repealed, see 30-9A-333] was included, but revised to conform to leasing terminology and to expand the exception to the special priority granted to protected liens to cover liens created by rule of law as well as those created by statute.

Purposes: This section should be interpreted to allow a qualified lessor or a qualified lessee to be the competing lienholder if the statute or rule of law so provides. The reference to statute includes applicable regulations and cases; these sources must be reviewed in resolving a priority dispute under this section.

30-2A-307. Priority of liens arising by attachment or levy on, security interests in, and other claims to goods.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-307, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: None for subsections (1) and (2). Subsections (3) and (4) are derived from the provisions of Section 9-307(1) and (3)[, U.C.C.], respectively.

Changes: The provisions of Section 9-307(1) and (3) [30-9-307(1) and (3), now repealed, see 30-9A-320] were incorporated, and modified to reflect leasing terminology and the basic concepts reflected in this Article.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1) states a general rule of priority that a creditor of the lessee takes subject to the lease contract. The term lessee (Section 2A-103(1)(n) [30-2A-103(1)(n)]) includes sublessee. Therefore, this subsection not only covers disputes between the prime lessor and a creditor of the prime lessee but also disputes between the prime lessor, or the sublessor, and a creditor of the sublessee. Section 2A-301 [30-2A-301] official comment 3(g). Further, by using the term creditor (Section 1-201(12) [30-1-201(12)]), this subsection will cover disputes with a general creditor, a secured creditor, a lien creditor and any representative of creditors. Section 2A-103(4) [30-2A-103(4)].

2. Subsection (2) states a general rule of priority that a creditor of a lessor takes subject to the lease contract. Note the discussion above with regard to the scope of these rules. Section 2A-301 [30-2A-301] official comment 3(g). Thus, the section will not only cover disputes between the prime lessee and a creditor of the prime lessor but also disputes between the prime lessee, or the sublessee, and a creditor of the sublessor.

3. To take priority over the lease contract, and the interests derived therefrom, the creditor must come within the exception stated in subsection (2) or within one of the provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] mentioned in subsection (3). Subsection (2) provides that where the creditor holds a lien (Section 2A-103(1)(r)) that attached before the lease contract became enforceable (Section 2A-301), the creditor does not take subject to the lease. Subsection (3) provides that a lessee takes its leasehold interest subject to a security interest except as otherwise provided in Sections 9-317, 9-321, or 9-323 [30-9A-317, 30-9A-321, or 30-9A-323].

4. The rules of this section operate in favor of whichever party to the lease contract may enforce it, even if one party perhaps may not, e.g., under Section 2A-201(1)(b) [30-2A-201(1)(b)].

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 deleted former (2)(b) and (2)(c) that read: "(b) the creditor holds a security interest in the goods and the lessee did not give value and receive delivery of the goods without knowledge of the security interest; or

(c) the creditor holds a security interest in the goods that was perfected (30-9-303) before the lease contract became enforceable"; deleted former (3) and (4) that read: "(3) A lessee in the ordinary course of business takes the leasehold interest free of a security interest in the goods created by the lessor even though the security interest is perfected (30-9-303) and the lessee knows of its existence.

(4) A lessee other than a lessee in the ordinary course of business takes the leasehold interest free of a security interest to the extent that it secures future advances made after the secured party acquires knowledge of the lease or more than 45 days after the lease contract becomes enforceable, whichever occurs first, unless the future advances are made pursuant to a commitment entered into without knowledge of the lease and before the expiration of the 45-day period"; inserted (3) concerning lessee subject to security interest held by lessor's creditor; and made minor changes in style. Changes: Rephrased and new material added to conform to leasing terminology and practice.

Purposes: Subsection (1) states a general rule of avoidance where the lessor has retained possession of goods if such retention is fraudulent under any statute or rule of law. However, the subsection creates an exception under certain circumstances for retention of possession of goods for a commercially reasonable time after the lease contract becomes enforceable.

Subsection (2) also preserves the possibility of an attack on the lease by creditors of the lessor if the lease was made in satisfaction of or as security for a pre-existing claim, and would constitute a fraudulent transfer or voidable preference under other law.

Finally, subsection (3) states a new rule with respect to sale-leaseback transactions, i.e., transactions where the seller sells goods to a buyer but possession of the goods is retained by the seller pursuant to a lease contract between the buyer as lessor and the seller as lessee. Notwithstanding any statute or rule of law that would treat such retention as fraud, whether per se, prima facie, or otherwise, the retention is not fraudulent if the buyer bought for value (Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)]) and in good faith (Sections 1-201(19) and 2-103(1)(b) [30-1-201(19) and 30-2-103(1)(b)]). Section 2A-103(3) and (4) [30-2A-103(3) and (4)]. This provision overrides Section 2-402(2) [30-2-402(2)] to the extent it would otherwise apply to a sale-leaseback transaction.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-309, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 9-313[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Revised to reflect leasing terminology and to add new material.

Purposes: While Section 9-313 [30-9-313, now repealed, see 30-9A-334] provided a model for this section, certain provisions were substantially revised.

Section 2A-309(1)(c) [30-2A-309(1)(c)], which is new, defines purchase money lease to exclude leases where the lessee had possession or use of the goods or the right thereof before the lease agreement became enforceable. This term is used in subsection (4)(a) as one of the conditions that must be satisfied to obtain priority over the conflicting interest of an encumbrancer or owner of the real estate.

Section 2A-309(4) [30-2A-309(4)], which states one of several priority rules found in this section, deletes reference to office machines and the like (Section 9-313(4)(c) [30-9-313(4)(c), now repealed, see 30-9A-334]) as well as certain liens (Section 9-313(4)(d) [30-9-313(4)(d), now repealed, see 30-9A-334]). However, these items are included in subsection (5), another priority rule that is more permissive than the rule found in subsection (4) as it applies whether or not the interest of the lessor is perfected. In addition, subsection (5)(a) expands the scope of the provisions of Section 9-313(4)(c) [30-9-313(4)(c), now repealed, see 30-9A-334] to include readily removable equipment not primarily used or leased for use in the operation of real estate; the qualifier is intended to exclude from the expanded rule equipment integral to the operation of real estate, e.g., heating and air conditioning equipment.

The rule stated in subsection (7) is more liberal than the rule stated in Section 9-313(7) [30-9-313(7), now repealed, see 30-9A-334] in that issues of priority not otherwise resolved in this subsection are left for resolution by the priority rules governing conflicting interests in real estate, as opposed to the Section 9-313(7) [30-9-313(7), now repealed, see 30-9A-334] automatic subordination of the security interest in fixtures.

The rule stated in subsection (8) is more liberal than the rule stated in Section 9-313(8) [30-9-313(8), now repealed, see 30-9A-604] in that the right of removal is extended to both the lessor and the lessee and the occasion for removal includes expiration, termination or cancellation of the lease agreement, and enforcement of rights and remedies under this Article, as well as default. The new language also provides that upon removal the goods are free and clear of conflicting interests of owners and encumbrancers of the real estate.

Finally, subsection (9) provides a mechanism for the lessor of fixtures to perfect its interest by filing a financing statement under the provisions of the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]), even though the lease agreement does not create a security interest. Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. The relevant provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] must be interpreted permissively to give effect to this mechanism as it implicitly expands the scope, perfection and priority provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to govern transactions that create a lease of fixtures, even though the lease agreement does not create a security interest. This mechanism is similar to that provided in Section 2-326(3)(c) [30-2-326(3)(c)] for the seller of goods on consignment, even though the consignment is not "intended as security". Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. Given the lack of litigation with respect to the mechanism created for consignment sales, this new mechanism should prove effective. Note, however, that this is a more pervasive change in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] than that wrought by expanding the filing system to accommodate permissive filing for leases. Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-310, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 9-314[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Revised to reflect leasing terminology and to add new material.

Purposes: Subsections (1) and (2) restate the provisions of subsection (1) of Section 9-314 [30-9-314(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-335] to clarify the definition of accession and to add leasing terminology to the priority rule that applies when the lease is entered into before the goods become accessions. Subsection (3) restates the provisions of subsection (2) of Section 9-314 [30-9-314(2), now repealed, see 30-9A-335] to add leasing terminology to the priority rule that applies when the lease is entered into on or after the goods become accessions. Unlike the rule with respect to security interests, the lease is merely subordinate, not invalid.

Subsection (4) creates two exceptions to the priority rules stated in subsections (2) and (3). Subsection (4) deletes the special priority rule found in the provisions of Section 9-314(3)(b) [30-9-314(3)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-335] as the interests of the lessor and lessee are entitled to greater protection.

Finally, subsection (5) is modeled on the provisions of Section 9-314(4) [30-9-314(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-335] with respect to removal of accessions, restated to reflect the parallel changes in Section 2A-309(8) [30-2A-309(8)].

Neither this section nor Section 9-314 [30-9-314, now repealed, see 30-9A-335] governs where the accession to the goods is not subject to the interest of a lessor or a lessee under a lease contract and is not subject to the interest of a secured party under a security agreement. This issue is to be resolved by the courts, case by case.

However, subsection 1(b), which allows the lessee the right to modify the lease for excused performance, excludes a finance lease that is not a consumer lease. This exclusion is compelled by the same policy that led to codification of provisions with respect to irrevocable promises. Section 2A-407 [30-2A-407].

30-2A-407. Irrevocable promises — finance leases.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-407, U.C.C.

Purposes: This section extends the benefits of the classic "hell or high water" clause to a finance lease that is not a consumer lease. This section is self-executing; no special provision need be added to the contract. This section makes covenants in a finance lease irrevocable and independent due to the function of the finance lessor in a three party relationship: the lessee is looking to the supplier to perform the essential covenants and warranties. Section 2A-209 [30-2A-209]. Thus, upon the lessee's acceptance of the goods the lessee's promises to the lessor under the lease contract become irrevocable and independent. The provisions of this section remain subject to the obligation of good faith (Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-203 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-203]), and the lessee's revocation of acceptance (Section 2A-517 [30-2A-517]).

The section requires the lessee to perform even if the lessor's performance after the lessee's acceptance is not in accordance with the lease contract; the lessee may, however, have and pursue a cause of action against the lessor, e.g., breach of certain limited warranties (Sections 2A-210 and 211(1) [30-2A-210 and 30-2A-211(1)]). This is appropriate because the benefit of the supplier's promises and warranties to the lessor under the supply contract is extended to the lessee under the finance lease. Section 2A-209 [30-2A-209]. Despite this balance, this section excludes a finance lease that is a consumer lease. That a consumer be obligated to pay notwithstanding defective goods or the like is a principle that is not tenable under case law (Unico v. Owen, 50 N.J. 101, 232 A.2d 405 (1967)), state statute (Unif. Consumer Credit Code §§3.403-.405, 7A U.L.A. 126-31 (1974), or federal statute (15 U.S.C. §1666i (1982)).

The relationship of the three parties to a transaction that qualifies as a finance lease is best demonstrated by a hypothetical. A, the potential lessor, has been contacted by B, the potential lessee, to discuss the lease of an expensive line of equipment that B has recently placed an order for with C, the manufacturer of such goods. The negotiation is completed and A, as lessor, and B, as lessee, sign a lease of the line of equipment for a 60-month term. B, as buyer, assigns the purchase order with C to A. If this transaction creates a lease (Section 2A-103(1)(j) [30-2A-103(1)(j)]), this transaction should qualify as a finance lease. Section 2A-103(1)(g) [30-2A-103(1)(g)].

The line of equipment is delivered by C to B's place of business. After installation by C and testing by B, B accepts the goods by signing a certificate of delivery and acceptance, a copy of which is sent by B to A and C. One year later the line of equipment malfunctions and B falls behind in its manufacturing schedule.

Under this Article, because the lease is a finance lease, no warranty of fitness or merchantability is extended by A to B. Sections 2A-212(1) and 2A-213 [30-2A-212(1) and 30-2A-213]. Absent an express provision in the lease agreement, application of Section 2A-210 [30-2A-210] or Section 2A-211(1) [30-2A-211(1)], or application of the principles of law and equity, including the law with respect to fraud, duress, or the like (Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103]), B has no claim against A. B's obligation to pay rent to A continues as the obligation became irrevocable and independent when B accepted the line of equipment (Section 2A-407(1) [30-2A-407(1)]). B has no right of set-off with respect to any part of the rent still due under the lease. Section 2A-508(6) [30-2A-508(6)]. However, B may have another remedy. Despite the lack of privity between B and C (the purchase order with C having been assigned by B to A), B may have a claim against C. Section 2A-209(1) [30-2A-209(1)].

This section is silent as to whether a "hell or high water" clause, i.e., a clause that is to the effect of this section, is enforceable if included in a finance lease that is a consumer lease or a lease that is not a finance lease. That issue will continue to be determined by the facts of each case. Sections 2A-104, 2A-103(4), 9-206 and 9-318 [30-2A-104, 30-2A-103(4), 30-9-206, now repealed, see 30-9A-403, and 30-9-318, now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406]. However, with respect to finance leases that are not consumer leases courts have enforced "hell or high water" clauses. In re O.P.M. Leasing Servs., 21 Bankr. 993, 1006 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1982).

Subsection (2) further provides that a promise that has become irrevocable and independent under subsection (1) is enforceable not only between the parties but also against third parties. Thus, the finance lease can be transferred or assigned without disturbing enforceability. Further, subsection (2) also provides that the promise cannot, among other things, be cancelled or terminated without the consent of the lessor.

Source: Section 2A-501, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 9-501[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1) is new and represents a departure from the Article on Secured Transactions (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]) as the subsection makes clear that whether a party to the lease agreement is in default is determined by the agreement as well as this Article. Sections 2A-508 and 2A-523 [30-2A-508 and 30-2A-523]. It further departs from Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] in recognizing the potential default of either party, a function of the bilateral nature of the obligations between the parties to the lease contract.

Subsection (2) is a version of the first sentence of Section 9-501(1) [30-9-501(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-601], revised to reflect leasing terminology.

Subsection (3), an expansive version of the second sentence of Section 9-501(1) [30-9-501(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-601], lists the procedures that may be followed by the party seeking enforcement; in effect, the scope of the procedures listed in subsection (3) is consistent with the scope of the procedures available to the foreclosing secured party.

Subsection (4) establishes that the parties' rights and remedies are cumulative. DeKoven, Leases of Equipment: Puritan Leasing Company v. August, A Dangerous Decision, 12 U.S.F. L.Rev. 257, 276-80 (1978).

Section 9-501(3) [30-9-501(3), now repealed, see 30-9A-602 and 30-9A-603], which, among other things, states that certain rules, to the extent they give rights to the debtor and impose duties on the secured party, may not be waived or varied, was not incorporated in this Article. Given the significance of freedom of contract in the development of the common law as it applies to bailments for hire and the lessee's lack of an equity of redemption, there was no reason to impose that restraint.

30-2A-502. Notice after default.

Source: Section 2A-502, U.C.C.

Purposes: This section makes clear that absent agreement to the contrary or provision in this Article to the contrary, e.g., Section 2A-516(3)(a) [30-2A-516(3)(a)], the party in default is not entitled to notice of default or enforcement. While a review of Part 5 of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] leads to the same conclusion with respect to giving notice of default to the debtor, it is never stated. Although Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] requires notice of disposition and strict foreclosure, the different scheme of lessors' and lessees' rights and remedies developed under the common law, and codified by this Article, generally does not require notice of enforcement; furthermore, such notice is not mandated by due process requirements. However, certain sections of this Article do require notice. E.g., Section 2A-517(2) [30-2A-517(2)].

30-2A-503. Modification or impairment of rights and remedies.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-503, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Sections 2-719 and 2-701[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Rewritten to reflect lease terminology and to clarify the relationship between this section and Section 2A-504 [30-2A-504].

Purposes: A significant purpose of this Part is to provide rights and remedies for those parties to a lease who fail to provide them by agreement or whose rights and remedies fail of their essential purpose or are unenforceable. However, it is important to note that this implies no restriction on freedom to contract. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-102(3)]. Thus, subsection (1), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-719(1) [30-2-719(1)], allows the parties to the lease agreement freedom to provide for rights and remedies in addition to or in substitution for those provided in this Article and to alter or limit the measure of damages recoverable under this Article. Except to the extent otherwise provided in this Article (e.g., Sections 2A-105, 106 and 108(1) and (2) [30-2A-105, 30-2A-106, and 30-2A-108(1) and (2)]), this Part shall be construed neither to restrict the parties' ability to provide for rights and remedies or to limit or alter the measure of damages by agreement, nor to imply disapproval of rights and remedy schemes other than those set forth in this Part.

Subsection (2) makes explicit with respect to this Article what is implicit in Section 2-719 [30-2-719] with respect to the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]): if an exclusive remedy is held to be unconscionable, remedies under this Article are available. Section 2-719 [30-2-719] official comment 1.

Subsection (3), a revision of Section 2-719(3) [30-2-719(3)], makes clear that consequential damages may also be liquidated. Section 2A-504(1) [30-2A-504(1)].

Subsection (4) is a revision of the provisions of Section 2-701 [30-2-701]. This subsection leaves the treatment of default with respect to obligations or promises collateral or ancillary to the lease contract to other law. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103]. An example of such an obligation would be that of the lessor to the secured creditor which has provided the funds to leverage the lessor's lease transaction; an example of such a promise would be that of the lessee, as seller, to the lessor, as buyer, in a sale-leaseback transaction.

30-2A-504. Liquidation of damages.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-504, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Sections 2-718(1), (2), (3) and 2-719(2)[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially rewritten.

Purposes: Many leasing transactions are predicated on the parties' ability to agree to an appropriate amount of damages or formula for damages in the event of default or other act or omission. The rule with respect to sales of goods (Section 2-718 [30-2-718]) may not be sufficiently flexible to accommodate this practice. Thus, consistent with the common law emphasis upon freedom to contract with respect to bailments for hire, this section has created a revised rule that allows greater flexibility with respect to leases of goods.

Subsection (1), a significantly modified version of the provisions of Section 2-718(1) [30-2-718(1)], provides for liquidation of damages in the lease agreement at an amount or by a formula. Section 2-718(1) [30-2-718(1)] does not by its express terms include liquidation by a formula; this change was compelled by modern leasing practice. Subsection (1), in a further expansion of Section 2-718(1) [30-2-718(1)], provides for liquidation of damages for default as well as any other act or omission.

A liquidated damages formula that is common in leasing practice provides that the sum of lease payments past due, accelerated future lease payments, and the lessor's estimated residual interest, less the net proceeds of disposition (whether by sale or re-lease) of the leased goods is the lessor's damages. Tax indemnities, costs, interest and attorney's fees are also added to determine the lessor's damages. Another common liquidated damages formula utilizes a periodic depreciation allocation as a credit to the aforesaid amount in mitigation of a lessor's damages. A third formula provides for a fixed number of periodic payments as a means of liquidating damages. Stipulated loss or stipulated damage schedules are also common. Whether these formulae are enforceable will be determined in the context of each case by applying a standard of reasonableness in light of the harm anticipated when the formula was agreed to. Whether the inclusion of these formulae will affect the classification of the transaction as a lease or a security interest is to be determined by the facts of each case. Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. E.g., In re Noack, 44 Bankr. 172, 174-75 (Bankr. E.D.Wis. 1984).

This section does not incorporate two other tests that under sales law determine enforceability of liquidated damages, i.e., difficulties of proof of loss and inconvenience or nonfeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy. The ability to liquidate damages is critical to modern leasing practice; given the parties' freedom to contract at common law, the policy behind retaining these two additional requirements here was thought to be outweighed. Further, given the expansion of subsection (1) to enable the parties to liquidate the amount payable with respect to an indemnity for loss or diminution of anticipated tax benefits resulted in another change: the last sentence of Section 2-718(1) [30-2-718(1)], providing that a term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages is void as a penalty, was also not incorporated. The impact of local, state and federal tax laws on a leasing transaction can result in an amount payable with respect to the tax indemnity many times greater than the original purchase price of the goods. By deleting the reference to unreasonably large liquidated damages the parties are free to negotiate a formula, restrained by the rule of reasonableness in this section. These changes should invite the parties to liquidate damages. Peters, Remedies for Breach of Contracts

Relating to the Sale of Goods Under the Uniform Commercial Code: A Roadmap for Article Two, 73 Yale L.J. 199, 278 (1963).

Subsection (2), a revised version of Section 2-719(2) [30-2-719(2)], provides that if the liquidated damages provision is not enforceable or fails of its essential purpose, remedy may be had as provided in this Article.

Subsection (3)(b) of this section differs from subsection (2)(b) of Section 2-718 [30-2-718(2)(b)]; in the absence of a valid liquidated damages amount or formula the lessor is permitted to retain 20 percent of the present value of the total rent payable under the lease. The alternative limitation of $500 contained in Section 2-718 [30-2-718] is deleted as unrealistically low with respect to a lease other than a consumer lease.

Purposes: Subsection (1) does not incorporate the limitation found in Section 2-725(1) [30-2-725(1)] prohibiting the parties from extending the period of limitation. Breach of warranty and indemnity claims often arise in a lease transaction; with the passage of time such claims often diminish or are eliminated. To encourage the parties to commence litigation under these circumstances makes little sense.

Subsection (2) states two rules for determining when a cause of action accrues. With respect to default, the rule of Section 2-725(2) [30-2-725(2)] is not incorporated in favor of a more liberal rule of the later of the date when the default occurs or when the act or omission on which it is based is or should have been discovered. Changes: Substantially rewritten.

Purposes: This section is an index to Sections 2A-509 through 522 [30-2A-509 through 30-2A-522] and their effect on the lessee's rights and remedies after the lessor's default. The lessor and the lessee can otherwise agree; thus, the parties can, among other things, raise or lower the threshold of events that give rise to a lessor's default or create a new scheme of rights and remedies triggered by the occurrence of the default. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-102(3)].

Subsection (1), a substantially rewritten version of the provisions of Section 2-711(1) [30-2-711(1)], lists three cumulative remedies of the lessee where the lessor has failed to deliver conforming goods or has repudiated the contract, or the lessee has rightfully rejected or justifiably revoked. Sections 2A-501(2) and (4) [30-2A-501(2) and (4)]. This Article rejects any doctrine of election of remedy. To determine if one remedy bars another in a particular case is a function of whether the lessee has been put in as good a position as if the lessor had fully performed the lease agreement. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-106(1) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-106(1)]. Note that a special rule has been created regarding the lessee's recovery of rent and security that have been paid in the case of an installment lease—recovery is limited to that which is just under the circumstances. With the various different types of installment leases, no bright line can be created that would operate fairly in all cases; in addition, this provision should further encourage the parties to establish their own rules by agreement.

Subsection (2), a version of the provisions of Section 2-711(2) [30-2-711(2)] revised to reflect leasing terminology, lists two alternative remedies for the recovery of the goods by the lessee; however, each of these remedies is cumulative with respect to those listed in subsection (1).

Subsection (3) is new and allows the lessee access to the remedy scheme of this Article as well as the lease contract if the lessor is in default for reasons other than those stated in subsection (1). Note that the reference to this Article includes supplemental principles of law and equity. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

Subsection (4) is new and merely adds to the completeness of the index by including a reference to the lessee's recovery of damages upon the lessor's breach of warranty; such breach may not rise to the level of a default by the lessor (e.g. breach of an express warranty that the goods subject to the lease conform to description where the non-conformity is such that when measured by objective criteria it reflects a minimal deviation from description) unless the breach is material or unless so provided by the lease agreement.

Subsection (5), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-711(3) [30-2-711(3)], recognizes, on rightful rejection or justifiable revocation, the lessee's security interest in goods in its possession and control. Section 9-113 [30-9-113, now repealed, see 30-9A-110], which recognized security interests arising under the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]), was amended with the adoption of this Article to reflect the security interests arising under this Article. Pursuant to Section 2A-511(4) [30-2A-511(4)], a purchaser who purchases goods from the lessee in good faith takes free of any rights of the lessor, or in the case of a finance lease the supplier. Such goods, however, must have been rightfully rejected and disposed of pursuant to Section 2A-511 or 2A-512 [30-2A-511 or 30-2A-512]. However, Section 2A-517(3) [30-2A-517(3)] provides that the lessee will have the same rights and duties with respect to goods where acceptance has been revoked as with respect to goods rejected. Thus, Section 2A-511(4) [30-2A-511(4)] will apply to the lessee's disposition of such goods.

Pursuant to Section 2A-527(5) [30-2A-527(5)], the lessee must account to the lessor for the excess proceeds of such disposition, after satisfaction of the claim secured by the lessee's security interest.

Subsection (6), a slightly revised version of the provisions of Section 2-717 [30-2-717], sanctions a right of set-off by the lessee, subject to the rule of Section 2A-407 [30-2A-407] with respect to irrevocable promises in a finance lease that is not a consumer lease, and further subject to an enforceable "hell or high water" clause in the lease agreement. Section 2A-407 [30-2A-407] official comment. No attempt is made to state how the set-off should occur; this is to be determined by the facts of each case.

There is no special treatment of the finance lease in this section. Absent supplemental principles of law and equity to the contrary, in the case of most finance leases, following the lessee's acceptance of the goods the lessee will have no rights or remedies against the lessor, because the lessor's obligations to the lessee are minimal. Sections 2A-210 and 2A-211(1) [30-2A-210 and 30-2A-211(1)]. Since the lessee will look to the supplier for performance, this is appropriate. Section 2A-209 [30-2A-209].

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-607[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (2) creates a special rule for finance leases, precluding revocation if acceptance is made with knowledge of nonconformity with respect to the lease agreement, as opposed to the supply agreement; this is not inequitable as the lessee has a direct claim against the supplier. Section 2A-209(1) [30-2A-209(1)]. Revocation of acceptance of a finance lease is permitted if the lessee's acceptance was without discovery of the nonconformity (with respect to the lease agreement, not the supply agreement) and was reasonably induced by the lessor's assurances. Section 2A-517(1)(b) [30-2A-517(1)(b)]. Absent exclusion or modification, the lessor under a finance lease makes certain warranties to the lessee. Sections 2A-210 and 2A-211(1) [30-2A-210 and 30-2A-211(1)]. Revocation of acceptance is not prohibited even after the lessee's promise has become irrevocable and independent. Section 2A-407 [30-2A-407] official comment. Where the finance lease creates a security interest, the rule may be to the contrary. General Elec. Credit Corp. of Tennessee v. Ger-Beck Mach. Co., 806 F.2d 1207 (3rd Cir. 1986).

Subsection (3)(a) requires the lessee to give notice of default, within a reasonable time after the lessee discovered or should have discovered the default. In all cases, notice of default must be given to the lessor. In the case of a finance lease, notice of default must be given to the lessor and the supplier. The definition of supplier is a person from whom a lessor buys or leases goods to be leased under a finance lease. Section 2A-103(1)(x) [30-2A-103(1)(x)]. Thus, not all sellers or lessors of goods to be leased are included within the set of persons to be given notice of default, as suppliers.

Subsection (3)(b) requires the lessee to give the lessor notice of litigation for infringement or the like. There is an exception created in the case of a consumer lease. While such an exception was considered for a finance lease, it was not created because it was not necessary—the lessor in a finance lease does not give a warranty against infringement. Section 2A-211(2) [30-2A-211(2)]. Even though not required under subsection (3)(b), the lessee who takes under a finance lease should consider giving notice of litigation for infringement or the like to the supplier, because the lessee obtains the benefit of the suppliers' promises subject to the suppliers' defenses or claims. Sections 2A-209(1) and 2-607(3)(b) [30-2A-209(1) and 30-2-607(3)(b)].

30-2A-518. Cover — substitute goods.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-518, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-712[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1) allows the lessee to take action to fix its damages after default by the lessor. Such action may consist of the purchase or lease of goods. The decision to cover is a function of commercial judgment, not a statutory mandate replete with sanctions for failure to comply. Cf. Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627].

Subsection (2) states a rule for determining the amount of lessee's damages provided that there is no agreement to the contrary. The lessee's damages will be established using the new lease agreement as a measure if the following three criteria are met: (i) the lessee's cover is by lease agreement, (ii) the lease agreement is substantially similar to the original lease agreement, and (iii) such cover was effected in good faith, and in a commercially reasonable manner. Thus, the lessee will be entitled to recover from the lessor the present value, as of the date of default, of the difference between the rent reserved under the new lease and the original lease, together with incidental or consequential damages less expenses saved in consequence of the lessor's default. Note that the reference in Section 2A-518(2)(a) [30-2A-518(2)(a)] is to the date of default not to the date of an event of default. An event of default under a lease agreement becomes a default under a lease agreement only after the expiration of any relevant period of grace and compliance with any notice requirements under this Article and the lease agreement. American Bar Foundation, Commentaries on Indentures, §5-1, at 216-217 (1971). Section 2A-501(1) [30-2A-501(1)]. This conclusion is also a function of whether, as a matter of fact or law, the event of default has been waived, suspended or cured. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103, 2003 MCA; see 2005 amendment]. If the lessee's cover does not satisfy the criteria of subsection (2), Section 2A-519 [30-2A-519] governs.

Two of the three criteria to be met by the lessee are familiar, but the concept of the new lease agreement being substantially similar to the original lease agreement is not. Given the many variables facing a party who intends to lease goods and the rapidity of change in the market place, the policy decision was made not to draft with specificity. It was thought unwise to seek to establish certainty at the cost of fairness. Thus, the decision of whether the new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original will be determined case by case.

While the section does not draw a bright line, it is possible to describe some of the factors that should be considered in finding that a new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original. First, the goods subject to the new lease agreement should be examined. For example, in a lease of computer equipment the new lease might be for more modern equipment. However, it may be that at the time of the lessor's breach it was not possible to obtain the same type of goods in the market place. Because the lessee's remedy under Section 2A-519 [30-2A-519] is intended to place the lessee in essentially the same position as if he had covered, if goods similar to those to have been delivered under the original lease are not available, then the computer equipment in this hypothetical should qualify as a commercially reasonable substitute. See Section 2-712(1) [30-2-712(1)].

Second, the various elements of the new lease agreement should also be examined. Those elements include the term of the new lease (because the damages are calculated under subsection (2) as the difference between the total rent payable for the entire term of the new lease agreement and the remaining term of the original lease); the presence or absence of options to purchase or release; the lessor's representations, warranties and covenants to the lessee, as well as those to be provided by the lessee to the lessor; and the services, if any, to be provided by the lessor or by the lessee. All of these factors allocate cost and risk between the lessor and the lessee and thus affect the amount of rent to be paid.

Having examined the goods and the agreement, the test to be applied is whether, in light of these comparisons, the new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original lease agreement. These findings should not be made with scientific precision, as they are a function of economics, nor should they be made independently with respect to the goods and each element of the agreement, as it is important that a sense of commercial judgment pervade the finding. To establish the new lease as a proper measure of damage under subsection (2), these factors, taken as a whole, must result in a finding that the new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original.

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-713(1) [30-2-713(1)], states the basic rule governing the measure of lessee's damages for non-delivery or repudiation by the lessor or for rightful rejection or revocation of acceptance by the lessee. This measure will apply, absent agreement to the contrary, if the lessee does not cover or if the cover does not qualify under Section 2A-518 [30-2A-518]. There is no sanction for cover that does not qualify.

The measure of damage is the present value, as of the date of default, of the difference between market rent and original rent for the remaining term of the lease, less expenses saved in consequence of the default. Note that the reference in Section 2A-519(1) [30-2A-519(1)] is to the date of default not to the date of an event of default. An event of default under a lease agreement becomes a default under a lease agreement only after the expiration of any relevant period of grace and compliance with any notice requirements under this Article and the lease agreement. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103, 2003 MCA; see 2005 amendment].

Subsection (2), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-713(2) [30-2-713(2)], states the rule with respect to determining market rent.

Subsection (3), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-714(1) and (3) [30-2-714(1) and (3)], states the measure of damages where goods have been accepted and acceptance is not revoked. The measure in essence is the loss, in the ordinary course of events, flowing from the default.

Subsection (4), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-714(2) [30-2-714(2)], states the measure of damages for breach of warranty. The measure in essence is the present value of the difference between the value of the goods accepted and of the goods if they had been as warranted.

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: This section is an index to Sections 2A-524 through 2A-531 [30-2A-524 through 30-2A-531] and their effect on the lessor's rights and remedies upon the lessee's default.

The lessor and the lessee can agree otherwise; thus, the parties can, among other things, raise or lower the threshold that gives rise to lessee's default or create a new scheme of rights and remedies triggered by the occurrence of the default. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-102(3)].

Subsection (1), a substantially rewritten version of Section 2-703 [30-2-703], lists various cumulative remedies of the lessor where the lessee wrongfully rejects or revokes acceptance, fails to make a payment when due, or repudiates. Section 2A-501(4) [30-2A-501(4)].

This Article rejects the doctrine of election of remedy. Whether, in a particular case, one remedy bars another, is a function of whether lessor has been put in as good a position as if the lessee had fully performed the lease contract. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-106(1) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-106(1)].

Hypothetical: 1. To better understand the application of subparagraphs (a) through (e) [subsections (1)(a) through (1)(e) of this section], it is useful to review a hypothetical. Assume that A is a merchant in the business of selling and leasing new bicycles of various types. B is about to engage in the business of subleasing bicycles to summer residents of and visitors to an island resort. A, as lessor, has agreed to lease 60 bicycles to B. While there is one master lease, deliveries and terms are staggered. 20 bicycles are to be delivered by A to B's island location on June 1; the term of the lease of these bicycles is four months. 20 bicycles are to be delivered by A to B's island location on July 1; the term of the lease of these bicycles is three months. Finally, 20 bicycles are to be delivered by A to B's island location on August 1; the term of the lease of these bicycles is two months. B is obligated to pay rent to A on the 15th day of each month during the term for the lease. Rent is $50 per month, per bicycle. B has no option to purchase or release and must return the bicycles to A at the end of the term, in good condition, reasonable wear and tear excepted. Since the retail price of each bicycle is $400 and bicycles used in the retail rental business have a useful economic life of 36 months, this transaction creates a lease. Sections 2A-103(1)(j) and 1-201(37) [30-2A-103(1)(j) and 30-1-201(37)].

2. A's current inventory of bicycles is not large. Thus, upon signing the lease with B in February, A agreed to purchase 60 new bicycles from A's principal manufacturer, with special instructions to drop ship the bicycles to B's island location in accordance with the delivery schedule set forth in the lease.

3. The first shipment of 20 bicycles was received by B on May 21. B inspected the bicycles, accepted the same as conforming to the lease and signed a receipt of delivery and acceptance. However, due to poor weather that summer, business was terrible and B was unable to pay the rent due on June 15. Pursuant to the lease A sent B notice of default and proceeded to enforce his rights and remedies against B.

4. A's counsel first advised A that under Section 2A-510(2) [30-2A-510(2)] and the terms of the lease B's failure to pay was a default with respect to the whole. Thus, to minimize A's continued exposure, A was advised to take possession of the bicycles. If A had possession of the goods A could refuse to deliver. Section 2A-525(1) [30-2A-525(1)]. However, the facts here are different. With respect to the bicycles in B's possession, A has the right to take possession of the bicycles, without breach of the peace. Section 2A-525(2) [30-2A-525(2)]. If B refuses to allow A access to the bicycles, A can proceed by action, including replevin or injunctive relief.

5. With respect to the 40 bicycles that have not been delivered, this Article provides various alternatives. First, assume that 20 of the remaining 40 bicycles have been manufactured and delivered by the manufacturer to a carrier for shipment to B. Given the size of the shipment, the carrier was using a small truck for the delivery and the truck had not yet reached the island ferry when the manufacturer (at the request of A) instructed the carrier to divert the shipment to A's place of business. A's right to stop delivery is recognized under these circumstances. Section 2A-526(1) [30-2A-526(1)]. Second, assume that the 20 remaining bicycles were in the process of manufacture when B defaulted. A retains the right (as between A as lessor and B as lessee) to exercise reasonable commercial judgment whether to complete manufacture or to dispose of the unfinished goods for scrap. Since A is not the manufacturer and A has a binding contract to buy the bicycles, A elected to allow the manufacturer to complete the manufacture of the bicycles, but instructed the manufacturer to deliver the completed bicycles to A's place of business. Section 2A-524(2) [30-2A-524(2)].

6. Thus, so far A has elected to exercise the remedies referred to in subparagraphs (b) through (d) in subsection (1). None of these remedies bars any of the others because A's election and enforcement merely resulted in A's possession of the bicycles. Had B performed A would have recovered possession of the bicycles. Thus A is in the process of obtaining the benefit of his bargain.

7. A's counsel next would determine what action, if any, should be taken with respect to the goods. As stated in subparagraph (e) [subsection (1)(e) of this section] and as discussed fully in Section 2A-527(1) [30-2A-527(1)] the lessor may, but has no obligation to, dispose of the goods by lease, sale or otherwise. In this case, since A is in the business of leasing and selling bicycles, A will probably inventory the 60 bicycles for its retail trade.

8. A's counsel then will determine which of the various, alternate means of ascertaining A's claim for damages against B will be computed. Subparagraph (e) [subsection (1)(e) of this section] catalogues each relevant section. First, under Section 2A-527(2) [30-2A-527(2)] the amount of A's claim will be computed by comparing the original lease between A and B with any subsequent lease of the bicycles but only if the subsequent lease is substantially similar to the lease contract. While the section does not define this term, the official comment does establish some parameters. If, however, A elects to lease the bicycles to his retail trade, it is unlikely that the resulting lease will be substantially similar to the original, as leases to retail customers are considerably different from leases to wholesale customers like B. If, however, the leases were substantially similar, the damage claim is for accrued and unpaid rent, the present value of the difference between the rent reserved under both leases for the balance of their terms, together with incidental damages less expenses saved in consequence of the lessee's default.

9. If the new lease is not substantially similar or if A elects to sell the bicycles or to hold the bicycles, damages are computed under Section 2A-528 or 2A-529 [30-2A-528 or 30-2A-529].

10. If A elects to pursue his claim under Section 2A-528(1) [30-2A-528(1)] the damage rule is the same as that stated in Section 2A-527(2) [30-2A-527(2)] except that the standard of comparison is not the rent reserved under a substantially similar lease entered into by the lessor but a market rent, as defined in Section 2A-507 [30-2A-507(2)]. Further, if the facts of this hypothetical were more elaborate A may be able to establish that the measure of damage under subsection (1) is inadequate to put him in the same position that B's performance would have, in which case A can claim his lost profits.

11. Yet another alternative for computing A's damage claim against B is prescribed by Section 2A-529 [30-2A-529]. However, to use this formula A must, among other things, hold the bicycles identified in the lease contract for B. Since this would include all 60 bicycles and A is a merchant, it is unlikely to occur. Further, subsection (1)(a), which in essence allows A to receive the present value of the rent reserved under the lease, would in this case apply only to the 20 bicycles accepted by B in May. With respect to the remaining 40 bicycles, subsection 1(b) will apply only if A is unable to dispose of them, or circumstances indicate the effort will be unavailing, in which case the damage formula identical to the one set forth in (1)(a) will apply. At any time up to collection of a judgment by A against B, A may dispose of the bicycles. In such case A's claim for damages against B is governed by Section 2A-527 or 2A-528 [30-2A-527 or 30-2A-528]. Section 2A-529(3) [30-2A-529(3)]. The resulting recalculation of claim should reduce the amount recoverable by A against B. However, the nature of the post-judgment proceedings to resolve this issue, and the sanctions for abuse, if any, will be determined by other law.

12. Finally, if the lease agreement had provided, A's claim against B would not be determined under any of these statutory formulae, but pursuant to a liquidated damages clause. Section 2A-504(1) [30-2A-504(1)].

13. These various methods of computing A's damage claim against B are alternatives. However, the pursuit of any one of these alternatives is not a bar to, nor has it been barred by, A's earlier action to obtain possession of the 60 bicycles. These formulae, which vary as a function of an overt or implied mitigation of damage theory, focus on allowing A a recovery of the benefit of his bargain with B. Had B performed, A would have received the rent as well as the return of the 60 bicycles at the end of the term.

14. Finally, A's counsel should also advise A of his right to cancel the lease contract under subparagraph (a) [subsection (1) (a) of this section]. Section 2A-505(1) [30-2A-505(1)]. Cancellation will discharge all existing obligations but preserve A's rights and remedies.

15. Subsection (2) is new and allows the lessor access to the remedy scheme of this Article as well as that contained in the lease contract if the lessee is in default for reasons other than those stated in subsection (1). Note that the reference to this Article includes supplementary principles of law and equity, e.g., fraud, misrepresentation and duress. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

16. There is no special treatment of the finance lease in this section. Absent supplementary principles of law to the contrary, in most cases the supplier will have no rights or remedies against the defaulting lessee. Section 2A-209(2)(b) [30-2A-209(2)(b)]. Given that the supplier will look to the lessor for payment, this is appropriate. However, there is a specific exception to this rule with respect to the right to identify goods to the lease contract. Section 2A-524(2) [30-2A-524(2)]. The parties are free to create a different result in a particular case. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-102(3)].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1), a revised version of the provisions of Section 2-702(1) [30-2-702(1)], allows the lessor to refuse to deliver goods if the lessee is insolvent. Note that the provisions of Section 2-702(2) [30-2-702(2)], granting the unpaid seller certain rights of reclamation, were not incorporated in this section. Subsection (2) made this unnecessary.

Subsection (2), a revised version of the provisions of Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed, see 30-9A-609], allows the lessor, on default by the lessee, the right to take possession of or reclaim the goods; since the lessee's insolvency is an event of default in a standard lease agreement, subsection (2) is the functional equivalent of Section 2-702(2) [30-2-702(2)]. Further, subsection (2) sanctions the classic crate and delivery clause obligating the lessee to assemble the goods and to make them available to the lessor. Finally, the lessor may leave the goods in place, render them unusable (if they are goods employed in trade or business), and dispose of them on the lessee's premises.

Subsection (3), a revised version of the provisions of Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed, see 30-9A-609], allows the lessor to proceed under subsection (2) without judicial process, absent breach of the peace, or by action. Sections 2A-501(3), 2A-103(4) and 1-201(1) [30-2A-501(3), 30-2A-103(4), and 30-1-201(1)]. In the appropriate case action includes injunctive relief. *Clark Equip. Co. v. Armstrong Equip. 30-2A-527. Lessor's rights to dispose of goods.

Source: Section 2A-527, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-706(1), (5) and (6)[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1), a revised version of the first sentence of subsection 2-706(1) [30-2-706(1)], allows the lessor the right to dispose of goods after default by the lessee (even if the goods remain in the lessee's possession—Section 2A-525(2) [30-2A-525(2)]) or after the lessor refuses to deliver or takes possession of the goods. The lessor's decision to exercise this right is a function of a commercial judgment, not a statutory mandate replete with sanctions for failure to comply. Cf. Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627]. As the owner of the goods, in the case of a lessor, or as the prime lessee of the goods, in the case of a sublessor, compulsory disposition of the goods is inconsistent with the nature of the interest held by the lessor or the sublessor and is not necessary because the interest held by the lessee or the sublessee is not protected by a right of redemption under the common law or this Article. Subsection 2A-527(5) [30-2A-527(5)].

The rule for determining the measure of damages recoverable by the lessor against the lessee is a function of several variables. If the lessor has elected to effect disposition under subsection (1) and such disposition is by lease that qualifies under subsection (2), the measure of damages set forth in subsection (2) will apply, absent agreement to the contrary. Sections 2A-504, 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-504, 30-2A-103(4), and 30-1-102(3), 2003 MCA; see 2005 amendment].

The lessor's damages will be established using the new lease agreement as a measure if the following three criteria are satisfied: (i) the lessor disposed of the goods by lease, (ii) the lease agreement is substantially similar to the original lease agreement, and (iii) such disposition was in good faith, and in a commercially reasonable manner. Thus, the lessor will be entitled to recover from the lessee the accrued and unpaid rent as of the date of default, and the present value, as of the date of default, of the difference between the rent reserved under the new lease and the original lease, together with incidental damages less expenses saved in consequence of the lessee's default. If the lessor's disposition does not satisfy the criteria of subsection (2), the lessor may calculate its claim against the lessee pursuant to Section 2A-528 [30-2A-528]. Section 2A-523(1)(e) [30-2A-523(1)(e)]. Note that the reference in Section 2A-527(2)(a) and (b) [30-2A-527(2)(a) and (2)(b)] is to the date of default not to the date of an event of default. An event of default under a lease agreement becomes a default under a lease agreement only after the expiration of any relevant period of grace and compliance with any notice requirements under this Article and the lease agreement. American Bar Foundation, Commentaries on Indentures, §5-1, at 216-217 (1971). Section 2A-501(1) [30-2A-501(1)]. This conclusion is also a function of whether, as a matter of fact or law, the event of default has been waived, suspended or cured. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

Two of the three criteria to be met by the lessor are familiar, but the concept of the new lease agreement that is substantially similar to the original lease agreement is not. Given the many variables facing a party who intends to lease goods and the rapidity of change in the market place, the policy decision was made not to draft with specificity. It was thought unwise to seek to establish certainty at the cost of fairness. The decision of whether the new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original will be determined case by case.

While the section does not draw a bright line, it is possible to describe some of the factors that should be considered in a finding that a new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original. The various elements of the new lease agreement should be examined. Those elements include the term of the new lease (because the damages are calculated under subsection (2) as the difference between the total rent payable for the entire term of the new lease agreement and the remaining lease term of the original lease); the options to purchase or release; the lessor's representations, warranties and covenants to the lessee as well as those to be provided by the lessee to the lessor; and the services, if any, to be provided by the lessor or by the lessee. All of these factors allocate cost and risk between the lessor and the lessee and thus affect the amount of rent to be paid. These findings should not be made with scientific precision, as they are a function of economics, nor should they be made independently, as it is important that a sense of commercial judgment pervade the finding. See Section 2A-507(2) [30-2A-507(2)]. To establish the new lease as a proper measure of damage under subsection (2), these various factors, taken as a whole, must result in a finding that the new lease agreement is substantially similar to the original.

The following hypothetical illustrates the difficulty of providing a bright line. Assume that A buys a jumbo tractor for $1 million and then leases the tractor to B for a term of 36 months. The tractor is delivered to and is accepted by B on May 1. On June 1 B fails to pay the monthly rent to A. B returns the tractor to A, who immediately releases the tractor to C for a term identical to the term remaining under the lease between A and B. All terms and conditions under the lease between A and C are identical to those under the original lease between A and B, except that C does not provide any property damage or other insurance coverage, and B agreed to provide complete coverage. Coverage is expensive and difficult to obtain. The new lease should be viewed as not substantially similar to the original. However, if the lessor seeks a recovery under Section 2A-528 [30-2A-528] the new lease can be introduced into evidence to establish market rent (Section 2A-507 [30-2A-507]), with a proper allowance for the lessor's cost of replacing the lost insurance coverage.

Subsection (3), which is new, provides that if the lessor's disposition is by lease that does not qualify under subsection (2), or is by sale or otherwise, Section 2A-528 [30-2A-528] governs.

Subsection (4), a revised version of subsection 2-706(5) [30-2-706(5)], applies to protect a subsequent buyer or lessee who buys or leases from the lessor in good faith and for value, pursuant to a disposition under this section. Note that by its terms, the rule in subsection 2A-304(1) [30-2A-304(1)], which provides that the subsequent lessee takes subject to the original lease contract, is controlled by the rule stated in this subsection.

Subsection (5), a revised version of subsection 2-706(6) [30-2-706(6)], provides that the lessor is not accountable to the lessee for any profit made by the lessor on a disposition. This rule follows from the fundamental premise of the bailment for hire that the lessee under a lease of goods has no equity of redemption to protect.

30-2A-528. Lessor's damages for nonacceptance, failure to pay, repudiation, or other default.

Official Comment

Source: Section 2A-528, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-708[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1), a substantially revised version of Section 2-708(1) [30-2-708(1)], states the basic rule governing the measure of lessor's damages for non-acceptance or repudiation by the lessee; repudiation is defined (Section 2A-402 [30-2A-402]) to include the lessee's post acceptance default for failure to pay rent and the like. Section 2A-523(1) [30-2A-523(1)]. This measure will apply if the lessor elects to retain the goods (whether undelivered, returned by the lessee, or repossessed by the lessor after acceptance and default by the lessee) or if the lessor's disposition does not qualify under subsection 2A-527(2) [30-2A-527(2)]. Section 2A-527(3) [30-2A-527(3)]. Note that under some of these conditions, the lessor may recover damages from the lessee pursuant to the rule set forth in Section 2A-529 [30-2A-529]. There is no sanction for disposition that does not qualify under subsection 2A-527(2) [30-2A-527(2)]. Application of the rule set forth in this section is subject to agreement to the contrary. Sections 2A-504, 2A-103(4) and 1-102(3) [30-2A-504, 30-2A-103(4), and 30-1-102(3), 2003 MCA; see 2005 amendment].

The measure of damage is the accrued and unpaid rent as of the date of default together with the present value, as of the date of default, of the difference between market rent and the original rent for the remaining term of the lease, and incidental damages, less expenses saved in consequence of the default. Note that the reference in Section 2A-528(1)(a) and (b) [30-2A-528(1)(a) and (1)(b)] is to the date of default not to the date of an event of default. An event of default under a lease agreement becomes a default under a lease agreement only after the expiration of any relevant period of grace and compliance with any notice requirements under this Article and the lease agreement. American Bar Foundation, Commentaries on Indentures, §5-1, at 216-217 (1971). Section 2A-501(1) [30-2A-501(1)]. This conclusion is also a function of whether, as a matter of fact or law, the event of default has been waived, suspended or cured. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-103 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-103].

Market rent will be computed pursuant to Section 2A-507 [30-2A-507]. In the case of a default by the lessee, the time for tender should be interpreted as the date of the default. If, as of the date of default, the lessor has attempted and failed to obtain possession of the goods, the lessor has, among various additional rights and remedies, a cause of action against the lessee for damages due to loss of use of possession of the goods between the date of default and the date the lessor obtains possession of the goods. Sections 2A-525(3), 2A-103(4), 1-201(1) [30-2A-525(3), 30-2A-103(4), and 30-1-201(1)]. See also Section 2A-530 [30-2A-530]. This conclusion is critical to an important policy decision to protect the lessor's residual interest in the goods. Section 2A-103(1)(q) [30-2A-103(1)(q)].

Subsection (2), a somewhat revised version of the provisions of subsection 2-708(2) [30-2-708(2)], states a measure of damages which applies in each case that subsection (1) applies but the measure of damages in subsection (1) is inadequate to put the lessor in as good a position as performance would have. The measure of damage is the lessor's profit, including overhead, together with incidental damages, with allowance for costs reasonably incurred and credit for payments or proceeds of disposition. In determining the amount of due credit with respect to proceeds of disposition a proper value should be attributed to the lessor's residual interest in the goods. Sections 2A-103(1)(q) and 2A-507(4) [30-2A-103(1)(q) and 30-2A-507(4)].

In calculating profit, a court should include any expected appreciation of the goods, e.g. the foal of a leased brood mare. Because this subsection is intended to give the lessor the benefit of the bargain, a court should consider any reasonable benefit or profit expected by the lessor from the performance of the lease agreement. See Honeywell, Inc. v. Lithonia Lighting, Inc., 317 F.Supp. 406, 413 (N.D.Ga.1970); Locks v. Wade, 36 N.J.Super. 128, 131, 114 A.2d 875, 877 (Super.Ct.App.Div.1955). Further, in calculating profit the concept of present value should be given effect. Taylor v. Commercial Credit Equip. Corp., 170 Ga.App. 322, 316 S.E.2d 788 (Ct.App.1984). See generally Section 2A-103(1)(u) [30-2A-103(1)(u)].

30-2A-529. Lessor's action for rent.

Source: Section 2A-529, U.C.C.

Uniform Statutory Source: Section 2-709[, U.C.C.].

Changes: Substantially revised.

Purposes: Subsection (1) provides another method of determining the measure of lessor's damages after default by the lessee. Absent agreement to the contrary (Section 2A-504 [30-2A-504]), this Article provides the lessor, in this section and the two preceding sections, three alternate methods of computing damages recoverable from the defaulting lessee (Section 2A-523(1)(e) [30-2A-523(1)(e)]). This section, as well as the two preceding sections, applies to goods subject to the lease, even if such goods have been repossessed from the lessee or otherwise (Section 2A-525(2) [30-2A-525(2)]). This is a departure from Section 2-709 [30-2-709], the statutory analogue. The departure is not surprising given the essential difference between a sale and a lease.

Absent the right to repossess the goods, the recovery stated in subsection (1)(a) would not compensate the lessor for his or her loss. Consider a lease of a carpet cleaner by A to B, for a term of two days. A purchased the carpet cleaner for $500.00. The rent for the two day term is $75.00. If B defaulted by not paying the rent and refusing to return the carpet cleaner and A was not allowed to repossess the carpet cleaner, the measure of damage stated in this section would allow a recovery of not more than $75.00, together with incidental damages. The rule stated in this Article, which allows the lessor the right to repossess the goods from the lessee and to recover damages, is consistent with the lessor's ownership of the goods. DeKoven, Proceedings After Default by the Lessee Under a True Lease of Equipment, in 1C P. Coogan, W. Hogan, D. Vagts, Secured Transactions Under the Uniform Commercial Code, §29B.06[4] (1986). The statutory analogue, Section 2-709 [30-2-709], only provides an action for the price of the goods sold, which is consistent with the seller's agreement to dispose of all of his or her right, title and interest in the goods to the buyer. That measure of damage would not have been appropriate here as the lessor's agreement is to dispose of possession and use of the goods for a term; the bargain includes the return of the goods at the end of the term. It would be anomalous to allow the lessee to improve on the bargain, i.e. retain the goods, solely by virtue of his or her default, even if that had been balanced by allowing the lessor to sue to recover the price or value of the goods.

The measure of the lessor's damages under this section is a function of a two-part rule. First, subparagraph (1)(a) establishes a rule of recovery with respect to goods accepted by the lessee (even if repossessed by the lessor) and with respect to conforming goods lost or damaged within a commercially reasonable time after risk of loss passed to the lessee. Thus, reading subsections (1), (2) and (3) together, if accepted goods are repossessed by the lessor and the lessor holds the goods for the lessee for the balance of the term, lessor's damages will be calculated pursuant to subsection (1)(a); if the lessor leases, sells or otherwise disposes of the goods, subsection (1)(a) is inapplicable and the lessor's damages will be calculated pursuant to Section 2A-528 [30-2A-528], unless the lessor's disposition was by a substantially similar lease, in which case Section 2A-527(2) [30-2A-527(2)] applies. Second, subparagraph (1)(b) establishes a rule of recovery with respect to goods identified to the lease contract (but not accepted by the lessee—see subparagraph (1)(a)) only if the lessor is unable, after reasonable effort, to dispose of them at a reasonable price, or if circumstances indicate the effort would be unavailing.

As a condition to the lessor's election to employ the method to measure the lessor's claim against the lessee set forth in subsection (1), the lessor must comply with subsection (2), which provides that, with one exception, goods identified to the lease contract and in the lessor's control (whether as a result of repossession or otherwise) must be held for the lessee for the balance of the lease term. This eliminates the possibility of a double recovery by the lessor and preserves the value of the leasehold estate to the lessee.

Subsection (3) creates an exception to the requirement set forth as a condition to subsection (1), that goods identified to the contract and in the lessor's control be held by the lessor. (Section 2A-529(2) [30-2A-529(2)]). If the lessor disposes of those goods prior to collection of the judgment (whether as a matter of law or agreement), the lessor's recovery is governed by the measure of damages in Section 2A-527 [30-2A-527] if the disposition is by lease that is substantially similar to the original lease, or otherwise by the measure of damages in Section 2A-528 [30-2A-528]. Section 2A-523 [30-2A-523] official comment Number 11.

The relationship between subsections (2) and (3) is best stated by examining a hypothetical. Assume the lease is for a term of two years and after default by the lessee the lessor recovers the goods from the lessee and obtains judgment against the lessee for damages pursuant to subsection (1). If the lessor holds the goods so recovered until the end of the two year term, any subsequent disposition will have no effect on the lessor's judgment. If, however, the lessor determines that the lessee is judgment proof, the lessor might be wise to dispose of the goods before the end of the remaining lease term, even though the amount that the lessor then will be allowed to recover from the lessee, as determined by the provisions of Section 2A-527 or 2A-528 [30-2A-527 or 30-2A-528], is less than the judgment. Subsection (3) allows the lessor to make this election at any time before collection of the judgment.

Subsection (4), which is new, further reinforces the requisites of Subsection (2). In the event the judgment for damages obtained by the lessor against the lessee pursuant to subsection (1) is satisfied, the lessee regains the right to use and possession of the remaining goods for the balance of the original lease term; a partial satisfaction of the judgment creates no right in the lessee to use and possession of the goods.

The relationship between subsections (2) and (4) is important to understand. Subsection (2) requires the lessor to hold for the lessee identified goods in the lessor's possession. Absent agreement to the contrary, whether in the lease or otherwise, under most circumstances the requirement that the lessor hold the goods for the lessee for the term will mean that the lessor is not allowed to use them. Sections 2A-103(4) and 1-203 [30-2A-103(4) and 30-1-203]. Further, the lessor's use of the goods could be viewed as a disposition of the goods that would bar the lessor from recovery under this section, remitting the lessor to the two preceding sections for a determination of the lessor's claim for damages against the lessee.

Subsection (5), the analogue of subsection 2-709(3) [30-2-709(3)], further reinforces the thrust of subsection (3) by stating that a lessor who is held not entitled to rent under this section has not elected a remedy; the lessor must be awarded damages under Sections 2A-527 and 2A-528 [30-2A-527 and 30-2A-528]. This is a function of two significant policies of this Article—that resort to a remedy is optional, unless expressly agreed to be exclusive (Section 2A-503(2) [30-2A-503(2)]) and that rights and remedies provided in this Article are cumulative. (Section 2A-501(2) and (4) [30-2A-501(2) and (4)]).

Chapter Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Superior Rights as Between Holder of Perfected Security Interest in Collateral and Purchaser of Collateral: Equipment owned by Gauvin and used to secure a promissory note with American Federal Savings and Loan Association (American) was sold to Madison Valley Properties, Inc. (Madison). Upon receipt of the proceeds, Gauvin's girlfriend contacted American for a payoff amount on the promissory note. Gauvin then took a cashier's check from the sale proceeds and converted it to another cashier's check at Valley Bank of Helena (Valley) made out to American for the payoff amount. The check was delivered to American, but later that same day, Valley informed American that the cashier's check had been purchased with stolen funds and was void. American returned the check to Valley, and as a result, the loan was not paid or the lien on the equipment released. American sued Gauvin to recover on the note and sued Madison to recover the equipment. Madison counterclaimed, seeking to quiet title. Summary judgment was granted Madison under the rationale that Madison had superior rights in the collateral equipment. Although American initially received the Valley check in good faith and without notice of the underlying theft, once it was advised of the theft, American could not go forward in good faith and without notice of an adverse claim and Valley's defenses. At the time that it received notice, American still had time and was able to reverse the administrative steps that it had taken to process the loan payment. Notice of the theft could not simply be ignored; therefore, American was required to suspend performance. If it had proceeded in the face of the notice, American could not have claimed holder-in-due-course status. The District Court erred by not first determining whether American was a holder in due course of the cashier's check. Under 30-3-301(1)(a) or (1)(c), American was not a holder in due course because American did not give value. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the summary judgment award of superior rights in the collateral to Madison. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Madison Valley Properties, Inc., 1998 MT 93, 288 M 365, 958 P2d 57, 55 St. Rep. 366 (1998).

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Proof of Validity of Debt — Court Discretion to Post Security: Former 30-3-804 (repealed 1991) authorized but did not compel a court to require security indemnifying an obligor against loss by reason of further claims on a lost, destroyed, or stolen instrument. Therefore, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to order plaintiff to post security when the note was not endorsed. In this case, proof of ownership and of the terms of the note was supplied in the parties' security agreement, which was attached to the complaint. Plaintiff supplied a photocopy of the original note. Having met the burden of proof as to the validity of the debt, plaintiff was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Owen v. Ostrum, 259 M 249, 855 P2d 1015, 50 St. Rep. 779 (1993).

Interest in Negotiable Instruments Not Joint Tenancy Interest: To create a joint tenancy interest in a negotiable instrument, there must be an express declaration in the instrument declaring the ownership to be a joint tenancy in order to comply with 70-1-307. In this case, the Supreme Court affirmed a District Court decision, on remand, that the Uniform Commercial Code (Title 30, chapters 1 through 9A) does not provide for joint tenancy interests in negotiable instruments made payable to more than one person and that the use of the term "joint payee" does not create a joint tenancy interest. Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 219 M 323, 711 P2d 1364, 42 St. Rep. 2056 (1985), modifying Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 207 M 248, 675 P2d 83, 40 St. Rep. 2015 (1983).

Action on Promissory Notes Held in Trust — Real Party in Interest: The plaintiff bank filed an action to collect payment on four promissory notes, and the defendant contended that the bank was not a real party in interest to the case. The Supreme Court found that the District Court's finding that the plaintiff was the holder of legal title to each of the promissory notes and that it was therefore a real party in interest was supported by substantial evidence in both the transcripts and exhibits. First Nat'l Bank & Trust of Wibaux v. Sec. Bank, 199 M 168, 648 P2d 1166, 39 St. Rep. 1270 (1982).

Failure to Timely Pay Draft — Cancellation of Oil and Gas Lease: Failure of lessee to timely pay a draft executed at the same time as an oil and gas lease was sufficient justification for cancellation of the lease. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Scope of Law:

The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law deals with negotiable instruments only so long as they are in the hands of holders in due course; if in other hands, they are subject to the same defenses as if nonnegotiable. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

The provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Law deal with negotiable instruments, and not with instruments nonnegotiable in character. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

Insofar as the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Law are clear and unambiguous, they are controlling in the determination of rights of the parties to negotiable paper. Brophy Groc. Co. v. Wilson, 45 M 489, 124 P 510 (1912).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1(5), 128 and 191, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] defines some common terms used throughout the Article that are not defined by present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] and adds the definitions of "order" and "promise" found in present Section 3-102(1)(b) and (c) [30-3-102(1)(b) and (1)(c) prior to 1991 revision, now 30-3-102(1)(f) and (1)(i)].

2. The definition of "order" includes an instruction given by the signer to itself. The most common example of this kind of order is a cashier's check which is a draft with respect to which the drawer and drawee are the same bank or branches of the same bank. Present Section 3-118(a) [30-3-118, now repealed] treats a cashier's check as a note. It states "a draft drawn on the drawer is effective as a note." Although it is technically more correct to treat a cashier's check as a promise by the issuing bank to pay rather than an order to pay, a cashier's check is in the form of a check and it is normally referred to as a check. Thus, proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] follows banking practice in treating a cashier's check as both a draft and a check rather than a note. Some insurance companies also follow the practice of issuing drafts in which the drawer draws on itself and make [sic] the draft payable at or through a bank. These instruments are treated as drafts.

An order may be addressed to more than one person as drawee either jointly or in the alternative. The authorization of alternative drawees follows present Section 3-102(1)(b) [30-3-102(1)(b) prior to 1991 revision, now 30-3-102(1)(f)] and recognizes the practice of drawers, such as corporations issuing dividend checks, who for commercial convenience name a number of drawees, usually in different parts of the country. Section 3-501(b)(1) [30-3-504(2)(a)] provides that presentment may be made to any one of multiple drawees. Drawees in succession are not permitted because the holder should not be required to make more than one presentment. Dishonor by any drawee named in the draft entitles the holder to rights of recourse against the drawer or indorsers.

3. The last sentence of subsection (a)(9) [subsection (1)(i) of this section] is intended to make it clear that an I.O.U. or other written acknowledgement of indebtedness is not a note unless there is also an undertaking to pay the obligation.

4. Subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d) of this section] introduces a definition of good faith to apply to Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] uses the definition in Section 1-201(19) [30-1-201(19)]. The definition in subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d) of this section] is consistent with the definitions of good faith applicable to Articles 2, 2A, 4, and 4A [Title 30, chapters 2, 2A, 4, and 4A].

5. In subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] reference is made to a new definition of "bank" in amended Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4].

Case Notes

Bank to Exercise Ordinary Care in Settling Checks — Common Law That Bank Exercise Ordinary Care in Processing Checks Preempted by Uniform Commercial Code: Hughes brought common-law claims against a bank for failing to exercise ordinary care in processing checks and for communications that the bank made regarding check processing. A bank that receives a check from a depositor must use ordinary care, as defined in the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.), in settling those checks. However, when a check is processed by automated means, reasonable commercial standards do not require the bank to examine the check, subject to certain exceptions. To the extent that common-law claims relate to processing checks, the specific provisions of the U.C.C. prevail, so Hughes' claims regarding the propriety of the bank's check processing were preempted. However, because the U.C.C. does not address misrepresentation in communications, Hughes' common-law and equitable claims for negligence were not preempted by the U.C.C., and the District Court committed reversible error by failing to consider whether common-law and equitable principles supplement the U.C.C.-defined duty of ordinary care with respect to the bank's representations about the check settlement process. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006).

Disqualification of Expert Witness for Lack of Knowledge of Uniform Commercial Code Standard of Ordinary Care: This section defines a bank's duty of ordinary care with respect to the community in which the bank is situated. Defendant's expert witness was well qualified by education, special training, and experience in banking policies and procedures, but had no knowledge of the commercial standards prevailing in the area where plaintiff bank was located, so the District Court did not err in disqualifying the expert for lack of knowledge of the Uniform Commercial Code standard of ordinary care. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006), distinguishing Burlingham v. Mintz, 270 M 277, 891 P2d 527 (1995).

Withdrawal Slip Not Considered Check or Order: On appeal from a conviction of issuing a bad check for writing savings withdrawal forms as checks, the Supreme Court found that withdrawal slips negotiated through deception did not meet the definition of check found in 30-3-104 or the definition of order found in this section. Conviction under 45-6-316 was reversed because defendant should properly have been charged with theft. St. v. Taylor, 229 M 138, 745 P2d 337, 44 St. Rep. 1843 (1987).

30-3-104. Negotiable instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-104, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 1, 5, 10, 126, 184 and 185, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. The definition of "negotiable instrument" defines the scope of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] since Section 3-102 [30-3-124] states: "This Article applies to negotiable instruments." The definition in Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] incorporates other definitions in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. An instrument is either a "promise," defined in Section 3-103(a)(9) [30-3-102(1)(i)], or "order," defined in Section 3-103(a)(6) [30-3-102(1)(f)]. A promise is a written undertaking to pay money signed by the person undertaking to pay. An order is a written instruction to pay money signed by the person giving the instruction. Thus, the term "negotiable instrument" is limited to a signed writing that orders or promises payment of money. "Money" is defined in Section 1-201(24) [30-1-201(24)], and it includes foreign money as well as United States dollars. Five other requirements are stated in Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)]: First, the promise or order must be "unconditional." The quoted term is explained in Section 3-106 [30-3-105]. Second, the amount of money must be "a fixed amount . . . with or without interest or other charges described in the promise or order." Section 3-112(b) [30-3-128(2)] relates to "interest." Third, the promise or order must be "payable to bearer or to order." The quoted phrase is explained in Section 3-109 [30-3-111]. An exception to this requirement is stated in subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. Fourth, the promise or order must be payable "on demand or at a definite time." The quoted phrase is explained in Section 3-108 [30-3-108 and 30-3-109]. Fifth, the promise or order may not state "any other undertaking or instruction by the person promising or ordering payment to do any act in addition to the payment of money" with three exceptions. The quoted phrase is based on the first sentence of N.I.L. Section 5 which is the precursor of "no other promise, order, obligation or power given by the maker or drawer" appearing in present Section 3-104(1)(b) [30-3-104(1)(b) prior to 1991 revision]. The words "instruction" and "undertaking" are used instead of "order" and "promise" that are used in the N.I.L. formulation because the latter words are defined terms that include only orders or promises to pay money. The three exceptions stated in proposed Section 3-104(a)(3) [30-3-104(1)(c)] are based on present Section 3-112(1)(b), (c), (d), and (e) [30-3-112, now repealed], as well as N.I.L. Section 5(1), (2), and (3). Subsection (b) [30-3-104(2)] states that "instrument" means "negotiable instrument." This follows present Section 3-102(1)(e) [30-3-102(1)(e) prior to 1991 revision] which treats the two terms as synonymous.

2. Unless subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies, the effect of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] and Section 3-102 [30-3-124] is to exclude from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] any promise or order that is not payable to bearer or to order. There is no provision in proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] that is comparable to present Section 3-805 [30-3-805, now repealed]. The comment to present Section 3-805 [30-3-805, now repealed] states that the typical example of a writing covered by Section 3-805 [30-3-805, now repealed] is a check reading "Pay John Doe." Such a check is governed by present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] but there can not be a holder in due course of the check. Under proposed Section 3-104(c) [30-3-104(3)] such a check is governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] and there can be a holder in due course of the check. But subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies only to checks. The comment to present Section 3-805 [30-3-805, now repealed] does not state any example other than the check to illustrate that section. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is based on the belief that it is good policy to treat checks, that are payment instruments, as negotiable instruments whether or not they contain the words "to the order of". These words are almost always pre-printed on the check form. Occasionally the drawer of a check may strike out these words before issuing the check. In the past some credit unions used check forms that did not contain the quoted words. Such check forms may still be in use but they are no longer common. Absence of the quoted words can easily be overlooked and should not affect the rights of holders who may pay money or give credit for a check without being aware that it is not in the conventional form.

Total exclusion from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] of other promises or orders that are not payable to bearer or to order serves a useful purpose. It provides a simple device to exclude a writing that does not fit the pattern of typical negotiable instruments and which is not intended to be a negotiable instrument. If a writing could be an instrument despite the absence of "to order" or "to bearer" language, when a dispute arises with respect to the writing, it might be argued that the writing is a negotiable instrument because the other requirements of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] are somehow met. Even if the argument is eventually found to be without merit it can be used as a litigation ploy. Words making a promise or order payable to bearer or to order are the most distinguishing feature of a negotiable instrument and such words are frequently referred to as "words of negotiability." Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] is not meant to apply to contracts for the sale of goods or services or the sale or lease of real property or similar writings that may contain a promise to pay money. The use of words of negotiability in such contracts would be an aberration. Absence of the words precludes any argument that such contracts might be negotiable instruments.

An order or promise which is excluded from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] because of the requirements of Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] may nevertheless be similar to a negotiable instrument in many respects. Although such a writing cannot be made a negotiable instrument within Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] by contract or conduct of its parties, nothing in Section 3-104 [30-3-104] or in Section 3-102 [30-3-124] is intended to mean that in a particular case involving such a writing a court could not arrive at a result similar to the result that would follow if the writing were a negotiable instrument. For example, a court might find that the obligor with respect to a promise that does not fall within Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] is precluded from asserting a defense against a bona fide purchaser. The preclusion could be based on estoppel or ordinary principles of contract. It does not depend upon the law of negotiable instruments. An example is stated in the paragraph following Case #2 in Comment 4 to Section 3-302 [30-3-302].

Moreover, consistent with the principle stated in Section 1-102(2)(b) [30-1-102(2)(b)], the immediate parties to an order or promise that is not an instrument may provide by agreement that one or more of the provisions of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] determine their rights and obligations under the writing. Upholding the parties' choice is not inconsistent with Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Such an agreement may bind a transferee of the writing if the transferee has notice of it or the agreement arises from usage of trade and the agreement does not violate other law or public policy. An example of such an agreement is a provision that a transferee of the writing has the rights of a holder in due course stated in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] if the transferee took rights under the writing in good faith, for value, and without notice of a claim or defense.

Even without an agreement of the parties to an order or promise that is not an instrument, it may be appropriate, consistent with the principles stated in Section 1-102(2) [30-1-102(2)], for a court to apply one or more provisions of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] to the writing by analogy, taking into account the expectations of the parties and the differences between the writing and an instrument governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Whether such application is appropriate depends upon the facts of each case.

3. There is no concept of a "nonnegotiable instrument" in proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. That term is not used because the term is ambiguous and in practice is used with quite different meanings. The term is often used to refer to an order or promise with respect to which there cannot be a holder in due course but which is transferable by indorsement. For example, that term can refer to an order or promise that would be an instrument except for the fact that "to order or to bearer" is not used. Under present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] the order or promise is an instrument covered by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] but there can't be a holder in due course. Present Section 3-805 [30-3-805, now repealed]. That term has also been used to refer to promissory notes with a variable interest rate. Such a note is not covered by present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] at all. Another meaning of "nonnegotiable instrument" refers to an order or promise to pay money that is transferable by indorsement and delivery and which is enforced by the special rules of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] whether or not the holder-in-due-course doctrine applies. This describes many notes under present law which meet the requirements of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], but with respect to which case law or statute abolishes the holder-in-due-course doctrine to protect a particular class of issuers of instruments such as notes given in consumer transactions. Sometimes the word "nonnegotiable" stamped across what appears to be a check or note is meant to indicate that the writing is only a copy of an instrument or is only a specimen that is not meant to represent any legal rights. Proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] thus avoids this ambiguous term altogether and does not take any position with respect to the effect of a statement in an instrument that it is nonnegotiable.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] provides a device that can be used to exclude from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] a writing that would otherwise be an instrument under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. The effect under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is not only to negate the possibility of a holder in due course, but to prevent the writing from being a negotiable instrument for any purpose. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] does not, however, apply to a check.

5. Instruments are divided into two general categories: drafts and notes. A draft is an instrument that is an order. A note is an instrument that is a promise. Section 3-104(e) [30-3-104(5)]. Subsections (f) through (j) [subsections (6) through (10) of this section] define particular instruments that fall within the categories of draft and note. The term "draft," defined in subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section], includes a "check" which is defined in subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section]. "Check" includes a share draft drawn on a credit union payable through a bank because the definition of bank (Section 4-104 [30-4-104]) includes credit unions. However, a draft drawn on an insurance company payable through a bank is not a check because it is not drawn on a bank. The definition of "check" in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] is different from the definition of "check" in Regulation CC Section 229.2. "Teller's check" is separately defined in subsection (h) [subsection (8) of this section]. A teller's check is always drawn by a bank and is usually drawn on another bank. In some cases a teller's check is drawn on a nonbank but is made payable at or through a bank. Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] treats both types of teller's check identically, and both are included in the definition of "check." A cashier's check, defined in subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section], is also included in the definition of "check." The term "bill of exchange" is not used in proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. It is generally understood to be a synonym for the term "draft." Certificates of deposit are treated in present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] as a separate type of instrument. Proposed Section 3-104(j) [30-3-104(10)] treats them as notes.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Form of negotiable instruments — "draft" — "check" — "certificate of deposit" — "note". (1) Any writing to be a negotiable instrument within this chapter must:

(a) be signed by the maker or drawer; and

(b) contain an unconditional promise or order to pay a sum certain in money and no other promise, order, obligation or power given by the maker or drawer except as authorized by this chapter; and

(c) be payable on demand or at a definite time; and

(d) be payable to order or to bearer.

(2) A writing which complies with the requirements of this section is:

(a) a "draft" ("bill of exchange") if it is an order;

(b) a "check" if it is a draft drawn on a bank and payable on demand;

(c) a "certificate of deposit" if it is an acknowledgment by a bank of receipt of money with an engagement to repay it;

(d) a "note" if it is a promise other than a certificate of deposit.

(3) As used in other chapters of this code, and as the context may require, the terms "draft", "check", "certificate of deposit" and "note" may refer to instruments which are not negotiable within this chapter as well as to instruments which are so negotiable."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Elements of Issuing Bad Checks Supportive of Information: The County Attorney filed an information against McWilliams for issuing bad checks in connection with a construction business. McWilliams asserted that the information should be dismissed because the series of transactions involving the checks were an illegal series of deferred deposit loans, so McWilliams could not be criminally prosecuted. However, 31-1-723, which prohibits deferred deposit loans, applies only to licensees under Title 31, ch. 1, part 7. None of the parties involved were licensees, so the statute did not apply. McWilliams also contended that the checks did not meet the definition of negotiable instruments in 30-3-104 because they were not payable on demand, but rather were in the nature of a future promise. However, the checks contained no restrictive endorsement, and although the parties to whom the checks were written agreed to refrain from cashing them immediately, the checks were in fact payable on demand and met the statutory definition. McWilliams also cited 45-2-211 in arguing a consent defense because the parties consented to take the checks and hold them, but that argument also failed because even though the parties agreed to hold the checks, they did not consent to nonpayment or to having McWilliams stop payment altogether. McWilliams next asserted that under St. v. Patterson, 75 M 315, 243 P 355 (1926), the information was defective because it contained no assertion of an intent to defraud. The statutory language under which Patterson was charged in 1926 required a showing of intent to defraud, but the current statute, 45-6-316, contains no intent to defraud element, so the information was not defective in that regard. There was sufficient evidence to charge McWilliams with issuing bad checks, and the District Court did not err in denying McWilliams' pretrial motion to dismiss the information. St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Withdrawal Slip Not Considered Check or Order: On appeal from a conviction of issuing a bad check for writing savings withdrawal forms as checks, the Supreme Court found that withdrawal slips negotiated through deception did not meet the definition of check found in this section or the definition of order found in 30-3-102. Conviction under 45-6-316 was reversed because defendant should properly have been charged with theft. St. v. Taylor, 229 M 138, 745 P2d 337, 44 St. Rep. 1843 (1987).

Partial Enforcement of Promissory Note: Respondent signed a promissory note to her former husband in the amount of $2,000. She did not make any payments on the note. At trial, she testified that the only consideration she had received for the note was $1,000 and the use of a pickup. Thus, the lower court's decision to enforce the note only partially was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Statutory Elements Required: At the time Croft and Starhaven Ranch, Ltd., entered a ranch purchase agreement, David Erickson signed an itemized list of personal property setting an evaluation of the items listed on behalf of Starhaven. Croft assigned his interest in the list to defendant. After default, defendant brought a foreclosure action and contended the list was a promissory note. The list contained no promise to pay, no date for payment, and was not made payable to order or bearer. The document was not a promissory note and could not support a judgment against either Erickson or Starhaven. On rehearing, the court rejected the bank's contention that, even if not a promissory note, the list is an enforceable contract. Erickson v. First Nat'l Bank, 215 M 350, 697 P2d 1332, 42 St. Rep. 423 (1985).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Determination of Negotiability — Check Torn and Repaired: Tearing of check and its repair did not constitute a "spoliation" which would render it nonnegotiable, and the fact that it was so torn before being cashed by defendant afforded no ground for relieving him from liability for grand larceny and subsequently for forgery in endorsing it. St. v. Romero, 146 M 77, 404 P2d 500 (1965).

Determinable Time for Payment: A chattel mortgage, which provided that balance should become due without notice if customer defaulted on any obligation under the mortgage or if the holder should consider the indebtedness or the car insecure, was not a negotiable instrument as it was not payable at a determinable future time. Sonnek v. Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp., 140 M 503, 374 P2d 105 (1962).

Proof of Negotiability: Where in an action on a trade acceptance the instrument contained all the elements necessary under section 55-201, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), to constitute it a negotiable one and was introduced in evidence, it spoke for itself and proof of its negotiability was unnecessary. Best v. Boyer, 98 M 40, 37 P2d 331 (1934).

Effect of Clause Providing Interest After Due Date: Inclusion in a promissory note of the clause "Interest or principal not paid when due, to draw interest thereafter at ten per cent per annum until paid", did not destroy its negotiability. Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Cashiers Check — No Trust Relationship: A cashier's check is a draft or bill of exchange drawn by a bank upon itself or some other bank in which funds of the former are deposited; it represents credit which the purchaser of such a check buys. The money paid the issuing bank becomes the bank's money, the transaction being one of purchase and sale, and no trust relationship is thereby established. Mont.-Wyo. Ass'n of Credit Men v. Commercial Nat'l Bank, 80 M 174, 259 P 1060 (1927).

Federal, State, or Municipal Corporation Bonds: Coupon liberty bonds are negotiable instruments within the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, but registered bonds are not. Grosfield v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 73 M 219, 236 P 250 (1925).

Provision for Costs in Note — "Attorney's Fee" and "Costs of Collection" Interchangeable: A promissory note containing a provision for the payment of an attorney's fee and costs of collection, instead of the statutory phrase "with costs of collection or an attorney's fee", was not thereby rendered nonnegotiable. The words "attorney's fee" and "costs of collection" in this connection mean the same thing, so that the use of both of them in the conjunctive imposed no greater burden upon the maker than their use in the disjunctive would have done. Wood v. Ferguson, 71 M 540, 230 P 592 (1924).

Time of Payment Uncertain: A 6-months' promissory note containing an accelerating clause to the effect that "in the event of insolvency of either maker or endorsers, or the institution of suit or attachment against them or either of them, or the mortgaging of any property by the makers or endorsers", the note might be declared immediately due and payable was nonnegotiable in that it left the time when payable uncertain and indefinite. Great Falls Nat'l Bank v. Young, 67 M 328, 215 P 651 (1923).

Payment in Money: A promissory note legally imports a promise to pay in money and nothing else. First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597, 9 ALR 1139 (1918).

Requirements for Negotiability: To constitute an instrument a negotiable one, it must, under section 55-1701, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), be in writing, signed by the maker, contain an unconditional promise to pay a certain sum in money, and be payable on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time, to order or bearer. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City v. Barrett, 52 M 359, 157 P 951 (1916).

Description of Nonnegotiable Note as Negotiable: A provision in a note that it is negotiable at a particular bank is not a waiver of the effect of a stipulation for payment of attorney's fees in case of suit, which, under other statutory provisions, renders the note nonnegotiable. Stadler v. First Nat'l Bank, 22 M 190, 56 P 111 (1898), explained in Bullard v. Smith, 28 M 387, 72 P 761 (1903) and Cornish v. Woolverton, 32 M 456, 81 P 4 (1905).

30-3-105. Unconditional promise or order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-106, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 3, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This provision replaces present Section 3-105 [30-3-105]. Its purpose is to define when a promise or order fulfills the requirement in Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] that it be an "unconditional" promise or order to pay. Under Section 3-106(a) [30-3-106, now repealed] a promise or order is deemed to be unconditional unless one of the two tests of the subsection make the promise or order conditional. If the promise or order states an express condition to payment, the promise or order is not an instrument. For example, a promise states, "I promise to pay $100,000 to the order of John Doe if he conveys title to Blackacre to me." The promise is not an instrument because there is an express condition to payment. However, suppose a promise states, "In consideration of John Doe's promise to convey title to Blackacre I promise to pay $100,000 to the order of John Doe." That promise can be an instrument if Section 3-104 [30-3-104] is otherwise satisfied. Although the recital of the executory promise of Doe to convey Blackacre might be read as an implied condition that the promise be performed, the condition is not an express condition as required by Section 3-106(a)(i) [30-3-106, now repealed]. This result is consistent with present Section 3-105(1)(a) and (b) [30-3-105(1)(a) and (1)(b) prior to 1991 revision]. Present Section 3-105(1)(b) [30-3-105(1)(b) prior to 1991 revision] is not repeated in Section 3-106 [30-3-105] because it is not necessary. It is an example of an implied condition. The first clause of present Section 3-105(1)(c) [30-3-105(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision] and present Section 3-105(1)(d), (e), and (f) [30-3-105(1)(d) through (1)(f) prior to 1991 revision] are other examples of implied conditions. They are not repeated in Section 3-106 [30-3-105] because they are not necessary. The law is not changed.

Section 3-106(a)(ii) [30-3-105(1)(a)(ii)] is a restatement of present Section 3-105(2)(a) [30-3-105(2)(a) prior to 1991 revision]. The only change is the use of "writing" instead of "agreement" and a broadening of the language that can result in conditionality. For example, a promissory note is not an instrument defined by Section 3-104 [30-3-104] if it contains any of the following statements: 1. "This note is subject to a contract of sale dated April 1, 1990 between the payee and maker of this note." 2. "This note is subject to a loan and security agreement dated April 1, 1990 between the payee and maker of this note." 3. ["]Rights and obligations of the parties with respect to this note are stated in an agreement dated April 1, 1990 between the payee and maker of this note." It is not relevant whether any condition to payment is or is not stated in the writing to which reference is made. The rationale is that the holder of a negotiable instrument should not be required to examine another document to determine rights with respect to payment. But subsection (b)(i) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] permits reference to a separate writing for information with respect to collateral, prepayment, or acceleration.

Many notes issued in commercial transactions are secured by collateral, are subject to acceleration in the event of default, or are subject to prepayment. A statement of rights and obligations concerning collateral, prepayment, or acceleration does not prevent the note from being an instrument if the statement is in the note itself. See Section 3-104(a)(3) [30-3-104(1)(c)] and Section 3-108(b) [30-3-109(1)]. In some cases it may be convenient not to include a statement concerning collateral, prepayment, or acceleration in the note, but rather to refer to an accompanying loan agreement, security agreement or mortgage for that statement. Subsection (b)(i) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] allows a reference to the appropriate writing for a statement of these rights. For example, a note would not be made conditional by the following statement: "This note is secured by a security interest in collateral described in a security agreement dated April 1, 1990 between the payee and maker of this note. Rights and obligations with respect to the collateral are [stated in] [governed by] the security agreement." The bracketed words are alternatives, either of which complies.

Subsection (b)(ii) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] addresses the issues covered by present Section 3-105(1)(f), (g), and (h) [30-3-105(1)(f) through (1)(h) prior to 1991 revision] and Section 3-105(2)(b) [30-3-105(2)(b)]. Under Section 3-106(a) [30-3-105(1)] a promise or order is not made conditional because payment is limited to payment from a particular source or fund. This reverses the result of present Section 3-105(2)(b) [30-3-105(2)(b)]. There is no cogent reason why the general credit of a legal entity must be pledged to have a negotiable instrument. Market forces determine the marketability of instruments of this kind. If potential buyers don't want promises or orders that are payable only from a particular source or fund, they won't take them, but Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] should apply.

2. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies to traveler's checks or other instruments that may require a countersignature. Although the requirement of a countersignature is a condition to payment, traveler's checks are treated in the commercial world as money substitutes and therefore should be governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. The first sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows a traveler's check to meet the definition of instrument by stating that the countersignature condition does not make it conditional for the purposes of Section 3-104 [30-3-104]. The second sentence states the effect of a failure to meet the condition. Suppose a thief steals a traveler's check and cashes it by skillfully imitating the specimen signature so that the countersignature appears to be authentic. The countersignature is for the purpose of identification. It is not treated as an indorsement. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] provides that the failure of the owner to countersign does not prevent a transferee from becoming a holder. Thus, the merchant or bank that cashed the traveler's check becomes a holder when the traveler's check is taken. The forged countersignature is a defense to the obligation of the issuer to pay the instrument, and is included in defenses under Section 3-305(a)(2) [30-3-305(1)(b)]. These defenses may not be asserted against a holder in due course. Whether a holder has notice of the defense is a factual question. If the countersignature is a very bad forgery, there may be notice. But if the merchant or bank cashed a traveler's check for a skilled forger there might not be notice that the countersignature was forged. Thus, the merchant or bank could be a holder in due course.

3. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] concerns the effect of a statement to the effect that the rights of a holder or transferee are subject to claims and defenses that the issuer could assert against the original payee. The subsection applies only if the statement is required by statutory or administrative law. The prime example is the Federal Trade Commission Rule (16 C.F.R. Part 433) preserving consumers' claims and defenses in consumer credit sales. The intent of the FTC rule is to make it impossible for there to be a holder in due course of a note bearing the FTC legend and undoubtedly that is the result. But the legend may also have the unintended effect of making the note conditional, thus excluding the note from present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] altogether. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is designed to make it possible to preclude the possibility of a holder in due course without excluding the instrument from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Most of the provisions of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] are not affected by the holder-in-due-course doctrine and there is no reason why Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] should not apply to a note bearing the FTC legend if holder-in-due-course rights are not involved. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] the statement does not make the note conditional. If the note otherwise meets the requirements of Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] it is a negotiable instrument under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] for all purposes except that there cannot be a holder in due course of the note. No particular form of legend or statement is required by subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] so long as the statement conveys the substance of what is stated in the statute, that "the rights of a holder or transferee are subject to claims or defenses that the issuer could assert against the original payee." For example, the FTC legend required in a note taken by the seller in a consumer sale of goods or services is tailored to that particular transaction and therefore uses language that is somewhat different from that stated in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section], but the difference in expression does not affect the essential similarity of the message conveyed. The effect of the FTC legend is to make the rights of a holder or transferee subject to claims or defenses that the issuer could assert against the original payee of the note.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

The definition of instrument in proposed Section 3-104 [30-3-104] requires that the promise or order be payable in "money." That term is defined in Section 1-201(24) [30-1-201(24)] as "a medium of exchange authorized by a domestic or foreign government as part of its currency." Proposed Section 3-107 [30-3-107] states than an instrument payable in foreign money may be paid in dollars if the instrument does not prohibit it. The reference in present Section 3-107(1) [30-3-107(1) prior to 1991 revision] to instruments payable in "currency" or "current funds" has been dropped as superfluous.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Time of Repayment Specified in Note — Not Considered Demand Note: As a general rule, notes payable on demand are due and payable immediately upon execution, and no further demand is necessary to mature them. However, an exception applies when the terms of the instrument disclose an intention by the parties that the note is not due and payable immediately after delivery. In that case, an actual demand is necessary to mature the note. Therefore, language in a note stating that "[i] no demand is made, Borrower shall pay 120 days after the date of this note" took the note out of the category of a demand note, and an actual demand was necessary to mature the note prior to the date set. Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

This section [in part] is a restatement of present Section 3-108 [30-3-108 prior to 1991 revision] and Section 3-109 [30-3-109 prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (b) [subsection (1) of this section] broadens present Section 3-109 [30-3-109 prior to 1991 revision] somewhat by providing that a definite time includes a time readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued. Subsection (b)(iii) and (iv) [subsections (1)(c) and (1)(d) of this section] restates present Section 3-109(1)(d) [30-3-109(1)(d) prior to 1991 revision]. It adopts the generally accepted rule that a clause providing for extension at the option of the holder, even without a time limit, does not affect negotiability since the holder is given only a right which the holder would have without the clause. If the extension is to be at the option of the maker or acceptor or is to be automatic, a definite time limit must be stated or the time of payment remains uncertain and the order or promise is not a negotiable instrument. If a definite time limit is stated, the effect upon certainty of time of payment is the same as if the instrument were made payable at the ultimate date with a term providing for acceleration.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Time of Repayment Specified in Note — Not Considered Demand Note: As a general rule, notes payable on demand are due and payable immediately upon execution, and no further demand is necessary to mature them. However, an exception applies when the terms of the instrument disclose an intention by the parties that the note is not due and payable immediately after delivery. In that case, an actual demand is necessary to mature the note. Therefore, language in a note stating that "[i] no demand is made, Borrower shall pay 120 days after the date of this note" took the note out of the category of a demand note, and an actual demand was necessary to mature the note prior to the date set. Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989).

Supply of Presentment Date by Holder: The holder of a 160-day sight draft may supply a date of presentment when the drawee fails to provide his written acceptance or date thereof. Thus, the holder of the draft could in good faith treat the date on which the collecting bank acknowledged receipt of the draft as the date of acceptance and could properly treat the draft as dishonored when payment was received 162 days after the date the draft was received from the bank. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

Contingency Maturity: A chattel mortgage that provided that the balance should become due without notice if the customer defaulted on any obligation under the mortgage or if the holder should consider the indebtedness or the car insecure was not a negotiable instrument within the meaning of section 55-204, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). Sonnek v. Univ. C. I. T. Credit Corp., 140 M 503, 374 P2d 105 (1962).

Note Due on Insolvency: A provision that the holder may declare a note due immediately on the insolvency of the maker renders it nonnegotiable. Erlandson v. Erskine, 76 M 537, 248 P 209 (1926). See also Anderson v. Border, 87 M 4, 285 P 174 (1930).

Acceleration Clause: A 6-months' promissory note containing an accelerating clause to the effect that in the event of insolvency of either maker or endorsers or the institution of suit or attachment against them or either of them, or the mortgaging of any property by the makers or endorsers, the note might be declared immediately due and payable, was nonnegotiable in that it left the time when payable uncertain and indefinite. Great Falls Nat'l Bank v. Young, 67 M 328, 215 P 651 (1923).

30-3-111. Payable to bearer or to order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-109, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 9, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Under Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)], a promise or order cannot be an instrument unless the instrument is payable to bearer or to order when it is issued or unless Section 3-104(c) [30-3-104(3)] applies. The terms "payable to bearer" and "payable to order" are defined in Section 3-109 [30-3-111]. The quoted terms are also relevant in determining how an instrument is negotiated. If the instrument is payable to bearer it can be negotiated by delivery alone. Section 3-201(b) [30-3-202(2)]. An instrument that is payable to an identified person cannot be negotiated without the indorsement of the identified person. Section 3-201(b) [30-3-202(2)]. An instrument payable to order is payable to an identified person. Section 3-109(b) [30-3-111(2)]. Thus, an instrument payable to order requires the indorsement of the person to whose order the instrument is payable.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states when an instrument is payable to bearer. An instrument is payable to bearer if it states that it is payable to bearer, but some instruments use ambiguous terms. For example, check forms usually have the words "to the order of" printed at the beginning of the line to be filled in for the name of the payee. If the drawer writes in the word "bearer" or "cash," the check reads "to the order of bearer" or "to the order of cash." In each case the check is payable to bearer. Sometimes the drawer will write the name of the payee "John Doe" but will add the words "or bearer." In that case the check is payable to bearer. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], if an instrument is payable to bearer it can't be payable to order. This is different from present Section 3-110(3) [30-3-110, now repealed]. An instrument that purports to be payable both to order and bearer states contradictory terms. A transferee of the instrument should be able to rely on the bearer term and acquire rights as a holder without obtaining the indorsement of the identified payee. An instrument is also payable to bearer if it does not state a payee. Instruments that do not state a payee are in most cases incomplete instruments. In some cases the drawer of a check may deliver or mail it to the person to be paid without filling in the line for the name of the payee. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] the check is payable to bearer when it is sent or delivered. It is also an incomplete instrument. This case is discussed in Comment 2 to Section 3-115 [30-3-115]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] contains the words "otherwise indicates that it is not payable to an identified person." The quoted words are meant to cover uncommon cases in which an instrument indicates that it is not meant to be payable to a specific person. Such an instrument is treated like a check payable to "cash." The quoted words are not meant to apply to an instrument stating that it is payable to an identified person such as "ABC Corporation" if ABC Corporation is a nonexistent company. Although the holder of the check cannot be the nonexistent company, the instrument is not payable to bearer. Negotiation of such an instrument is governed by Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)].

This section replaces present Section 3-114 [30-3-114 prior to 1991 revision]. Subsections (1) and (3) of present Section 3-114 [30-3-114(1) and (3) prior to 1991 revision] are deleted as unnecessary. Proposed Section 3-113(a) [30-3-114(1)] is based on subsection (2) of present Section 3-114 [30-3-114(2) prior to 1991 revision], except for the reference to Section 4-401 [30-4-401] which prescribes the procedure for notifying the payor bank of a postdated check. With respect to an undated instrument, the date is the date of issue.

(2) Where an instrument is antedated or postdated the time when it is payable is determined by the stated date if the instrument is payable on demand or at a fixed period after date.

(3) Where the instrument or any signature thereon is dated, the date is presumed to be correct."

Erroneous Date: Evidence is admissible that the maker of an instrument inadvertently wrote the date "1904" instead of "1905" because at the beginning of the new year he had not yet become accustomed to writing the new date. McDonald v. Klenze, 52 M 142, 157 P 175 (1916).

30-3-115. Incomplete instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-115, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 13, 14 and 15, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This section generally carries forward the rules set out in present Section 3-115 [30-3-115 prior to 1991 revision]. The term "incomplete instrument" applies both to an "instrument," i.e. a writing meeting all the requirements of proposed Section 3-104 [30-3-104], and to a writing intended to be an instrument that is signed but lacks some element of an instrument. The test in both cases is whether the contents show that it is incomplete and that the signer intended that additional words or numbers be added.

2. If an incomplete instrument meets the requirements of Section 3-104 [30-3-104] and is not completed it may be enforced in accordance with its terms. Suppose a note delivered to the payee is incomplete solely because a space on the pre-printed note form for the due date is not filled in.

Case #1. If the incomplete instrument is never completed, the note is payable on demand. Section 3-108(a) [30-3-108(1)]. However, if the payee and the maker agreed to a due date, the maker may have a defense under Section 3-117 [30-3-119].

Case #2. If the payee completes the note by stating a due date, the note is payable on the due date stated. However, if the due date filled in was not the date agreed to by the parties there is an alteration of the note. Section 3-407 [30-3-407] governs the case.

Suppose Debtor pays Creditor by giving Creditor a check on which the space for the name of the payee is left blank. The check is an instrument but it is incomplete. The check is enforceable in its incomplete form and it is payable to bearer because it does not state a payee. Section 3-109(a)(2) [30-3-311(1)(b)]. Thus, Creditor is a holder of the check. Normally in this kind of case Creditor would simply fill in the space with Creditor's name. When that occurs the check becomes payable to the Creditor.

3. In some cases the incomplete instrument does not meet the requirements of Section 3-104 [30-3-104]. An example is a check with the amount not filled in. The check cannot be enforced until the amount is filled in. If the payee fills in an amount authorized by the drawer there is no problem. If the payee fills in an unauthorized amount there is an alteration of the check and Section 3-407 [30-3-407] applies.

4. Section 3-302(a)(1) [30-3-302(1)(a)] also bears on the problem of incomplete instruments. Under that section one cannot be a holder in due course if the instrument is so incomplete as to call into question its validity. Subsection (d) of Section 3-115 [30-3-115(4)] is based on the last clause in subsection (2) of present Section 3-115 [30-3-115 prior to 1991 revision].

(2) If the completion is unauthorized the rules as to material alteration apply (30-3-407), even though the paper was not delivered by the maker or drawer; but the burden of establishing that any completion is unauthorized is on the party so asserting."

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Time of Payment of Interest: Where four of the notes held by plaintiff were silent as to the time interest should be paid, plaintiff could have filled in the blanks but there was no obligation to do so, and effect of the contract was the same as if the blanks had been filled in and annual payment of interest specifically stipulated. Mercer v. Mercer, 120 M 132, 180 P2d 248 (1947).

Interest Rate Not Stated: A promissory note payable with interest without specifying the rate of interest carries interest at the legal rate. Burnett v. Burnett, 68 M 546, 219 P 831 (1923).

Forgery Prosecution: In a prosecution for forgery, the rule that the delivery of a writing containing blanks evidently intended to be filled creates an implied authority in the person who receives it to complete the instrument by filling the blanks has no application where the defendant had himself testified that the blanks in the note which he was charged with uttering, while knowing it to be spurious, had all been filled before it was signed. St. v. Mitton, 37 M 366, 96 P 926 (1908). See First Nat'l Bank of Miles City v. Barrett, 52 M 359, 157 P 951 (1916).

30-3-119. Other agreements affecting instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-117, U.C.C.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. The separate agreement might be a security agreement or mortgage or it might be an agreement that contradicts the terms of the instrument. For example, a person may be induced to sign an instrument under an agreement that the signer will not be liable on the instrument unless certain conditions are met. Suppose X requested credit from Creditor who is willing to give the credit only if an acceptable accommodation party will sign the note of X as co-maker. Y agrees to sign as co-maker on the condition that Creditor also obtain the signature of Z as co-maker. Creditor agrees and Y signs as co-maker with X. Creditor fails to obtain the signature of Z on the note. Under Sections 3-412 [30-3-413] and 3-419(b) [30-3-415(2)], Y is obliged to pay the note, but Section 3-117 [30-3-119] applies. In this case, the agreement contradicts the terms of the note and nullifies the obligation of Y. This case is essentially similar to a case in which a maker of a note is induced to sign the note by fraud of the holder. Although the agreement that Y not be liable on the note unless Z also signs may not have been fraudulently made, a subsequent attempt by Creditor to require Y to pay the note in violation of the agreement is a bad faith act. Section 3-117 [30-3-119], in treating the agreement as a defense, allows Y to assert the agreement against Creditor, but the defense would not be good against a subsequent holder in due course of the note that took it without notice of the agreement. If there cannot be a holder in due course because of Section 3-106(d) [30-3-105(4)], a subsequent holder that took the note in good faith, for value and without knowledge of the agreement would not be able to enforce the liability of Y. This result is consistent with the risk that a holder not in due course takes with respect to fraud in inducing issuance of an instrument.

2. The effect of merger or integration clauses to the effect that a writing is intended to be the complete and exclusive statement of the terms of the agreement is left to the supplementary law of the jurisdiction pursuant to Section 1-103 [30-1-103].

(2) A separate agreement does not affect the negotiability of an instrument."

30-3-122. Statute of limitations.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-118, U.C.C.

1. Proposed Section 3-118 [30-3-122] differs from present Section 3-122 [30-3-122 prior to 1991 revision], which states when a cause of action accrues on an instrument. Section 3-118 [30-3-122] does not define when a cause of action accrues. Accrual of a cause of action is stated in other sections of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] such as those that state the various obligations of parties to an instrument. The only purpose of Section 3-118 [30-3-122] is to define the time within which an action to enforce an obligation, duty, or right arising under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] must be commenced. Section 3-118 [30-3-122] does not attempt to state all rules with respect to a statute of limitations. For example, the circumstances under which the running of a limitations period may be tolled is left to other law pursuant to Section 1-103 [30-3-103].

2. The first six subsections apply to actions to enforce an obligation of any party to an instrument to pay the instrument. This changes present law in that indorsers who may become liable on an instrument after issue are subject to a period of limitations running from the same date as that of the maker or drawer. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] apply to notes. If the note is payable at a definite time, a six-year limitations period starts at the due date of the note, subject to prior acceleration. If the note is payable on demand, there are two limitations periods. Although a note payable on demand could theoretically be called a day after it was issued, the normal expectation of the parties is that the note will remain outstanding until there is some reason to call it. If the law provides that the limitations period does not start until demand is made, the cause of action to enforce it may never be barred. On the other hand, if the limitations period starts when demand for payment may be made, i.e. at any time after the note was issued, the payee of a note on which interest or portions of principal are being paid could lose the right to enforce the note even though it was treated as a continuing obligation by the parties. Some demand notes are not enforced because the payee has forgiven the debt. This is particularly true in family and other noncommercial transactions. A demand note found after the death of the payee may be presented for payment many years after it was issued. The maker may be a relative and it may be difficult to determine whether the note represents a real or a forgiven debt. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is designed to bar notes that no longer represent a claim to payment and to require reasonably prompt action to enforce notes on which there is default. If a demand for payment is made to the maker, a six-year limitations period starts to run when demand is made. The second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] bars an action to enforce a demand note if no demand has been made on the note and no payment of interest or principal has been made for a continuous period of 10 years. This covers the case of a note that does not bear interest or a case in which interest due on the note has not been paid. This kind of case is likely to be a family transaction in which a failure to demand payment may indicate that the holder did not intend to enforce the obligation but neglected to destroy the note. A limitations period that bars stale claims in this kind of case is appropriate if the period is relatively long.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies primarily to personal uncertified checks. Checks are payment instruments rather than credit instruments. The limitations period expires six years after the date of dishonor or 10 years after the date of the check, whichever is earlier. Teller's checks, cashier's checks, certified checks, and traveler's checks are treated differently under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] because they are commonly treated as cash equivalents. A great delay in presenting a cashier's check for payment in most cases will occur because the check was mislaid during that period. The person to whom traveler's checks are issued may hold them indefinitely as a safe form of cash for use in an emergency. There is no compelling reason for barring the claim of the owner of the cashier's check or traveler's check. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] the claim is never barred because the six-year limitations period does not start to run until demand for payment is made. The limitations period in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] in effect applies only to cases in which there is a dispute about the legitimacy of the claim of the person demanding payment.

4. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] covers certificates of deposit. The limitations period doesn't start to run until the depositor demands payment. Most certificates of deposit are payable on demand even if they state a maturity date. The effect of a demand for payment before maturity is usually that the bank will pay, but that a penalty will be assessed against the depositor in the form of a reduction in the amount of interest that is paid. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] also provides for cases in which the bank has no obligation to pay until the maturity date. In that case the limitations period doesn't start to run until there is a demand for payment in effect and the maturity date has passed.

5. Subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] applies to accepted drafts other than certified checks. When a draft is accepted it is in effect turned into a note of the acceptor. In almost all cases the acceptor will agree to pay at a definite time. Subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] states that in that case the six-year limitations period starts to run on the payment date. In the rare case in which the obligation of the acceptor is payable on demand, the six-year limitations period starts to run at the date of the acceptance.

6. Subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] covers warranty and conversion cases and other actions to enforce obligations or rights arising under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. A three-year period is stated and it follows traditional law in stating that the period runs from the time the cause of action accrues.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Accrual of cause of action. (1) A cause of action against a maker or an acceptor accrues:

(a) in the case of a time instrument on the day after maturity;

(b) in the case of a demand instrument upon its date or, if no date is stated, on the date of issue.

(2) A cause of action against the obligor of a demand or time certificate of deposit accrues upon demand, but demand on a time certificate may not be made until on or after the date of maturity.

(3) A cause of action against a drawer of a draft or an endorser of any instrument accrues upon demand following dishonor of the instrument. Notice of dishonor is a demand.

(4) Unless an instrument provides otherwise, interest runs at the rate provided by law for a judgment:

(a) in the case of a maker, acceptor or other primary obligor of a demand instrument, from the date of demand;

(b) in all other cases from the date of accrual of the cause of action."

Case Notes

"Savings Clause" Preserves Existing Statute of Limitations for Debt Collection: After borrowing $25,000 from a Billings bank in the form of a demand note with a March 1, 1991, maturity date, plaintiff Fisher defaulted on the note. The bank attempted to collect the delinquent note, notifying Fisher that the 8-year statute of limitations had not run. Fisher subsequently filed a complaint against the bank, alleging that in conjunction with other modifications to Montana's commercial code, an amendment by the 1991 Legislature, which became effective more than 6 months after his loan default, had shortened the statute of limitations to 6 years. As a result, Fisher argued that the new statute of limitations applied to remove his liability to pay the note. The District Court did not concur with Fisher's assessment, ruling that the applicable statute was the 8-year statute of limitations in effect at the time of default. On appeal, the dispute centered solely around which statute of limitations applied. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court decision, ruling that the savings clause included in the amendments by the 1991 Legislature preserved the 8-year statute of limitations in effect as of the maturity date of the note. Fisher v. First Citizens Bank, 2000 MT 314, 302 M 473, 14 P3d 1228, 57 St. Rep. 1331 (2000).

30-3-124. Subject matter.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-102, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] has no provision affirmatively stating its scope. Present Section 3-103 [30-3-103, now repealed] is a limitation on scope. Proposed Section 3-102 [30-3-124] states that Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] applies to "negotiable instruments," defined in Section 3-104 [30-3-104]. Section 3-104(b) [30-3-104(2)] also defines the term "instrument" as a synonym for "negotiable instrument." In most places Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] uses the shorter term "instrument." This follows the convention used in present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision].

2. The reference in present Section 3-103(1) [30-3-103, now repealed] to "documents of title" is omitted as superfluous because these documents contain no promise to pay money. Some investment securities also meet the definition of instrument. Present Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, prior to 1991 revision] states in Section 8-102(1)(c) [30-8-102(1)(c), substance now in 30-8-112] that "A writing that is a certificated security is governed by this Article and not by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], even though it also meets the requirements of that Article." To conform Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] to proposed Section 3-102(a) [30-3-124(1)] the quoted language in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] will have to be amended. The definition of "payment order" in Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] excludes drafts which are governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Proposed Section 3-102(a) [30-3-124(1)] makes clear that a payment order governed by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] is not governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Thus, Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] and Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] are mutually exclusive.

3. Although the terms of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] apply to transactions by Federal Reserve Banks, federal preemption would make ineffective any Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] provision that conflicts with federal law. The activities of the Federal Reserve Banks are governed by regulations of the Federal Reserve Board and by operating circulars issued by the Reserve Banks themselves. In some instances, the operating circulars are issued pursuant to a Federal Reserve Board regulation. In other cases, the Reserve Bank issues the operating circular under its own authority under the Federal Reserve Act, subject to review by the Federal Reserve Board. Section 3-102(c) [30-3-124(3)] states that Federal Reserve Board regulations and operating circulars of the Federal Reserve Banks supersede any inconsistent provision of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] to the extent of the inconsistency. Federal Reserve Board regulations, being valid exercises of regulatory authority pursuant to a federal statute, take precedence over state law if there is an inconsistency. Childs v. Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, 719 F.2d 812 (5th Cir. 1983), reh. den. 724 F.2d 127 (5th Cir. 1984). Section 3-102(c) [30-3-124(3)] treats operating circulars as having the same effect whether issued under the Reserve Bank's own authority or under a Federal Reserve Board regulation. Federal statutes may also preempt Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. For example, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, 12 U.S.C. Section 4001 et seq., provides that the Act and the regulations issued pursuant to the Act supersede any inconsistent provisions of the UCC. 12 U.S.C. Section 4007(b).

4. In Clearfield Trust Co. v. United States, 318 U.S. 363 (1943), the Court held that if the United States is a party to an instrument, its rights and duties are governed by federal common law in the absence of a specific federal statute or regulation. In United States v. Kimbell Foods, Inc., 440 U.S. 715 (1979), the Court stated a three-pronged test to ascertain whether the federal common-law rule should follow the state rule. In most instances courts under the Kimbell test have shown a willingness to adopt UCC rules in formulating federal common law on the subject. In Kimbell the Court adopted the priorities rules of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

1997 Amendment: Chapter 536 in (1), in second sentence, substituted "30-8-112(1)(d)" for "30-8-102(1)(a)".

30-3-125. Issue of instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-105, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Under present Section 3-102(1)(a) [30-3-102(1)(a) prior to 1991 revision] "issue" is the first delivery to a "holder or a remitter" but the term "remitter" is neither defined nor otherwise used. Subsection (a) of proposed Section 3-105 [30-3-125(1)] defines "issue" more broadly to include the first delivery to anyone by the drawer or maker made for the purpose of giving rights to anyone on the instrument. "Delivery" with respect to instruments is defined in Section 1-201(14) [30-1-201(14)] as meaning "voluntary transfer of possession."

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] continues the rule that nonissuance, conditional issuance or issuance for a special purpose is a defense of the maker or drawer of an instrument. Thus, the defense can be asserted against a person other than a holder in due course. The same rule applies to nonissuance of an incomplete instrument later completed.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] defines "issuer" to include the signer of an unissued instrument for convenience of reference in the statute.

30-3-126. Identification of person to whom instrument is payable.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-110, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Section 3-110 [30-3-126] states rules for determining the identity of the person to whom an instrument is payable if the instrument is payable to an identified person. This issue usually arises in a dispute over the validity of an indorsement in the name of the payee. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the general rule that the person to whom an instrument is payable is determined by the intent of "the person, whether or not authorized, signing as, or in the name or behalf of, the marker or drawer." If X signs a check as drawer of a check on X's account, the intent of X controls. If X, as President of Corporation, signs a check as President in behalf of Corporation as drawer, the intent of X controls. If X forges Y's signature as drawer of a check, the intent of X controls. In the case of a check payable to "John Smith," since there are many people in the world named "John Smith" it is not possible to identify the payee of the check unless there is some further identification or the intention of the drawer is determined. Name alone is sufficient under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section], but the intention of the drawer determines which John Smith is the person to whom the check is payable. The same issue is presented in cases of misdescriptions of the payee. The drawer intends to pay a person known to the drawer as John Smith. In fact that person's name is James Smith or John Jones or some other entirely different name. If the check identifies the payee as John Smith, it is nevertheless payable to the person intended by the drawer. That person may indorse the check in either the name John Smith or the person's correct name or in both names. Section 3-204(c) [30-3-203(3)]. The intent of the drawer is also controlling in fictitious payee cases. Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)]. The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] refers to rare cases in which the signature of an organization requires more than one signature and the persons signing on behalf of the organization do not all intend the same person as payee. Any person intended by a signer for the organization is the payee and an indorsement by that person is an effective indorsement.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] recognizes the fact that in a large number of cases there is no human signer of an instrument because the instrument, usually a check, is produced by automated means such as a check-writing machine. In that case, the relevant intent is that of the person who supplied the name of the payee. In most cases that person is an employee of the drawer, but in some cases the person could be an outsider who is committing a fraud by introducing names of payees of checks into the system that produces the checks. A check-writing machine is likely to be operated by means of a computer in which is stored information as to name and address of the payee and the amount of the check. Access to the computer may allow production of fraudulent checks without knowledge of the organization that is the issuer of the check. Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)] is also concerned with this issue. See Case #4 in Comment 2 to Section 3-404 [30-3-405].

2. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows the payee to be identified in any way including the various ways stated. Subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section] relates to instruments payable to bank accounts. In some cases the account might be identified by name and number, and the name and number might refer to different persons. For example, a check is payable to "X Corporation Account No. 12345 in Bank of Podunk." Under the last sentence of subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section], this check is payable to X Corporation and can be negotiated by X Corporation even if Account No. 12345 is some other person's account or the check is not deposited in that account. In other cases the payee is identified by an account number and the name of the owner of the account is not stated. For example, Debtor pays Creditor by issuing a check drawn on Payor Bank. The check is payable to a bank account owned by Creditor but identified only by number. Under the first sentence of subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section] the check is payable to Creditor and, under Section 1-201(20) [30-1-201(20)], Creditor becomes the holder when the check is delivered. Under Section 3-201(b) [30-3-201(2)], further negotiation of the check requires the indorsement of Creditor. But under Section 4-205 [30-4-205], if the check is taken by a depositary bank for collection, the bank may become a holder without the indorsement. Under Section 3-102(b) [30-3-124(2)], provisions of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] prevail over those of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. The depositary bank warrants that the amount of the check was credited to the payee's account.

3. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] replaces present Section 3-117 [30-3-117, now repealed] and subsection (1)(e), (f), and (g) of present Section 3-110 [30-3-110, now repealed]. This provision merely determines who can deal with an instrument as a holder. It does not determine ownership of the instrument or its proceeds. Subsection (c)(2)(i) [subsection (3)(b)(i) of this section] covers trusts and estates. If the instrument is payable to the trust or estate or to the trustee or representative of the trust or estate, the instrument is payable to the trustee or representative or any successor. Under subsection (c)(2)(ii) [subsection (3)(b)(ii) of this section], if the instrument states that it is payable to Doe, President of X Corporation, either Doe or X Corporation can be holder of the instrument. Subsection (c)(2)(iii) [subsection (3)(b)(iii) of this section] concerns informal organizations that are not legal entities such as unincorporated clubs and the like. Any representative of the members of the organization can act as holder. Subsection (c)(2)(iv) [subsection (3)(b)(iv) of this section] applies principally to instruments payable to public offices such as a check payable to County Tax Collector.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] replaces present Section 3-116 [30-3-116, now repealed]. An instrument payable to A and B is governed by the first sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section]. An instrument payable to A or B is governed by the second sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section]. The third sentence is added to address the problem arising when it is not clear whether an instrument is payable to multiple payees alternatively. In the case of ambiguity persons dealing with the instrument should be able to rely on the indorsement of a single payee. For example, an instrument payable to A and/or B is treated like an instrument payable to A or B.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Plaintiff Estopped From Denying Ownership of Account: There was substantial evidence to support the District Court's conclusion that plaintiff was equitably estopped from denying his joint and beneficial ownership of a checking account by virtue of his acknowledgment and use of the account and the defendant-bank's reliance thereon in crediting a check to that account. The plaintiff could not complain that he lacked authority to draw checks on the account when he could have remedied that situation simply by signing the signature card. Beyer v. First Nat'l Bank of Dillon, 188 M 208, 612 P2d 1285, 37 St. Rep. 1035 (1980).

Check Payable to Husband and Wife: Normally, when a check is made payable to husband and wife, it is considered to be payable to them jointly and the check must be endorsed by both of them. Beyer v. First Nat'l Bank of Dillon, 188 M 208, 612 P2d 1285, 37 St. Rep. 1035 (1980).

Official Comment:

This is a new section. If an instrument is payable at a bank in the United States, Section 3-501(b)(1) [30-3-504(1)] states that presentment must be made at the place of payment, i.e. the bank.

30-3-128. Interest.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-112, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

Under Section 3-104(a) [30-3-104(1)] the requirement of a "fixed amount" applies only to principal. The amount of interest payable is that described in the instrument. But if the description of interest in the instrument does not allow for the amount of interest payable to be ascertained, interest is to be payable at the judgment rate. Hence, if an instrument calls for interest, the amount of interest will always be determinable. If a variable rate of interest is prescribed, the amount of interest is ascertainable by reference to the formula or index described or referred to in the instrument. The last sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] replaces subsection (4) of present Section 3-118 [30-3-118, now repealed].

30-3-130. Joint and several liability — contribution.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-116, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] replaces subsection (5) of present Section 3-118 [30-3-118, now repealed]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states contribution rights of parties with joint and several liability by referring to applicable law. But subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is subject to Section 3-419(e) [30-3-415(5)]. If one of the parties with joint and several liability is an accommodation party and the other is the accommodated party, Section 3-419(e) [30-3-415(5)] applies. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] deals with discharge. The discharge of a jointly and severally liable obligor does not affect the right of other obligors to seek contribution from the discharged obligor.

2. Indorsers normally do not have joint and several liability. Rather, an earlier indorser has liability to a later indorser. But indorsers can have joint and several liability in two cases. If an instrument is payable to two payees jointly, both payees must indorse. The indorsement is a joint indorsement and the indorsers have joint and several liability and subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies. The other case is that of two or more anomalous indorsers. The term is defined in Section 3-205(d) [30-3-204(4)]. An anomalous indorsement normally indicates that the indorser signed as an accommodation party. If more than one accommodation party indorses the instrument the indorsers have joint and several liability and subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies.

Transfer and Negotiation

30-3-202. Negotiation.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-201, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 30, 31 and 32, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] are based in part on subsection (1) of present Section 3-202 [30-3-202(1)]. A person can become holder of an instrument when the instrument is issued to that person, or the status of holder can arise as the result of an event that occurs after issuance. "Negotiation" is the term used in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] to describe this post-issuance event. Normally, negotiation occurs as the result of a voluntary transfer of possession of an instrument by a holder to another person who becomes the holder as a result of the transfer. Negotiation always requires a change in possession of the instrument because nobody can be a holder without possessing the instrument, either directly or through an agent. But in some cases the transfer of possession is involuntary and in some cases the person transferring possession is not a holder. In defining "negotiation" present Section 3-202(1) [30-3-202(1) prior to 1991 revision] uses the word "transfer," an undefined term, and "delivery," defined in Section 1-201(14) [30-1-201(14)] to mean voluntary change of possession. Instead, proposed subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] use the term "transfer of possession" and, subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states that negotiation can occur by an involuntary transfer of possession. For example, if an instrument is payable to bearer and it is stolen by Thief or is found by Finder, Thief or Finder becomes the holder of the instrument when possession is obtained. In this case there is an involuntary transfer of possession that results in negotiation to Thief or Finder.

2. In most cases negotiation occurs by a transfer of possession by a holder or remitter. Remitter transactions usually involve a cashier's or teller's check. For example, Buyer buys goods from Seller and pays for them with a cashier's check of Bank that Buyer buys from Bank. The check is issued by Bank when it is delivered to Buyer, regardless of whether the check is payable to Buyer or to Seller. Section 3-105(a) [30-3-125(1)]. If the check is payable to Buyer, negotiation to Seller is done by delivery of the check to Seller after it is indorsed by Buyer. It is more common, however, that the check when issued will be payable to Seller. In that case Buyer is referred to as the "remitter." Section 3-103(a)(11) [30-3-102(1)(k)]. The remitter, although not a party to the check, is the owner of the check until ownership is transferred to Seller by delivery. This transfer is a negotiation because Seller becomes the holder of the check when Seller obtains possession. In some cases Seller may have acted fraudulently in obtaining possession of the check. In those cases Buyer may be entitled to rescind the transfer to Seller because of the fraud and assert a claim of ownership to the check under Section 3-306 [30-3-306] against Seller or a subsequent transferee of the check. Section 3-202(b) [30-3-209(2)] provides for rescission of negotiation, and that provision applies to rescission by a remitter as well as by a holder.

3. Other sections of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] may modify the rule stated in the first sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. See for example, Sections 3-404 [30-3-404], 3-405 [30-3-405], and 3-406 [30-3-406].

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Negotiation. (1) Negotiation is the transfer of an instrument in such form that the transferee becomes a holder. If the instrument is payable to order it is negotiated by delivery with any necessary endorsement; if payable to bearer it is negotiated by delivery.

(2) An endorsement must be written by or on behalf of the holder and on the instrument or on a paper so firmly affixed thereto as to become a part thereof.

(3) An endorsement is effective for negotiation only when it conveys the entire instrument or any unpaid residue. If it purports to be of less it operates only as a partial assignment.

(4) Words of assignment, condition, waiver, guaranty, limitation or disclaimer of liability and the like accompanying an endorsement do not affect its character as an endorsement."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Cancellation of Old Note and Mortgage for Execution of New Ones: There is an absence or want of consideration where the party surrendering an old note and mortgage for execution of new ones doesn't own the old ones in the first instance. If plaintiff was not the owner of the original note and mortgage, she was in no position to perform her promise to cancel and surrender the original note and mortgage. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936).

Instrument Payable to Bearer:

An instrument payable to bearer is negotiated by delivery without endorsement. J. K. & C. S. Mullen Benev. Corp. v. School District, 99 M 388, 43 P2d 902 (1935).

Title to interest coupons which are payable to bearer and possess all the qualities and incidents of commercial paper passes by delivery. J. K. & C. S. Mullen Benev. Corp. v. School District, 99 M 388, 43 P2d 902 (1935).

"Negotiation" Generally: The definition of negotiation contained in this section is complete in itself and expresses the meaning of the term "negotiated" as it was used in the law merchant. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Exclusiveness of Method: The method of negotiation prescribed by section 55-404, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is not exclusive. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Negotiation of Bearer Note: A note made payable to a named person, with the words "or bearer" added, passes from hand to hand by mere delivery and on becoming due may be enforced by the person holding it. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Simpson, 54 M 316, 170 P 12 (1918).

Payee as Holder in Due Course: The payee of a negotiable promissory note in possession of it is a prima facie holder in due course within the meaning of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, negotiation by endorsement and delivery not being necessary to constitute one a holder in due course. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Simpson, 54 M 316, 170 P 12 (1918).

30-3-203. Indorsement.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-204, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 43, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is a definition of "indorsement," a term which was not defined in present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision]. Indorsement is defined in terms of the purpose of the signature. If a blank or special indorsement is made to give rights as a holder to a transferee the indorsement is made for the purpose of negotiating the instrument. Subsection (a)(i) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. If the holder of a check has an account in the drawee bank and wants to be sure that payment of the check will be made by credit to the holder's account, the holder can indorse the check by signing the holder's name with the accompanying words "for deposit only" before presenting the check for payment to the drawee bank. In that case the purpose of the quoted words is to restrict payment of the instrument. Subsection (a)(ii) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. If X wants to guarantee payment of a note signed by Y as maker, X can do so by signing X's name to the back of the note as an indorser. This indorsement is known as an anomalous indorsement (Section 3-205(d) [30-3-204(4)]) and is made for the purpose of incurring indorser's liability on the note. Subsection (a)(iii) [subsection (1)(c) of this section]. In some cases an indorsement may serve more than one purpose. For example, if the holder of a check deposits it to the holder's account in a depositary bank for collection and indorses the check by signing the holder's name with the accompanying words "for deposit only" the purpose of the indorsement is both to negotiate the check to the depositary bank and to restrict payment of the check.

The but clause of the first sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] elaborates on present Section 3-402 [30-3-402, now repealed]. In some cases it may not be clear whether a signature was meant to be that of an indorser, a party to the instrument in some other capacity such as drawer, maker or acceptor, or a person who was not signing as a party. The general rule is that a signature is an indorsement if the instrument does not indicate an unambiguous intent of the signer not to sign as an indorser. Intent may be determined by words accompanying the signature, the place of signature, or other circumstances. For example, suppose a depositary bank gives cash for a check properly indorsed by the payee. The bank requires the payee's employee to sign the back of the check. If the signature consists only of the initials of the employee it is not reasonable to assume that it was meant to be an indorsement. If there was a full signature but accompanying words indicated that it was meant as a receipt for the cash proceeds of the check, it is not an indorsement. If the signature is not qualified in any way and appears in the place normally used for indorsements, it may be an indorsement even though the signer intended the signature to be a receipt. To take another example, suppose the drawee of a draft signs the draft on the back in the space usually used for indorsements. No words accompany the signature. Since the drawee has no reason to sign a draft unless the intent is to accept the draft, the signature is effective as an acceptance. Custom and usage may be used to determine intent. For example, by long established custom and usage, a signature in the lower right hand corner of an instrument indicates an intent to sign as the maker of a note or the drawer of a draft. Any similar clear indication of an intent to sign in some other capacity may be enough to establish that a signature is not an indorsement.

The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is based on subsection (2) of present Section 3-202 [30-3-202(2) prior to 1991 revision]. An indorsement on an allonge is valid even though there is sufficient space on the instrument for an indorsement.

2. Assume that Payee indorses a note to Creditor as security for a debt. Under subsection (b) of Section 3-203 [30-3-210(2)] Creditor takes Payee's rights to enforce or transfer the instrument subject to the limitations imposed by Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (c) of Section 3-204 [30-3-203(3)] makes clear that Payee's indorsement to Creditor, even though it mentions creation of a security interest, is an unqualified indorsement that gives to Creditor the right to enforce the note as its holder.

3. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is a restatement of present Section 3-203 [30-3-203 prior to 1991 revision]. Section 3-110(a) [30-3-126(1)] states that an instrument is payable to the person intended by the person signing as or in the name or behalf of the maker or drawer even if that person is identified by a name that is not the true name of the person. In some cases the name used in the instrument is a misspelling of the correct name and in some cases the two names may be entirely different. The payee may indorse in the name used in the instrument, in the payee's correct name, or in both. In each case the indorsement is effective. But because an indorsement in a name different from that used in the instrument may raise a question about its validity and an indorsement in a name that is not the correct name of the payee may raise a problem of identifying the indorser, the accepted commercial practice is to indorse in both names. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] allows a person paying or taking the instrument for value or collection to require indorsement in both names.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Wrong or misspelled name. 30-3-204. Special indorsement — blank indorsement — anomalous indorsement.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-205, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 9(5), 33, 34, 35, 36, and 40, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is based on subsection (1) of present Section 3-204 [30-3-204(1) prior to 1991 revision]. It states the test of a special indorsement to be whether the indorsement identifies a person to whom the instrument is payable. Section 3-110 [30-3-126] states rules for identifying the payee of an instrument. Section 3-205(a) [30-3-204(1)] incorporates the principles stated in Section 3-110 [30-3-126] in identifying an indorsee. The language of Section 3-110 [30-3-126] refers to language used by the drawer or maker. When that section is used with respect to an indorsement, Section 3-110 [30-3-126] must be read as referring to the language used by the indorser.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is based on subsection (2) of present Section 3-204 [30-3-204(2) prior to 1991 revision]. An indorsement made by the holder is either a special or blank indorsement. If the indorsement is made by a holder and is not a special indorsement, it is a blank indorsement. A blank indorsement is usually the signature of the indorser on the back of the instrument without other words. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is based on subsection (3) of present Section 3-204 [30-3-204(3) prior to 1991 revision]. A "restrictive indorsement" described in Section 3-206 [30-3-205] can be either a blank indorsement or a special indorsement. "Pay to T, in trust for B" is a restrictive indorsement. It is also a special indorsement because it identifies T as the person to whom the instrument is payable. "For deposit only" followed by the signature of the payee of a check is a restrictive indorsement. It is also a blank indorsement because it does not identify the person to whom the instrument is payable.

3. The only effect of an "anomalous indorsement," defined in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section], is to make the signer liable on the instrument as an indorser. Such an indorsement is normally made by an accommodation party. Section 3-419 [30-3-415].

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Special endorsement — blank endorsement. (1) A special endorsement specifies the person to whom or to whose order it makes the instrument payable. Any instrument specially endorsed becomes payable to the order of the special endorsee and may be further negotiated only by his endorsement.

(2) An endorsement in blank specifies no particular endorsee and may consist of a mere signature. An instrument payable to order and endorsed in blank becomes payable to bearer and may be negotiated by delivery alone until specially endorsed.

(3) The holder may convert a blank endorsement into a special endorsement by writing over the signature of the endorser in blank any contract consistent with the character of the endorsement."

30-3-205. Restrictive indorsement.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-206, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 36 and 39, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This section replaces present Sections 3-205 [30-3-205 prior to 1991 revision] and 3-206 [30-3-206, now repealed] and attempts to clarify the law of restrictive indorsements.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] provides that an indorsement that purports to limit further transfer or negotiation is ineffective to prevent further transfer or negotiation. If a payee indorses "Pay A only," A may negotiate the instrument to subsequent holders who may ignore the restriction on the indorsement. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] provides that an indorsement that states a condition to the right of a holder to receive payment is ineffective to condition payment. Thus if a payee indorses "Pay A if A ships goods complying with our contract," the right of A to enforce the instrument is not affected by the condition. In the case of a note, the obligation of the maker to pay A is not affected by the indorsement. In the case of a check, the drawee can pay A without regard to the condition, and if the check is dishonored the drawer is liable to pay A. If the check was negotiated by the payee to A in return for a promise to perform a contract and the promise was not kept, the payee would have a defense or counterclaim against A if the check were dishonored and A sued the payee as indorser, but the payee would have that defense or counterclaim whether or not the condition to the right of A was expressed in the indorsement. Present Section 3-206 [30-3-206, now repealed] treats a conditional indorsement like indorsements for deposit or collection. Proposed subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] rejects that approach and makes the conditional indorsement ineffective with respect to parties other than the indorser and indorsee. Since the indorsements referred to in subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] are not effective as restrictive indorsements, they are no longer described as restrictive indorsements.

3. The great majority of restrictive indorsements are those that fall within subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] which continues present law. The depositary bank or the payor bank, if it takes the check for immediate payment over the counter, must act consistently with the indorsement, but an intermediary bank or payor bank that takes the check from a collecting bank is not affected by the indorsement. Any other person is also bound by the indorsement. For example, a check is payable to X, who indorses in blank but writes above the signature the words "For deposit only." The check is stolen and is cashed at a grocery store by the thief. The grocery store indorses the check and deposits it in Depositary Bank. The account of the grocery store is credited and the check is forwarded to Payor Bank which pays the check. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section], the grocery store and Depositary Bank are converters of the check because X did not receive the proceeds of the check. Payor Bank and any intermediary bank in the collection process are not liable to X.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is based on subsection (4) of present Section 3-206 [30-3-206, now repealed]. Payee indorses a check "Pay to T in trust for B." T indorses in blank and delivers it to (a) Holder for value; (b) Depositary Bank for collection; or (c) Payor Bank for payment. In each case these takers can safely pay T so long as they have no notice under proposed Section 3-307 [30-3-308] of any breach of trust that T may be committing. For example, under subsection (a) of proposed Section 3-307 [30-3-308(1)] these takers have notice of a breach of trust if the check was taken in any transaction known by the taker to be for T's personal benefit. Subsequent transferees of the check from Holder or Depositary Bank are not affected by the restriction unless they have knowledge that T dealt with the check in breach of trust.

5. Subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] allows a restrictive indorsement to be used as a defense by a person obliged to pay the instrument if that person would be liable for paying in violation of the indorsement.

Case Notes

Existence of Fiduciary Duty Considered Question of Law, Not Fact — Summary Judgment on Question Proper if No Genuine Issue of Material Fact Exists: To resolve several inconsistent prior opinions, the Supreme Court held that the issue of whether a fiduciary duty exists between two parties is a question of law, not fact, and thus may be resolved on summary judgment if no genuine issues of material fact exist. Similarly, the issue of whether a special relationship exists between two parties that would give rise to a fiduciary relationship is also a question of law, not fact. In order to determine whether a special relationship exists in cases in which it does not normally exist, such as between a bank and a customer, a court may be required to make a fact-intensive inquiry. The circumstances of a particular relationship are factual, so disputes over material facts will preclude summary judgment, but the conclusion drawn by a court from undisputed facts is one of law, not of fact. 30-3-208. Reacquisition.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-207, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 48, 50 and 121, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Section 3-207 [30-3-208] restates present Section 3-208 [30-3-208 prior to 1991 revision]. Reacquisition refers to cases in which a former holder reacquires the instrument either by negotiation from the present holder or by a transfer other than negotiation. If the reacquisition is by negotiation, the former holder reacquires the status of holder. Although Section 3-207 [30-3-208] allows the holder to cancel all indorsements made after the holder first acquired holder status, cancellation is not necessary. Status of holder is not affected whether or not cancellation is made. But if the reacquisition is not the result of negotiation the former holder can obtain holder status only by striking the former holder's indorsement and any subsequent indorsements. The latter case is an exception to the general rule that if an instrument is payable to an identified person, the indorsement of that person is necessary to allow a subsequent transferee to obtain the status of holder. Reacquisition without indorsement by the person to whom the instrument is payable is illustrated by two examples:

Case #1. X, a former holder, buys the instrument from Y, the present holder. Y delivers the instrument to X but fails to indorse it. Negotiation does not occur because the transfer of possession did not result in X's becoming holder. Section 3-201(a) [30-3-202(1)]. The instrument by its terms is payable to Y, not to X. But X can obtain the status of holder by striking X's indorsement and all subsequent indorsements. When these indorsements are struck, the instrument by its terms is payable either to X or to bearer, depending upon how X originally became holder. In either case X becomes holder. Section 1-201(20) [30-1-201(20)].

Case #2. X, the holder of an instrument payable to X, negotiates it to Y by special indorsement. The negotiation is part of an underlying transaction between X and Y. The underlying transaction is rescinded by agreement of X and Y, and Y returns the instrument without Y's indorsement. The analysis is the same as that in Case #1. X can obtain holder status by cancelling X's indorsement to Y. In Case #1 and Case #2, X acquired ownership of the instrument after reacquisition, but X's title was clouded because the instrument by its terms was not payable to X. Normally, X can remedy the problem by obtaining Y's indorsement, but in some cases X may not be able to conveniently obtain that indorsement. Section 3-208 [30-3-208] is a rule of convenience which relieves X of the burden of obtaining an indorsement that serves no substantive purpose. The effect of cancellation of any indorsement under Section 3-208 [30-3-208] is to nullify it. Thus, the person whose indorsement is canceled is relieved of indorser's liability. Since cancellation is notice of discharge, discharge is effective even with respect to the rights of a holder in due course. Sections 3-601 [30-3-601] and 3-604 [30-3-605].

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Where an instrument is returned to or reacquired by a prior party he may cancel any endorsement which is not necessary to his title and reissue or further negotiate the instrument, but any intervening party is discharged as against the reacquiring party and subsequent holders not in due course and if his endorsement has been canceled is discharged as against subsequent holders in due course as well."

30-3-209. Negotiation subject to rescission.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-202, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section is based on present Section 3-207 [30-3-207, now repealed]. Subsection (2) of present Section 3-207 [30-3-207, now repealed] prohibits the rescinding of a negotiation against holders in due course. Subsection (b) of proposed Section 3-202 [30-3-209(2)] extends this protection to payor banks.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies even though the lack of capacity or the illegality, is of a character which goes to the essence of the transaction and makes it entirely void. It is inherent in the character of negotiable instruments that any person in possession of an instrument which by its terms is payable to that person or to bearer is a holder and may be dealt with by anyone as a holder. The principle finds its most extreme application in the well settled rule that a holder in due course may take the instrument even from a thief and be protected against the claim of the rightful owner. The policy of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is that any person to whom an instrument is negotiated is a holder until the instrument has been recovered from that person's possession. The remedy of a person with a claim to an instrument is to recover the instrument by replevin or otherwise; to impound it or to enjoin its enforcement, collection or negotiation; to recover its proceeds from the holder; or to intervene in any action brought by the holder against the obligor. As provided in Section 3-305(c) [30-3-305(3)], the claim of the claimant is not a defense to the obligor unless the claimant defends the action.

3. There can be no rescission or other remedy against a holder in due course even though the prior negotiation may have been fraudulent or illegal in its essence and entirely void. As against any other party the claimant may have any remedy permitted by law. This section is not intended to specify what that remedy may be, or to prevent any court from imposing conditions or limitations such as prompt action or return of the consideration received. All such questions are left to the law of the particular jurisdiction. Section 3-202 [30-3-209] gives no right that would not otherwise exist. The section is intended to mean that any remedies afforded by other law are cut off only by a holder in due course.

30-3-210. Rights acquired by transfer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-203, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Section 3-203 [30-3-210] is based on present Section 3-201 [30-3-201, now repealed] which states that a transferee receives such rights as the transferor has. The present section is confusing because some rights of the transferor are not vested in the transferee unless the transfer is a negotiation. For example, a transferee that does not become the holder can not negotiate the instrument, a right that the transferor had. Present Section 3-201 [30-3-201, now repealed] does not define "transfer." Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] defines transfer by limiting it to cases in which possession of the instrument is delivered. It excludes cases in which the owner of an instrument may attempt to give ownership rights to someone else without delivering the instrument. For example, X is the owner and holder of an instrument payable to X. X sells the instrument to Y but is unable to deliver immediate possession to Y. Instead, Y signs a document transferring all of X's right, title, and interest in the instrument to Y. Although the document may be effective to give Y a claim to ownership of the instrument, Y is not a person entitled to enforce the instrument under Section 3-301 [30-3-301] until Y obtains possession of the instrument. That kind of transaction is not covered by Section 3-203(a) [30-3-210(1)]. The instrument is not transferred until it is delivered. An instrument is a reified right to payment. The right is represented by the instrument itself. The right to payment is transferred by delivery of possession of the instrument "by a person other than its issuer for the purpose of giving to the person receiving delivery the right to enforce the instrument." The quoted phrase excludes issue of an instrument, defined in Section 3-105 [30-3-125], and cases in which a transfer of possession is for some other purpose than transfer of the right to enforce. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is designed to clarify present law rather than to change it.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states that transfer vests in the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument "including any right as a holder in due course." If the transferee is not a holder because the transferor did not indorse, the transferee is nevertheless a person entitled to enforce the instrument under Section 3-301 [30-3-301] if the transferor was a holder at the time of transfer. Although the transferee is not a holder, under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] the transferee obtained the rights of the transferor as holder. Because the transferee's rights are derivative of the transferor's rights, those rights must be proved. Because the transferee is not a holder, there is no presumption under Section 3-308 [30-3-307] that the transferee, by producing the instrument, is entitled to payment. The instrument, by its terms, is not payable to the transferee and the transferee must account for possession of the unindorsed instrument by proving the transaction through which the transferee acquired it. Proof of a transfer to the transferee by a holder is proof that the transferee has acquired the rights of a holder. At that point the transferee is entitled to the presumption under Section 3-308 [30-3-307].

Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] a holder in due course that transfers an instrument transfers those rights as a holder in due course to the purchaser. The policy is to assure the holder in due course a free market for the instrument. There is one exception to this rule stated in the concluding clause of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. A person who is party to fraud or illegality affecting the instrument is not permitted to wash the instrument clean by passing it into the hands of a holder in due course and then repurchasing it.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies only to a transfer for value. It applies only if the instrument is payable to order or specially indorsed to the transferor. The transferee acquires, in the absence of a contrary agreement, the specifically enforceable right to the indorsement of the transferor. Unless otherwise agreed, it is a right to the general indorsement of the transferor with full liability as indorser, rather than to an indorsement without recourse. The question may arise if the transferee has paid in advance and the indorsement is omitted fraudulently or through oversight. A transferor who is willing to indorse only without recourse or unwilling to indorse at all should make those intentions clear before transfer. The agreement of the transferee to take less than an unqualified indorsement need not be an express one, and the understanding may be implied from conduct, from past practice, or from the circumstances of the transaction. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] provides that there is no negotiation of the instrument until the indorsement by the transferor is made. Until that time the transferee does not become a holder, and if earlier notice of a defense or claim is received, the transferee does not qualify as a holder in due course under Section 3-302 [30-3-302].

4. The operation of Section 3-203 [30-3-210] is illustrated by the following cases. In each case Payee, by fraud, induced Maker to issue a note to Payee. The fraud is a defense to the obligation of Maker to pay the note under Section 3-305(a)(2) [30-3-305(1)(b)].

Case #1. Payee negotiated the note to X who took as a holder in due course. After the instrument became overdue X negotiated the note to Y who had notice of the fraud. Y succeeds to X's rights as a holder in due course and takes free of Maker's defense of fraud.

Case #2. Payee negotiated the note to X who took as a holder in due course. Payee then repurchased the note from X. Payee does not succeed to X's rights as a holder in due course and is subject to Maker's defense of fraud.

Case #3. Payee negotiated the note to X who took as a holder in due course. X sold the note to Purchaser who received possession. The note, however, was indorsed to X and X failed to indorse it. Purchaser is a person entitled to enforce the instrument under Section 3-301 [30-3-301] and succeeds to the rights of X as holder in due course. Purchaser is not a holder, however, and under Section 3-308 [30-3-307] Purchaser will have to prove the transaction with X under which the rights of X as holder in due course were acquired.

Case #4. Payee sold the note to Purchaser who took for value, in good faith and without notice of the defense of Maker. Purchaser received possession of the note but Payee neglected to indorse it. Purchaser became a person entitled to enforce the instrument but did not become holder because of the missing indorsement. If Purchaser received notice of the defense of Maker before obtaining the indorsement of Payee, Purchaser cannot become a holder in due course because at the time notice was received the note had not been negotiated to Purchaser. If indorsement by Payee was made after Purchaser received notice, Purchaser had notice of the defense when it became holder.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] restates present Section 3-202(3) [30-3-202(3) prior to 1991 revision]. The cause of action on an instrument cannot be split. Any indorsement which purports to convey to any party less than the entire amount of the instrument is not effective for negotiation. This is true of either "Pay A one-half," or "Pay A two-thirds and B one-third." Neither A nor B becomes a holder. On the other hand an indorsement reading merely "Pay A and B" is effective, since it transfers the entire cause of action to A and B as tenants in common.

The partial indorsement does, however, operate as a partial assignment of the cause of action. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] makes no attempt to state the legal effect of such an assignment, which is left to other law. A partial assignee of an instrument has rights only to the extent the applicable law gives rights, either at law or in equity, to a partial assignee.

Payee-Assignor's Right to Attorney Fees Provided for by Note: Maker gave payee a promissory note which provided that maker would pay reasonable attorney fees incurred in collection of the note. Payee assigned it to corporation which sued maker on the note, maker in turn filing a third-party complaint against payee-assignor for fraudulent inducement for the note, wrongful assignment of it, and lack of consideration for it. Payee-assignor had no right to attorney fees as against maker, either under the note or under 28-3-704, which provides that when a contract grants the right to recover attorney fees to one party to the contract, then all parties to the contract have that right in any action on the contract. He had assigned all his rights under the note, and the complaint against him was not a collection action under the note. Sliter's v. Lee, 197 M 182, 641 P2d 475, 39 St. Rep. 453 (1982).

Rights of a Holder

30-3-301. Person entitled to enforce instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-301, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 51, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

This section replaces present Section 3-301 [30-3-301], which states the rights of a holder. It is not necessary to state the rights of a holder. Other sections of proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] make clear how an instrument is negotiated and how discharge is made. Instead this section defines "person entitled to enforce" an instrument. The definition recognizes that enforcement is not limited to holders. The quoted phrase includes a person enforcing a lost or stolen instrument. Section 3-309 [30-3-309]. It also includes a person in possession of an instrument who is not a holder. A nonholder in possession of an instrument includes a person that acquired rights of a holder by subrogation or under Section 3-203(a) [30-3-210(a)]. It also includes any other person who under applicable law is a successor to the holder or otherwise acquires the holder's rights.

Out-of-State Bank Not Party to Be Joined: Interest in loans transferred to out-of-state bank under participation agreement between lending Montana bank and out-of-state bank prior to commencement of action does not make out-of-state bank true party in interest or person to be joined if feasible when borrower sued on loan agreement and notes payable to lending Montana bank because loan agreement only establishes rights and liabilities between lending Montana bank and borrower, while participation agreement only establishes rights and liabilities between lending Montana bank and out-of-state bank. Neither establishes any contractual relationship, rights or liabilities between borrower and out-of-state bank. Additionally lending Montana bank is owner and sole payee on notes and as holder of notes is entitled to sue in its own name. State ex rel. Drum v. District Court, 169 M 494, 548 P2d 1377 (1976).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Law Governing: Where a contract for the repair of drawer's tractor by payee was entered into and performed in State of Washington, and payee negotiated check to Washington supplier, and assignment of check by supplier to creditor occurred in Washington, Washington law was applied in creditor's suit on check against drawer. Tesdahl v. Hiebert, 148 M 241, 419 P2d 298 (1966).

Bona Fide Purchaser: Where payee negotiated check to supplier for face amount of check and supplier lacked notice, either actual or constructive, of any defect in instrument, supplier was "holder in due course" and took instrument free from any defenses existing between drawer and payee. Tesdahl v. Hiebert, 148 M 241, 419 P2d 298 (1966).

Affirmative Defense: Where territorial rights for sales of packaged hosiery were given to defendants in return for $10,000 which was represented by a note made payable to plaintiff, the affirmative defense, in action for $6,000 unpaid on note, that plaintiff had breached agreement by doing business in restricted territory was not a complete and valid defense but was an offset to be determined by testimony in mitigation of unpaid balance on note. Leiman-Scott, Inc. v. Holmes, 142 M 58, 381 P2d 489 (1963).

When Entitled to Position of Holder: In action on a check, plaintiff is not entitled to position of a holder in due course unless check was regular upon its face, plaintiff had no notice of any infirmity therein, and plaintiff took it in good faith. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 119 M 581, 179 P2d 750, 171 ALR 790 (1947).

Action by Administrator: The mere possession of a promissory note by a foreign administrator, made payable to the order of and transferred to his intestate but never endorsed, does not constitute him a holder thereof within the meaning of the Negotiable Instruments Law, and he is therefore not entitled to maintain an action thereon in his individual capacity but may maintain it only in his representative capacity after taking out ancillary letters. Parcells v. Price, 110 M 537, 104 P2d 12 (1940); State ex rel. Freebourn v. Merchants' Credit Serv., Inc., 104 M 76, 66 P2d 337 (1937), overruled on other grounds, Rae v. Estoppel to Assert: One reaping benefit of his note to county for balance due him on depository bond by reduction of legal interest rate, release of bond obligation, and extension of time for payment thereof, during which Statute of Limitations ran against action on bond, and recognizing validity of note by making some payments thereon, will not be permitted to say that it is invalid and unenforceable as postponing obligation or liability in violation of Constitution. Fergus County v. Osweiler, 107 M 466, 86 P2d 410, 120 ALR 1457 (1938).

Plea of Undue Influence: In action on note, answer showing that defendant, plaintiff's brother, suffered from paresis which had weakened his mind, that he reposed special confidence in plaintiff, and that plaintiff, taking advantage of confidence, unduly influenced defendant to make the note, was sufficient as a plea of undue influence. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934).

Allegation of Ownership Not Required: A holder of a note may maintain an action for its collection; it is not required that the plaintiff in such an action allege in his complaint that he is owner at the time. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Simpson, 54 M 316, 170 P 12 (1918), distinguished in Cont. Supply Co. v. White, 92 M 254, 12 P2d 569 (1932), explained in Woody v. Sec. St. Bank, 67 M 109, 214 P 1096 (1923).

Complaint — Allegation as to Ownership: In action on note plaintiff must allege that he is the holder or owner of the note. Young v. Bray, 54 M 415, 170 P 1044 (1918). See also Matteson v. Trask, 63 M 160, 206 P 428 (1922).

30-3-302. Holder in due course.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-302, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 52, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] is a return to the N.I.L. rule that the taker of an irregular or incomplete instrument is not a person the law should protect against defenses of the obligor or claims of prior owners. This reflects a policy choice against extending the harsh holder in due course doctrine to an instrument that is so incomplete or irregular "as to call into question its authenticity." The term "authenticity" is used to make it clear that the irregularity or incompleteness must indicate that the instrument may not be what it purports to be. Persons who purchase or pay such instruments should do so at their own risk. Under subsection (1) of present Section 3-304 [30-3-304(1) prior to 1991 revision], irregularity or incompleteness gives a purchaser notice of a claim or defense. But it is not clear from that provision whether the claim or defense must be related to the irregularity or incomplete aspect of the instrument. This ambiguity is not present in proposed subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section].

2. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] restates subsection (1) of present Section 3-302 [30-3-302(1) prior to 1991 revision]. Section 3-305(a) [30-3-305(1)] makes a distinction between defenses to the obligation to pay an instrument and claims in recoupment by the maker or drawer that may be asserted to reduce the amount payable on the instrument. Because of this change to Section 3-305 [30-3-305], the reference in subsection (a)(2)(vi) [subsection (1)(b)(vi) of this section] is to both a defense and a claim in recoupment. Notice of forgery or alteration is stated separately because forgery and alteration are not technically defenses under subsection (a) of Section 3-305 [30-3-305(1)].

3. Discharge is also separately treated in the first sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. Except for discharge in an insolvency proceeding, which is specifically stated to be a real defense in Section 3-305(a)(1) [30-3-305(1)(a)], discharge is not expressed in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] as a defense and is not included in Section 3-305(a)(2) [30-3-305(1)(b)]. Discharge is effective against anybody except a person having rights of a holder in due course who took the instrument without notice of the discharge. Notice of discharge does not disqualify a person from becoming a holder in due course. For example, a check certified after it is negotiated by the payee may subsequently be negotiated to a holder. If the holder had notice that the certification occurred after negotiation by the payee, the holder necessarily had notice of the discharge of the payee as indorser. Section 3-415(d) [30-3-414(4)]. Notice of that discharge does not prevent the holder from becoming a holder in due course, but the discharge is effective against the holder. Section 3-601(b) [30-3-601(2)]. Notice of a defense under Section 3-305(a)(1) [30-3-305(1)(a)] of a maker, drawer or acceptor based on a bankruptcy discharge is different. There is no reason to give holder in due course status to a person with notice of that defense. The second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is from present Section 3-304(5) [30-3-304(5) prior to 1991 revision].

4. Professor Britton in his treatise Bills and Notes 309 (1961) stated: "A substantial number of decisions before the [N.I.L.] indicates that at common law there was nothing in the position of the payee as such which made it impossible for him to be a holder in due course." The courts were divided, however, about whether the payee of an instrument could be a holder in due course under the N.I.L.. Some courts read N.I.L. Section 52(4) to mean that a person could be a holder in due course only if the instrument was "negotiated" to that person. N.I.L. Section 30 stated that "an instrument is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such manner as to constitute the transferee the holder thereof." Normally, an instrument is "issued" to the payee; it is not transferred to the payee. N.I.L. Section 191 defined "issue" as the "first delivery of the instrument . . . to a person who takes it as a holder." Thus, some courts concluded that the payee never could be a holder in due course. Other courts concluded that there was no evidence that the N.I.L. was intended to change the common law rule that the payee could be a holder in due course. Professor Britton states on p. 318: "The typical situations which raise the [issue] are those where the defense of a maker is interposed because of fraud by a [maker who is] principal debtor . . . against a surety co-maker, or where the defense of fraud by a purchasing remitter is interposed by the drawer of the instrument against the good faith purchasing payee."

Present Section 3-302(2) [30-3-302(2) prior to 1991 revision] states: "A payee may be a holder in due course." This provision was intended to resolve the split of authority under the N.I.L.. It makes clear that there was no intent to change the common-law rule that allowed a payee to become a holder in due course. See Comment 2 to present Section 3-302 [30-3-302 prior to 1991 revision]. But there was no need to put subsection (2) in present Section 3-302 [30-3-302 prior to 1991 revision] because the split in authority under the N.I.L. was caused by the particular wording of N.I.L. Section 52(4). The troublesome language in that section is not repeated in present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3 prior to 1991 revision] nor is it repeated in proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Present Section 3-302(2) [30-3-302(2) prior to 1991 revision] has not been repeated in proposed Section 3-302 [30-3-302] because it is surplusage. There is no intent to change the present law. The payee of an instrument can be a holder in due course. But present Section 3-302(2) [30-3-302(2) prior to 1991 revision] may be misread as suggesting that use of the holder-in-due-course doctrine by the payee of an instrument is the normal situation. It is not.

The primary importance of the concept of holder in due course is with respect to assertion of defenses or claims in recoupment (Section 3-305 [30-3-305]) and of claims to the instrument (Section 3-306 [30-3-306]). The holder-in-due-course doctrine assumes the following case as typical. Obligor issues a note or check to Obligee. Obligor is the maker of the note or drawer of the check. Obligee is the payee. Obligor has some defense to Obligor's obligation to pay the instrument. For example, Obligor issued the instrument for goods that Obligee promised to deliver. Obligee never delivered the goods. The failure of Obligee to deliver the goods is a defense. Section 3-303(b) [30-3-303(2)]. Although Obligor has a defense against Obligee, if the instrument is negotiated to Holder and the requirements of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] are met, Holder may enforce the instrument against Obligor free of the defense. Section 3-305(b) [30-3-305(2)]. In the typical case the holder in due course is not the payee of the instrument. Rather, the holder in due course is an immediate or remote transferee of the payee. If Obligor in our example is the only obligor on the check or note, the holder-in-due-course doctrine is irrelevant in determining rights between Obligor and Obligee with respect to the instrument.

But in a small percentage of cases it is appropriate to allow the payee of an instrument to assert rights as a holder in due course. The cases are like those referred to in the quotation from Professor Britton referred to above, or other cases in which conduct of some third party is the basis of the defense of the issuer of the instrument. The following are examples:

Case #1. Buyer pays for goods bought from Seller by giving to Seller a cashier's check bought from Bank. Bank has a defense to payment of the check because Buyer bought the check from Bank with an insufficient funds check. If Bank issued the check in the name of Buyer as payee and Buyer indorsed it over to Seller, it is clear that Seller can be a holder in due course taking free of the defense if Seller had no notice of the defense. Seller is a transferee of the check. There is no good reason why Seller's position should be any different if Bank issued the check in the name of Seller as payee. When Buyer took delivery of the check from Bank, Buyer became the owner of the check even though Buyer was not the holder. Buyer was a remitter. Section

3-103(a)(11) [30-3-102(1)(k)]. At that point nobody was the holder. When Buyer delivered the check to Seller, ownership of the check was transferred to Seller who also became the holder. This is a negotiation. Section 3-201 [30-3-202]. The rights of Seller should not be affected by the fact that in one case the negotiation to Seller was by a holder and in the other case the negotiation was by a remitter. Moreover, it should be irrelevant whether Bank delivered the check to Buyer and Buyer delivered it to Seller or whether Bank delivered it directly to Seller. In either case Seller can be a holder in due course that takes free of Bank's defense.

Case #2. X, by fraudulent misrepresentations, induces Y to join X in a purchase of speculative securities. The purchase is to be financed by a bank loan for part of the price and the balance by cash contributed by X and Y in equal shares. Bank lends money to X and Y by deposit in a joint account of X and Y who sign a note payable to Bank for the amount of the loan. X then withdraws the money from the joint account and absconds. Bank acted in good faith and without notice of the fraud of X against Y. Bank is payee of the note executed by Y, but its right to enforce the note against Y should not be affected by the fact that Y was induced to execute the note by the fraud of X. Bank can be a holder in due course that takes free of the defense of Y. Case #2 is similar to Case #1. In each case the payee of the instrument has given value to the person committing the fraud in exchange for the obligation of the person against whom the fraud was committed. In each case the payee was not party to the fraud and had no notice of it.

Suppose in Case #2 that the note does not meet the requirements of Section 3-104(a)(1) [30-3-104(1)(a)] and thus is not a negotiable instrument and is not covered by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] at all. In that case, Bank cannot be a holder in due course but the result should be the same. Bank's rights are determined by general principles of contract law. Restatement Second, Contracts §164(2) governs the case. If Y is induced to enter into a contract with Bank by a fraudulent misrepresentation by X, the contract is voidable by Y unless Bank "in good faith and without reason to know of the misrepresentation either gives value or relies materially on the transaction." Comment e to §164(2) states: "This is the same principle that protects an innocent person who purchases goods or commercial paper in good faith, without notice and for value from one who obtained them from the original owner by a misrepresentation. See Uniform Commercial Code 2-403(1) [30-2-403(1)], 3-305 [30-3-305]. In the cases that fall within [§164(2)], however, the innocent person deals directly with the recipient of the misrepresentation, which is made by one not a party to the contract."

The same result follows in Case #2 if Y had been induced to sign the note as an accommodation party (Section 3-419 [30-3-415]). If Bank is a holder in due course, the fraud of X cannot be asserted against Bank under Section 3-305(b) [30-3-305(2)]. But the result is the same without resort to holder-in-due-course doctrine. Y, as an accommodation party, is liable to Bank as maker of the note (Section 3-419(b) [30-3-415(2)]) but has rights against X as a surety or guarantor of X's obligation to pay the note and has a right of recourse against X if Y pays the note. Section 3-419(e) [30-3-415(5)]. Restatement, Security §119 states that the surety (Y) cannot assert a defense against the creditor (Bank) based on the fraud of the principal (X) if the creditor "without knowledge of the fraud . . . extended credit to the principal on the security of the surety's promise . . .." The underlying principle of §119 is the same as that of §164(2) of Restatement Second, Contracts.

Case #3. Corporation draws a check payable to Bank. The check is given to an officer of Corporation who is instructed to deliver it to Bank in payment of a debt owed by Corporation to Bank. Instead, the officer, intending to defraud Corporation, delivers the check to Bank in payment of the officer's personal debt, or the check is delivered to Bank for deposit to the officer's personal account. If Bank obtains payment of the check, Bank has received funds of Corporation which have been used for the personal benefit of the officer. Corporation in this case will assert a claim to the proceeds of the check against Bank. If Bank was a holder in due course of the check it took the check free of Corporation's claim. Section 3-306 [30-3-306]. The issue in this case is whether Bank had notice of the claim when it took the check. If Bank knew that the officer was a fiduciary with respect to the check, the issue is governed by Section 3-307 [30-3-308].

Case #4. Employer, who owed money to X, signed a blank check and delivered it to Secretary with instructions to complete the check by typing in X's name and the amount owed to X. Secretary fraudulently completed the check by typing in the name of Y, a creditor to whom Secretary owed money. Secretary then delivered the check to Y in payment of Secretary's debt. Y obtained payment of the check. This case is similar to Case #3. Since Secretary was authorized to complete the check, Employer is bound by Secretary's act in making the check payable to Y. The drawee bank properly paid the check. Y received funds of Employer which were used for the personal benefit of Secretary. Employer asserts a claim to these funds against Y. If Y is a holder in due course, Y takes free of the claim. Whether Y is a holder in due course depends upon whether Y had notice of Employer's claim.

5. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is based on present Section 3-302(3) [30-3-302(3) prior to 1991 revision]. Like present Section 3-302(3) [30-3-302(3) prior to 1991 revision] proposed subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is intended to state existing case law. It covers a few situations in which the purchaser takes an instrument under unusual circumstances which indicate that the purchaser is merely a successor in interest to the prior holder and can acquire no better rights. But if the prior holder was a holder in due course, the purchaser obtains rights of a holder in due course. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies to a purchaser at an execution sale, a sale in bankruptcy or a sale by a state bank commissioner of the assets of an insolvent bank. It applies equally to an attaching creditor or any other person who acquires the instrument by legal process or to a representative, such as an executor, administrator, receiver or assignee for the benefit of creditors, who takes the instrument as part of an estate.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies to bulk purchases lying outside of the ordinary course of business of the seller. It applies, for example, when a new partnership takes over for value all of the assets of an old one after a new member has entered the firm, or to a reorganized or consolidated corporation taking over in bulk the assets of a predecessor. It has particular application to the purchase by one bank of a substantial part of the paper held by another bank which is threatened with insolvency and seeking to liquidate its assets.

6. Subsection (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5) of this section] clarify two matters not specifically addressed by present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]:

Case #5. Payee negotiates a $1,000 note to Holder who agrees to pay $900 for it. After paying $500, Holder learns that Payee defrauded Maker in the transaction giving rise to the note. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] Holder may assert rights as a holder in due course to the extent of $555.55 ($500/$900 = .555 X $1,000 = $555.55). This formula rewards Holder with a ratable portion of the bargained for profit.

Case #6. Payee negotiates a note of Maker for $1,000 to Holder as security for payment of Payee's debt to Holder of $600. Maker has a defense which is good against Payee but of which Holder has no notice. Subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] governs Case #2. Holder may assert rights as a holder in due course only to the extent of $600. Payee does not get the benefit of the holder-in-due-course status of Holder. With respect to $400 of the note, Maker may assert any rights that Maker has against Payee. A different result follows if the payee of a note negotiated it to a person who took it as a holder in due course and that person pledged the note as security for a debt. Because the defense cannot be asserted against the pledgor, the pledgee can assert rights as a holder in due course for the full amount of the note for the benefit of both the pledgor and the pledgee.

7. There is a large body of statutory and case law restricting the use of the holder in due course doctrine in consumer transactions as well as some business transactions that raise similar issues. Subsection (h) [subsection (8) of this section] subordinates Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] to that law and any other similar law that may evolve in the future. Section 3-106(d) [30-3-105(4)] also relates to statutory or administrative law intended to restrict use of the holder-in-due-course doctrine. See Comment 3 to Section 3-106 [30-3-105].

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) A holder in due course is a holder who takes the instrument:

(a) for value; and

(b) in good faith; and

(c) without notice that it is overdue or has been dishonored or of any defense against or claim to it on the part of any person.

(2) A payee may be a holder in due course.

(3) A holder does not become a holder in due course of an instrument:

(a) by purchase of it at judicial sale or by taking it under legal process; or

(b) by acquiring it in taking over an estate; or

(c) by purchasing it as part of a bulk transaction not in regular course of business of the transferor.

(4) A purchaser of a limited interest can be a holder in due course only to the extent of the interest purchased."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Superior Rights as Between Holder of Perfected Security Interest in Collateral and Purchaser of Collateral: Equipment owned by Gauvin and used to secure a promissory note with American Federal Savings and Loan Association (American) was sold to Madison Valley Properties, Inc. (Madison). Upon receipt of the proceeds, Gauvin's girlfriend contacted American for a payoff amount on the promissory note. Gauvin then took a cashier's check from the sale proceeds and converted it to another cashier's check at Valley Bank of Helena (Valley) made out to American for the payoff amount. The check was delivered to American, but later that same day, Valley informed American that the cashier's check had been purchased with stolen funds and was void. American returned the check to Valley, and as a result, the loan was not paid or the lien on the equipment released. American sued Gauvin to recover on the note and sued Madison to recover the equipment. Madison counterclaimed, seeking to quiet title. Summary judgment was granted Madison under the rationale that Madison had superior rights in the collateral equipment. Although American initially received the Valley check in good faith and without notice of the underlying theft, once it was advised of the theft, American could not go forward in good faith and without notice of an adverse claim and Valley's defenses. At the time that it received notice, American still had time and was able to reverse the administrative steps that it had taken to process the loan payment. Notice of the theft could not simply be ignored; therefore, American was required to suspend performance. If it had proceeded in the face of the notice, American could not have claimed holder-in-due-course status. The District Court erred by not first determining whether American was a holder in due course of the cashier's check. Under 30-3-301(1)(a) or (1)(c), American was not a holder in due course because American did not give value. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the summary judgment award of superior rights in the collateral to Madison. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Madison Valley Properties, Inc., 1998 MT 93, 288 M 365, 958 P2d 57, 55 St. Rep. 366 (1998).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Notice of Payment Stopped: Where payee negotiated check to supplier and drawer stopped payment, payee's father, who purchased check stamped "payment stopped" from supplier for value with full knowledge that payment had been stopped on check, was not a holder in due course. Tesdahl v. Hiebert, 148 M 241, 419 P2d 298 (1966).

Altered Instrument: In an action by bank, which, at request of a payee who was known only by sight, had cashed a $5,000 pencil-written check, bearing indications of material alteration, the maker of which was a stranger, without first presenting check to drawee bank in ordinary course of business, evidence was insufficient to sustain judgment for plaintiff bank against maker as against defenses of alteration and bad faith of holder. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 119 M 581, 179 P2d 750, 171 ALR 790 (1947).

Illegal Consideration: A creditor who made illegal agreement with farmer should pay balance of debt notwithstanding creditor's execution of composition agreement in order to obtain Federal Land Bank loan, was not a "holder in due course" of note executed by farmer's son-in-law for amount due under the illegal agreement, and could not recover thereon. May v. Whitbeck, 111 M 568, 113 P2d 332 (1941).

Definition of Holder in Due Course:

Where plaintiffs in an action on a negotiable instrument by their uncontradicted evidence showed that they became the holders of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been dishonored, that they took it in good faith and for value, and that at the time it was negotiated to them they had no notice of any infirmity in the title of the person who negotiated it to them, their showing was sufficient to establish their status as holders in due course, and evidence to establish failure of consideration was inadmissible. Best v. Boyer, 98 M 40, 37 P2d 331 (1934).

A holder of a promissory note who bought it before maturity in good faith paying full value therefor without actual knowledge or notice that it was secured by a mortgage, or of the assignment of the note containing a provision that it was being transferred without recourse, was a holder in due course within the meaning of section 55-502, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). Wood v. Ferguson, 71 M 540, 230 P 592 (1924).

Overdue Note:

One who takes a promissory note by assignment after its maturity is not a holder in due course, and all defenses existing as against the original payee are available in his action to recover thereon. Alward v. Broadway Gold Min. Co., 94 M 45, 20 P2d 647 (1933).

A bank which accepted a note 4 years overdue did not become a holder in due course, but took only the title thereto which the assignor, its debtor, had, with the risk of all defects therein, as well as of the defenses to it or demands existing at the time against him with reference to it. NW. Improvement Co. v. Rhoades, 52 M 428, 158 P 832 (1916).

Discount Purchase: In the absence of evidence showing that plaintiff was not a holder in due course of the note sued upon, and mere fact that he purchased it at a 10% discount was not sufficient to raise an inference or suspicion that he bought a tainted instrument. Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Jury Question: While the question whether a holder of a negotiable instrument is a holder in due course is usually one of fact for the jury to decide, where the facts are shown and undisputed, and the transaction discloses nothing which would justify an inference of bad faith, it becomes one of law and it is the duty of the Trial Court to direct a verdict for plaintiff. Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Knowledge of Representative Capacity: In an action on a promissory note which had never been previously negotiated and was overdue when plaintiff acquired it by assignment, and who was therefore not a holder in due course, parol evidence was admissible to show that defendants with plaintiff's knowledge had endorsed the note with the understanding that each was doing so as representative of an association and not in his personal capacity. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Burden of Proof:

To defeat the claim of ownership of coupon Liberty Bonds, negotiable in character, asserted by plaintiff in his action for their conversion, it was incumbent upon defendant bank to show that it was a holder in due course, under sections 55-502, 55-508, and 55-509, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). Grosfield v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 73 M 219, 236 P 250 (1925).

Under former section 55-509, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), where, after plaintiff endorsee had made out a prima facie case, defendant (drawer) produced evidence tending fairly to prove that the payee had obtained the check through fraud, the burden shifted to plaintiff to prove every fact necessary to show that he was a holder in due course, among them that he took it in good faith and for value, failing in which he was not entitled to recover. Matteson v. Trask, 63 M 160, 206 P 428 (1922).

Knowledge Required to Defeat Holder: To defeat the claim of plaintiff in an action on a promissory note that he was a holder in due course, on the ground that when he acquired it he had notice of a defect of title in the transferor consisting of a breach of faith in the latter as against the maker, it must, under section 55-506, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), be made to appear that he had actual knowledge of the infirmity or knowledge of such facts that his taking it under the circumstances amounted to bad faith. Olsen v. Zappone, 83 M 573, 273 P 635 (1924).

Negotiation by Assignment: One taking a note by assignment is not a holder in due course. Price v. Skylstead, 69 M 453, 222 P 1059 (1924).

Payee Prima Facie Holder in Due Course: The payee of a negotiable promissory note, in possession of it, is a prima facie holder in due course, within the meaning of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, negotiation by endorsement and delivery not being necessary to constitute one a holder in due course. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Necessity of Endorsement: Where a negotiable instrument is payable to order an endorsement is essential to holding in due course. First Nat'l Bank v. Grow, 57 M 376, 188 P 907 (1920).

Breach of Warranty as Defense: Knowledge of a warranty that an automobile would meet certain requirements as to service did not defeat a bank's claim as a holder in due course of promissory notes taken in payment of the machine before maturity, and without being aware of a breach of such warranty. Baker St. Bank v. Grant, 54 M 7, 166 P 27 (1917).

Reference to Other Instrument: The assignee of a note and mortgage together is not a bona fide holder. Buhler v. Loftus, 53 M 546, 165 P 601 (1917).

Notice of Dishonor: Where the payee in a demand note for $500 assigned it to plaintiff about 20 months after its date, with endorsements thereon showing partial payments amounting to $450 of the principal sum due, and where it appeared that plaintiff, through one of its employees, had notice that there was dispute between the maker and the payee as to whether any balance remained unpaid, plaintiff was not a holder in due course, within the meaning of section 55-502, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), but took the paper with notice of its dishonor. Brophy Groc. Co. v. Wilson, 45 M 489, 124 P 510 (1912).

Part Payment of Demand Note: Part payment of the principal of a demand note is evidence of its dishonor. Brophy Groc. Co. v. Wilson, 45 M 489, 124 P 510 (1912).

30-3-303. Value and consideration.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-303, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 25, 26, 27 and 54, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is a restatement of present Section 3-303 [30-3-303 prior to 1991 revision] and subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] replaces present Section 3-408 [30-3-408 prior to 1991 revision]. The distinction between value and consideration in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] is a very fine one. Whether an instrument is taken for value is relevant to the issue of whether a holder is a holder in due course. If an instrument is not issued for consideration the drawer or maker has a defense to the obligation to pay the instrument. Consideration is defined in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] as "any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract." The definition of value in Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)], which doesn't apply to Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], includes "any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract." Thus, outside Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], anything that is consideration is also value. A different rule applies in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Subsection (b) of Section 3-303 [30-3-303(2)] states that if an instrument is issued for value it is also issued for consideration.

Case #1. X owes Y $1,000. The debt is not represented by a note. Later X issues a note to Y for the debt. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] X's note is issued for value. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] the note is also issued for consideration whether or not, under contract law, X is deemed to have given consideration for the note.

Case #2. X issues a check to Y in consideration of Y's promise to perform services in the future. Although the executory promise is consideration for issuance of the check it is value only to the extent the promise is performed. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section].

Case #3. X issues a note to Y in consideration of Y's promise to perform services. If at the due date of the note Y's performance is not yet due, Y may enforce the note because it was issued for consideration. But if at the due date of the note, Y's performance is due and has not been performed, X has a defense. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section].

2. The policy basis for subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is that the holder that gives an executory promise of performance will not suffer an out-of-pocket loss to the extent the executory promise is unperformed at the time the holder learns of the defense on the instrument. Suppose Payee negotiates a note of Maker to Holder in exchange for Holder's promise to perform services in the future. Before Holder's performance is due, Maker dishonors the note because of a defense good against Payee. Dishonor of the note excuses Holder's performance. The note was taken for Payee's obligation to pay for the services. That obligation was suspended when the note was taken, but it revives when the note is dishonored. Section 3-310(b) [30-3-310(2)]. Since Payee's obligation to pay for the services is unsatisfied, Holder need not perform. Thus, Holder is protected from an out-of-pocket loss even if the note is not enforceable. There is not the same necessity for giving Holder the status of holder in due course as in the case in which an instrument has been taken for property or performed services.

3. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] equates value with the obtaining of a security interest or a nonjudicial lien in the instrument. The term "security interest" covers Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] cases in which an instrument is taken as collateral as well as bank collection cases in which a bank acquires a security interest under Section 4-208 [30-4-215]. The acquisition of a common-law or statutory banker's lien is also value under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. An attaching creditor or other person who acquires a lien by judicial proceedings does not give value for the purposes of subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] and is not a holder in due course. Section 3-302(c) [30-3-302(3)].

4. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] follows present Section 3-303(b) [30-3-303(b) prior to 1991 revision] which adapts the generally accepted rule that the holder takes for value if the instrument is taken in payment of or as security for an antecedent debt, even though there is no extension of time or other concession, and whether or not the debt is due. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] extends the same rule to any claim against any person; there is no requirement that the claim arise out of contract. In particular the provision is intended to apply to an instrument given in payment of or as security for the debt of a third person, even though no concession is made in return.

5. Subsection (a)(4) and (5) [subsections (1)(d) and (1)(e) of this section] restate present Section 3-303(c) [30-3-303(c) prior to 1991 revision]. They state generally recognized exceptions to the rule that an executory promise is not value. A negotiable instrument is value because it carries the possibility of negotiation to a holder in due course, after which the party who gives it is obliged to pay. The same reasoning applies to any irrevocable commitment to a third person, such as a letter of credit issued when an instrument is taken.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. To be a holder in due course, one must take without notice that an instrument is overdue. Section 3-302(a)(2)(iii) [30-3-302(1)(b)(iii)]. Proposed Section 3-304 [30-3-304] replaces subsection (3) of present Section 3-304 [30-3-304(3) prior to 1991 revision]. For the sake of clarity it treats demand and time instruments separately. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies to demand instruments. A check becomes stale after 90 days. Under present Section 3-304(3)(c) [30-3-304(3)(c) prior to 1991 revision], a holder that takes a demand note has notice that it is overdue if it is taken "more than a reasonable length of time after its issue." In substitution for this test, subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] requires the trier of fact to look at both the circumstances of the particular case and the nature of the instrument and trade usage. Whether a demand note is stale may vary a great deal depending on the facts of the particular case.

2. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3) of this section] cover time instruments. They follow the distinction made in the present law between defaults in payment of principal and interest. In subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] installment instruments and single payment instruments are treated separately. If an installment is late, the instrument is overdue until the default is cured.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Notice to purchaser. (1) The purchaser has notice of a claim or defense if:

(a) the instrument is so incomplete, bears such visible evidence of forgery or alteration, or is otherwise so irregular as to call into question its validity, terms or ownership or to create an ambiguity as to the party to pay; or

(b) the purchaser has notice that the obligation of any party is voidable in whole or in part, or that all parties have been discharged.

(2) The purchaser has notice of a claim against the instrument when he has knowledge that a fiduciary has negotiated the instrument in payment of or as security for his own debt or in any transaction for his own benefit or otherwise in breach of duty.

(3) The purchaser has notice that an instrument is overdue if he has reason to know:

(a) that any part of the principal amount is overdue or that there is an uncured default in payment of another instrument of the same series; or

(b) that acceleration of the instrument has been made; or

(c) that he is taking a demand instrument after demand has been made or more than a reasonable length of time after its issue. A reasonable time for a check drawn and payable within the states and territories of the United States and the District of Columbia is presumed to be 30 days.

(4) Knowledge of the following facts does not of itself give the purchaser notice of a defense or claim:

(a) that the instrument is antedated or postdated;

(b) that it was issued or negotiated in return for an executory promise or accompanied by a separate agreement, unless the purchaser has notice that a defense or claim has arisen from the terms thereof;

(c) that any party has signed for accommodation;

(d) that an incomplete instrument has been completed, unless the purchaser has notice of any improper completion;

(e) that any person negotiating the instrument is or was a fiduciary;

(f) that there has been default in payment of interest on the instrument or in payment of any other instrument, except one of the same series.

(5) The filing or recording of a document does not of itself constitute notice within the provisions of this chapter to a person who would otherwise be a holder in due course.

(6) To be effective notice must be received at such time and in such manner as to give a reasonable opportunity to act on it."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Failure to Make Inquiry: In action by bank which cashed check against drawer, evidence supported determination that circumstances surrounding presentment of check were sufficient to have caused bank to become suspicious of apparent alterations and infirmities, and bank's failure to take notice thereof constituted bad faith so as to overcome legal presumption that it was a holder in due course. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 127 M 86, 257 P2d 896 (1953).

Amount Paid: Purchase of note at 10% discount is not sufficient to raise an inference of bad faith on the part of the purchaser. Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Facts Known by Holder: To defeat the claim of plaintiff in an action on a promissory note that he was a holder in due course, on the ground that when he acquired it he had notice of a defect of title in the transferor consisting of a breach of faith in the latter as against the maker, it must, under section 55-506, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), be made to appear that he had actual knowledge of the infirmity or knowledge of such facts that his taking it under the circumstances amounted to bad faith. Olsen v. Zappone, 83 M 573, 273 P 635 (1929).

Knowledge as Imputable to Principal: Knowledge of vice-president of loaning bank, imputed to him as president of the borrowing bank, is not chargeable to the loaning bank, being acquired outside his duties to the bank of which he is not an active officer. Grosfield v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 73 M 219, 236 P 250 (1925).

Trouble with Prior Notes: Notice of dishonor of another note given in the same transaction prevents a purchase in good faith. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown v. Wilson, 57 M 384, 188 P 371 (1920).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 15, 16 and 57, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the defenses to the obligation of a party to pay the instrument. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] states the "real defenses" that may be asserted against any person entitled to enforce the instrument.

Subsection (a)(1)(i) [subsection (1)(a)(i) of this section] allows assertion of the defense of infancy against a holder in due course, even though the effect of the defense is to render the instrument voidable but not void. The policy is one of protection of the infant even at the expense of occasional loss to an innocent purchaser. No attempt is made to state when infancy is available as a defense or the conditions under which it may be asserted. In some jurisdictions it is held that an infant cannot rescind the transaction or set up the defense unless the holder is restored to the position held before the instrument was taken which, in the case of a holder in due course, is normally impossible. In other states an infant who has misrepresented age may be estopped to assert infancy. Such questions are left to other law, as an integral part of the policy of each state as to the protection of infants.

Subsection (a)(1)(ii) [subsection (1)(a)(ii) of this section] covers mental incompetence, guardianship, ultra vires acts or lack of corporate capacity to do business, or any other incapacity apart from infancy. Such incapacity is largely statutory. Its existence and effect is left to the law of each state. If under the state law the effect is to render the obligation of the instrument entirely null and void, the defense may be asserted against a holder in due course. If the effect is merely to render the obligation voidable at the election of the obligor, the defense is cut off.

Duress, which is also covered by subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)(ii) of this section], is a matter of degree. An instrument signed at the point of a gun is void, even in the hands of a holder in due course. One signed under threat to prosecute the son of the maker for theft may be merely voidable, so that the defense is cut off. Illegality is most frequently a matter of gambling or usury, but may arise in many other forms under a great variety of statutes. The statutes differ greatly in their provisions and the interpretations given them. They are primarily a matter of local concern and local policy. All such matters are therefore left to the local law. If under that law the effect of the duress or the illegality is to make the obligation entirely null and void, the defense may be asserted against a holder in due course. Otherwise it is cut off.

Subsection (a)(1)(iii) [subsection (1)(a)(iii) of this section] refers to "real" or "essential" fraud, sometimes called fraud in the essence or fraud in the factum, as effective against a holder in due course. The common illustration is that of the maker who is tricked into signing a note in the belief that it is merely a receipt or some other document. The theory of the defense is that the signature on the instrument is ineffective because the signer did not intend to sign such an instrument at all. Under this provision the defense extends to an instrument signed with knowledge that it is a negotiable instrument, but without knowledge of its essential terms.

The test of the defense is that of excusable ignorance of the contents of the writing signed. The party must not only have been in ignorance, but must also have had no reasonable opportunity to obtain knowledge. In determining what is a reasonable opportunity all relevant factors are to be taken into account, including the intelligence, education, business experience, and ability to read or understand English of the signer. Also relevant is the nature of the representations that were made, whether the signer had good reason to rely on the representations or to have confidence in the person making them, the presence or absence of any third person who might read or explain the instrument to the signer, or any other possibility of obtaining independent information, and the apparent necessity, or lack of it, for acting without delay. Unless the misrepresentation meets this test, the defense is cut off by a holder in due course.

Subsection (a)(1)(iv) [subsection (1)(a)(iv) of this section] states specifically that the defense of discharge in bankruptcy or other insolvency proceedings is not cut off when the instrument is purchased by a holder in due course. Subsection (2)(e) of present Section 3-305 [30-3-305(2)(e) prior to 1991 revision] is omitted. The substance of that provision is stated in Section 3-601(b) [30-3-601(2)].

As is the case under present Section 3-305 [30-3-305 prior to 1991 revision], forgery and alteration are not listed as real defenses because they are not technically defenses. Forgery of the signature of a person as maker or drawer of an instrument does not give rise to any obligation of that person. Section 3-401 [30-3-401]. Thus, there is no obligation to which a defense could relate. Alteration is also not treated as a defense. Rather, the obligations of various parties to an instrument are stated by taking into account the possibility of alteration. See, for example, Section 3-412 [30-3-413] and Section 3-413 [30-3-422]. Rights with respect to altered instruments are separately stated in Section 3-407 [30-3-407].

2. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] states other defenses that, pursuant to subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], are cut off by a holder in due course. These defenses comprise those specifically stated in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] and those based on common law contract principles. Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] defenses are nonissuance of the instrument, conditional issuance, and issuance for a special purpose (Section 3-105(b) [30-3-125(2)]); failure of the owner to countersign a traveler's check (Section 3-106(c) [30-3-105(3)]); modification of the obligation by a separate agreement (Section 3-117 [30-3-119]); payment that violates a restrictive indorsement (Section 3-206(f) [30-3-205(6)]); instruments issued without consideration or for which promised performance has not been given (Section 3-303(b) [30-3-303(2)]), and breach of warranty when a draft is accepted (Section 3-417(b) [30-3-424(2)]). The most prevalent common law defenses are fraud, misrepresentation or mistake in the issuance of the instrument. In most cases the holder in due course will be an immediate or remote transferee of the payee of the instrument. In most cases the holder-in-due-course doctrine is irrelevant if defenses are being asserted against the payee of the instrument, but in a small number of cases the payee of the instrument may be a holder in due course. Those cases are discussed in Comment 4 to Section 3-302 [30-3-302].

Assume Buyer issues a note to Seller in payment of the price of goods that Seller fraudulently promises to deliver but which are never delivered. Seller negotiates the note to Holder who has no notice of the fraud. If Holder is a holder in due course, Holder is not subject to Buyer's defense of fraud. But in some cases an original party to the instrument is a holder in due course. For example, Buyer fraudulently induces Bank to issue a cashier's check to the order of Seller. The check is delivered by Bank to Seller, who has no notice of the fraud. Seller can be a holder in due course and can take the check free of Bank's defense of fraud. This case is discussed in Comment 4 to Section 3-302 [30-3-302]. Present Section 3-305 [30-3-305 prior to 1991 revision] states that a holder in due course takes free of defenses of "any party to the instrument with whom the holder has not dealt." The meaning of this language was not at all clear and if read literally may produce the wrong result. In the hypothetical case, it could be argued that Seller "dealt" with Bank because Bank delivered the check to Seller. But it is clear that Seller should take free of Bank's defense against Buyer regardless of whether Seller took delivery of the check from Buyer or from Bank. The quoted language is not included in proposed Section 3-305 [30-3-305]. It is not necessary. If Buyer issues an instrument to Seller and Buyer has a defense against Seller, that defense can obviously be asserted. Buyer and Seller are the only people involved. The holder-in-due-course doctrine has no relevance. The doctrine applies only to cases in which more than two parties are involved. Its essence is that the holder in due course does not have to suffer the consequences of a defense of the obligor on the instrument that arose from an occurrence with a third party.

3. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] is concerned with claims in recoupment which can be illustrated by the following example. Buyer issues a note to the order of Seller in exchange for a promise of Seller to deliver specified equipment. If Seller fails to deliver the equipment, Buyer has a defense to the note because the performance that was the consideration for the note was not performed. Section 3-303(b) [30-3-303(2)]. This defense is included in Section 3-305(a)(2) [30-3-305(1)(b)]. That defense can always be asserted against Seller. This result is the same as that reached under present Section 3-408 [30-3-408, now repealed].

But suppose Seller delivered the promised equipment and it was accepted by Buyer. The equipment, however, was defective and Buyer incurred expenses with respect to its repair. In this case, Buyer does not have a defense under Section 3-303(b) [30-3-303(2)]. Seller delivered the promised equipment which was accepted. Under Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] Buyer is obliged to pay the price of the equipment which is represented by the note. But Buyer may have a claim against Seller for breach of warranty. If Buyer has a warranty claim, the claim may be asserted against Seller as a counterclaim or as a claim in recoupment to reduce the amount owing on the note. It is not relevant whether Seller is or is not a holder in due course of the note or whether Seller knew or had notice that Buyer had the warranty claim. It is obvious that holder-in-due-course doctrine cannot be used to allow Seller to cut off a warranty claim that Buyer has against Seller. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] specifically covers this point by stating that a holder in due course is not subject to a "claim in recoupment . . . against a person other than the holder."

Suppose Seller negotiates the note to Holder. If Holder had notice of Buyer's warranty claim at the time the note was negotiated to Holder, Holder is not a holder in due course (Section 3-302(a)(2) [30-3-302(1)(b)]) and Buyer may assert the claim against Holder (Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-3-305(1)(c)]) but only as a claim in recoupment, i.e. to reduce the amount owed on the note. If the warranty claim is $1,000 and the unpaid note is $10,000, Buyer owes $9,000 to Holder. If the warranty claim is more than the unpaid amount of the note, Buyer owes nothing to Holder, but Buyer cannot recover the unpaid amount of the warranty claim from Holder. If Buyer had already partially paid the note, Buyer is not entitled to recover the amounts paid. The claim can be used only as an offset to amounts owing on the note. If Holder had no notice of Buyer's claim and otherwise qualifies as a holder in due course, Buyer may not assert the claim against Holder. Section 3-305(b) [30-3-305(2)].

The result under proposed Section 3-305 [30-3-305] is consistent with the result reached under present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision], but the rules for reaching the result are stated differently. Under present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] Buyer could assert rights against Holder only if Holder was not a holder in due course, and Holder's status depends upon whether Holder had notice of a defense by Buyer. Courts have held that Holder has that notice if Holder has notice of Buyer's warranty claim. The rationale is that the case is one of "failure of consideration." This rationale does not distinguish between cases in which the seller fails to perform and those in which the buyer accepts the performance of seller but makes a claim against the seller because the performance is faulty. The term "failure of consideration" is subject to varying interpretations and is not used in proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. The use of the term "claims in recoupment" in Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-3-305(1)(c)] is a more precise statement of the nature of Buyer's right against Holder. The use of the term does not change the law because the treatment of a defense under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] and a claim in recoupment under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] is essentially the same.

Under present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision], case law is divided on the issue of the extent to which an obligor on a note can assert against a transferee who is not a holder in due course a debt or other claim that the obligor has against the original payee of the instrument. Some courts limit claims to those that arose in the transaction that gave rise to the note. This is the approach taken in proposed Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-3-305(1)(c)]. Other courts allowed the obligor on the note to use any debt or other claim, no matter how unrelated to the note, to offset the amount owed on the note. Under current judicial authority and non-UCC statutory law, there will be many cases in which a transferee of a note arising from a sale transaction will not qualify as a holder in due course. For example, applicable law may require the use of a note to which there cannot be a holder in due course. See Section 3-106(d) [30-3-105(4)] and Comment 3 to Section 3-106 [30-3-105]. It is reasonable to provide that the buyer should not be denied the right to assert claims arising out of the sale transaction. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] is based on the belief that it is not reasonable to require the transferee to bear the risk that wholly unrelated claims may also be asserted.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] concerns claims and defenses of a person other than the obligor on the instrument. It follows subsection (4) of present Section 3-306 [30-3-306(4) prior to 1991 revision]. It applies principally to cases in which an obligation is paid with the instrument of a third person. For example, Buyer buys goods from Seller and negotiates to Seller a cashier's check issued by Bank in payment of the price. Section 3-201(a) [30-3-202(1)]. Shortly after delivering the check to Seller, Buyer learns that Seller had defrauded Buyer in the sale transaction. Seller may enforce the check against Bank even though Seller is not a holder in due course. Bank has no defense to its obligation to pay the check and it may not assert defenses, claims in recoupment, or claims to the instrument of Buyer, unless there is an exception stated in subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. Buyer may have a claim to the instrument under Section 3-306 [30-3-306] based on a right to rescind the negotiation to Seller because of Seller's fraud. Section 3-202(b) [30-3-209(2)] and Comment to Section 3-201 [30-3-202]. Bank cannot assert that claim unless Buyer is joined in the action in which Seller is trying to enforce payment of the check. In that case Bank may pay the amount of the check into court and the court will decide whether that amount belongs to Buyer or Seller. The last sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows the issuer of an instrument such as a cashier's check to refuse payment in the rare case in which the issuer can prove that the instrument is a stolen instrument and the person seeking enforcement does not have rights of a holder in due course.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] applies to instruments signed for accommodation (Section 3-419 [30-3-415]) and this subsection equates the obligation of the accommodation party to that of the accommodated party. The accommodation party can assert whatever defense or claim the accommodated party had against the person enforcing the instrument. The only exceptions are discharge in bankruptcy, infancy and lack of capacity. The same rule does not apply to an indorsement by a holder of the instrument in negotiating the instrument. The indorser, as transferor, makes a warranty to the indorsee, as transferee, that no defense or claim in recoupment is good against the indorser. Section 3-416(a)(4) [30-3-417(1)(d)]. Thus, if the indorsee sues the indorser because of dishonor of the instrument, the indorser may not assert the defense or claim in recoupment of the maker or drawer against the indorsee.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Superior Rights as Between Holder of Perfected Security Interest in Collateral and Purchaser of Collateral: Equipment owned by Gauvin and used to secure a promissory note with American Federal Savings and Loan Association (American) was sold to Madison Valley Properties, Inc. (Madison). Upon receipt of the proceeds, Gauvin's girlfriend contacted American for a payoff amount on the promissory note. Gauvin then took a cashier's check from the sale proceeds and converted it to another cashier's check at Valley Bank of Helena (Valley) made out to American for the payoff amount. The check was delivered to American, but later that same day, Valley informed American that the cashier's check had been purchased with stolen funds and was void. American returned the check to Valley, and as a result, the loan was not paid or the lien on the equipment released. American sued Gauvin to recover on the note and sued Madison to recover the equipment. Madison counterclaimed, seeking to quiet title. Summary judgment was granted Madison under the rationale that Madison had superior rights in the collateral equipment. Although American initially received the Valley check in good faith and without notice of the underlying theft, once it was advised of the theft, American could not go forward in good faith and without notice of an adverse claim and Valley's defenses. At the time that it received notice, American still had time and was able to reverse the administrative steps that it had taken to process the loan payment. Notice of the theft could not simply be ignored; therefore, American was required to suspend performance. If it had proceeded in the face of the notice, American could not have claimed holder-in-due-course status. The District Court erred by not first determining whether American was a holder in due course of the cashier's check. Under 30-3-301(1)(a) or (1)(c), American was not a holder in due course because American did not give value. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the summary judgment award of superior rights in the collateral to Madison. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Madison Valley Properties, Inc., 1998 MT 93, 288 M 365, 958 P2d 57, 55 St. Rep. 366 (1998).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Failure of Consideration: Failure of consideration is not available as against a bona fide purchaser. Best v. Boyer, 98 M 40, 37 P2d 331 (1934).

Want or Failure of Consideration: Want or failure of consideration for a negotiable promissory note constitutes no defense as against a holder in due course under this section. Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Extrinsic Evidence: Extrinsic evidence to vary the terms of a note is inadmissible when it is in the hands of a holder in due course. Olsen v. Zappone, 83 M 573, 273 P 635 (1929).

Larceny: That a negotiable instrument (Liberty Bond) has been stolen and negotiated by the thief is no defense against a bona fide purchaser. Grosfield v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 73 M 219, 236 P 250 (1925).

Delivery Not Shown: Under section 55-216, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), delivery of a promissory note, in order to be effectual, must be made by or under the authority of the maker of the instrument, and therefore where no such delivery is shown the payee named therein cannot recover on it. Baroch v. Greater Mont. Oil Co., 70 M 93, 225 P 800 (1924).

Collateral Agreement: An independent collateral agreement between the parties to a note limiting liability thereon cannot be set up against a subsequent holder in due course. Wood v. Ferguson, 71 M 540, 230 P 592 (1924).

Admissibility of Note in Evidence: In an action on a promissory note, its production by plaintiff raised a presumption of a valid and intentional delivery of it to the payee by the maker, and it was properly admitted as against the objection that plaintiff was not the owner or holder thereof. Ely, Salyards & Co. v. Farmers' Elev. Co., 69 M 265, 221 P 522 (1923).

Defenses Available Against Holder Not in Due Course: The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act deals with negotiable instruments only so long as they are in the hands of holders in due course; if in other hands, they are subject to the same defenses as if nonnegotiable. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

30-3-306. Claims to an instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-306, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 16, 28, 58 and 59, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

This section expands on the reference to "claims to" the instrument mentioned in present Sections 3-305 [30-3-305 prior to 1991 revision] and 3-306 [30-3-306 prior to 1991 revision]. Claims covered by the section include not only claims to ownership but also any other claim of a property or possessory right. It includes the claim to a lien or the claim of a person in rightful possession of an instrument who was wrongfully deprived of possession. Also included is a claim based on Section 3-202(b) [30-3-209(2)] for rescission of a negotiation of the instrument by the claimant. Claims to an instrument under Section 3-306 [30-3-306] are different from claims in recoupment referred to in Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-3-305(1)(c)].

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Rights of one not holder in due course. Unless he has the rights of a holder in due course any person takes the instrument subject to:

(a) all valid claims to it on the part of any person; and

(b) all defenses of any party which would be available in an action on a simple contract; and

(c) the defenses of want or failure of consideration, nonperformance of any condition precedent, nondelivery, or delivery for a special purpose (30-3-408); and

(d) the defense that he or a person through whom he holds the instrument acquired it by theft, or that payment or satisfaction to such holder would be inconsistent with the terms of a restrictive endorsement. The claim of any third person to the instrument is not otherwise available as a defense to any party liable thereon unless the third person himself defends the action for such party."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Superior Rights as Between Holder of Perfected Security Interest in Collateral and Purchaser of Collateral: Equipment owned by Gauvin and used to secure a promissory note with American Federal Savings and Loan Association (American) was sold to Madison Valley Properties, Inc. (Madison). Upon receipt of the proceeds, Gauvin's girlfriend contacted American for a payoff amount on the promissory note. Gauvin then took a cashier's check from the sale proceeds and converted it to another cashier's check at Valley Bank of Helena (Valley) made out to American for the payoff amount. The check was delivered to American, but later that same day, Valley informed American that the cashier's check had been purchased with stolen funds and was void. American returned the check to Valley, and as a result, the loan was not paid or the lien on the equipment released. American sued Gauvin to recover on the note and sued Madison to recover the equipment. Madison counterclaimed, seeking to quiet title. Summary judgment was granted Madison under the rationale that Madison had superior rights in the collateral equipment. Although American initially received the Valley check in good faith and without notice of the underlying theft, once it was advised of the theft, American could not go forward in good faith and without notice of an adverse claim and Valley's defenses. At the time that it received notice, American still had time and was able to reverse the administrative steps that it had taken to process the loan payment. Notice of the theft could not simply be ignored; therefore, American was required to suspend performance. If it had proceeded in the face of the notice, American could not have claimed holder-in-due-course status. The District Court erred by not first determining whether American was a holder in due course of the cashier's check. Under 30-3-301(1)(a) or (1)(c), American was not a holder in due course because American did not give value. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the summary judgment award of superior rights in the collateral to Madison. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Madison Valley Properties, Inc., 1998 MT 93, 288 M 365, 958 P2d 57, 55 St. Rep. 366 (1998).

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Parol Evidence Inadmissible to Show Sham or Fraud: Plaintiff and defendant were in the business of developing oil and gas property. Defendant executed a promissory note in favor of plaintiff and gave plaintiff a "letter agreement" supplementing and clarifying the note. In plaintiff's action on the note, defendant attempted to introduce evidence of a contrary oral agreement that the note was a sham intended to induce third parties to give plaintiff investment funds and that it was never intended that the note be paid. The parol evidence rule prevented introduction of the evidence. In addition, defendant was not entitled to relief under the rule that delivery of an instrument for a special purpose is a defense against one not a holder of the instrument in due course. The sham claim in this case does not constitute a special purpose. Perez-Lizano v. Ayers, 215 M 95, 695 P2d 467, 42 St. Rep. 208 (1985).

Lack of Consideration or Setoff: There was no issue of material fact precluding summary judgment, either of lack of consideration or of setoff, because the express language of the note sued on stated that consideration existed, and the second action was a personal claim unrelated to the note. Keller v. Llewellyn, 175 M 164, 573 P2d 166 (1977).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Delivery Not Shown: Under section 55-216, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), delivery of a promissory note, in order to be effectual, must be made by or under the authority of the maker of the instrument, and therefore where no such delivery is shown the payee named therein cannot recover on it. Baroch v. Greater Mont. Oil Co., 70 M 93, 225 P 800 (1924).

Admissibility of Note in Evidence: In an action on a promissory note, its production by plaintiff raised a presumption of a valid and intentional delivery of it to the payee by the maker, and it was properly admitted as against the objection that plaintiff was not the owner or holder thereof. Ely, Salyards & Co. v. Farmers' Elev. Co., 69 M 265, 221 P 522 (1923).

Defenses Available Against Holder Not in Due Course: The Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act deals with negotiable instruments only so long as they are in the hands of holders in due course; if in other hands, they are subject to the same defenses as if nonnegotiable. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Want or Failure of Consideration: Want or failure of consideration is a good defense against a holder not in due course. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown v. Wilson, 57 M 384, 188 P 371 (1920).

30-3-307. Proof of signatures and status as holder in due course.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-308, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 59, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Section 3-308 is a modification of present Section 3-307 [30-3-307 prior to 1991 revision]. The first two sentences of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] are a restatement of present Section 3-307(1) [30-3-307(1) prior to 1991 revision]. The purpose of the requirement of a specific denial in the pleadings is to give the plaintiff notice of the defendant's claim of forgery or lack of authority as to the particular signature, and to afford the plaintiff an opportunity to investigate and obtain evidence. If local rules of pleading permit, the denial may be on information and belief, or it may be a denial of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief. It need not be under oath unless the local statutes or rules require verification. In the absence of such specific denial the signature stands admitted, and is not in issue. Nothing in this section is intended, however, to prevent amendment of the pleading in a proper case.

The question of the burden of establishing the signature arises only when it has been put in issue by specific denial. "Burden of establishing" is defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201]. The burden is on the party claiming under the signature, but the signature is presumed to be authentic and authorized except as stated in the second sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. "Presumed" is defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] and means that until some evidence is introduced which would support a finding that the signature is forged or unauthorized, the plaintiff is not required to prove that it is authentic. The presumption rests upon the fact that in ordinary experience forged or unauthorized signatures are very uncommon, and normally any evidence is within the control of, or more accessible to, the defendant. The defendant is therefore required to make some sufficient showing of the grounds for the denial before the plaintiff is required to introduce evidence. The defendant's evidence need not be sufficient to require a directed verdict, but it must be enough to support the denial by permitting a finding in the defendant's favor. Until introduction of such evidence the presumption requires a finding for the plaintiff. Once such evidence is introduced the burden of establishing the signature by a preponderance of the total evidence is on the plaintiff. The presumption does not arise if the action is to enforce the obligation of a purported signer who has died or become incompetent before the evidence is required, and so is disabled from obtaining or introducing it. "Action" is defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] and includes a claim asserted against the estate of a deceased or an incompetent.

The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is a new provision that is necessary to take into account proposed Section 3-402(a) [30-3-403(1)] that allows an undisclosed principal to be liable on an instrument signed by an authorized representative. In that case the person enforcing the instrument must prove that the undisclosed principal is liable.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] restates present Section 3-307(2) and (3) [30-3-307(2) and (3) prior to 1991 revision]. Once signatures are proved or admitted a holder, by mere production of the instrument, proves "entitlement to enforce the instrument" because under Section 3-301 [30-3-301] a holder is a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Any other person in possession of an instrument may recover only if that person has the rights of a holder. Section 3-301 [30-3-301]. That person must prove a transfer giving that person such rights under Section 3-203(b) [30-3-210(2)] or that such rights were obtained by subrogation or succession.

If a plaintiff producing the instrument proves entitlement to enforce the instrument, either as a holder or a person with rights of a holder, the plaintiff is entitled to recovery unless the defendant proves a defense or claim in recoupment. Until that proof is made, the issue as to whether the plaintiff has rights of a holder in due course does not arise. In the absence of a defense or claim in recoupment, any person entitled to enforce the instrument is entitled to recover. If a defense or claim in recoupment is proved, the plaintiff may seek to cut off the defense or claim in recoupment by proving that the plaintiff is a holder in due course or that the plaintiff has rights of a holder in due course under Section 3-203(b) [30-3-210(2)] or by subrogation or succession. All elements of Section 3-302(a) [30-3-302(1)] must be proved.

Nothing in this section is intended to say that the plaintiff must necessarily prove rights as a holder in due course. The plaintiff may elect to introduce no further evidence, in which case a verdict may be directed for the plaintiff or the defendant, or the issue of the defense or claim in recoupment may be left to the jury, according to the weight and sufficiency of the defendant's evidence. The plaintiff may elect to rebut the defense or claim in recoupment by proof to the contrary, in which case a verdict may be directed for either party or the issue may be for the jury. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] means only that if the plaintiff claims the rights of a holder in due course against the defense or claim in recoupment, the plaintiff has the burden of proof on that issue.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Burden of establishing signatures, defenses and due course. (1) Unless specifically denied in the pleadings each signature on an instrument is admitted. When the effectiveness of a signature is put in issue:

(a) the burden of establishing it is on the party claiming under the signature; but

(b) the signature is presumed to be genuine or authorized except where the action is to enforce the obligation of a purported signer who has died or become incompetent before proof is required.

(2) When signatures are admitted or established, production of the instrument entitles a holder to recover on it unless the defendant establishes a defense.

(3) After it is shown that a defense exists a person claiming the rights of a holder in due course has the burden of establishing that he or some person under whom he claims is in all respects a holder in due course."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Recovery on Written Instrument Absent Defense — Parol Evidence Not Allowed: Under Montana's Uniform Commercial Code, when signatures to an instrument are admitted or established, production of the instrument entitles the holder to recover on it unless the defendant establishes a defense. Parol evidence will not be allowed to contradict, alter, or vary a contract that has been reduced to a writing. Niemen v. Howell, 234 M 471, 764 P2d 854, 45 St. Rep. 2058 (1988).

Foreclosure of Mortgage Securing Note — Payment to Holder Required: The Dahls executed a note to Sythe and also executed a real estate mortgage in Sythe's favor. The note was placed in an escrow account in the Culbertson State Bank, and the bank was designated as the place where payment was to be made. Sythe assigned the note to the bank as security for a note obtained by him. Sythe later gave the bank a written assignment of the mortgage. Defendant Dahl was given written notice of this assignment. The bank did not receive any payments from Sythe on his notes or from Dahl on the note assigned to the bank. The bank brought an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage against Dahl. Dahl contended that the note was discharged because it was paid in full, with payments being made to Sythe. The bank was never able to make service of process on Sythe. The bank was a "holder" of the note since it was in possession of the note endorsed by Sythe. As a holder and having produced the note, the bank was entitled to recover unless the defendant established a defense. Defendant's sole defense was that he had paid the note to Sythe. The defense of payment only discharges the maker's liability on the instrument if payment is made to the holder. Defendant never attempted to prove payment to the holder. Since the bank was the holder of the note and a valid assignee of the mortgage securing the note, it was entitled to a decree of foreclosure. Culbertson St. Bank v. Dahl, 190 M 33, 617 P2d 1295, 37 St. Rep. 1752 (1980).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Presumption of Holder in Due Course: The presumption declared by this section makes the production of a note properly indorsed prima facie evidence of a right to recover thereon. Best v. Boyer, 98 M 40, 37 P2d 331 (1934).

Burden of Proof: Under section 55-509, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), where, after plaintiff endorsee had made out a prima facie case, defendant (drawer) produced evidence tending fairly to prove that the payee had obtained the check through fraud, the burden shifted to plaintiff to prove every fact necessary to show that he was a holder in due course, among them that he took it in good faith and for value, failing in which he was not entitled to recover. Matteson v. Trask, 63 M 160, 206 P 428 (1922).

30-3-308. Notice of breach of fiduciary duty.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-307, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Present Sections 3-304(2) and (4)(e) [30-3-304(2) and (4)(e) prior to 1991 revision], taken with the accompanying Comment 5, are confusing as to whether they apply when the instrument is made payable to a fiduciary as such or is made payable by a fiduciary as such to the fiduciary personally. Proposed Section 3-307 [30-3-308] avoids this confusion by stating rules that comprehensively cover the issue of when the taker of an instrument has notice of breach of a fiduciary duty.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the application of the section and defines its basic terms. This section applies only when the taker knows it is dealing with a fiduciary. These definitions are consonant with the meaning usually ascribed to these terms. "Taker" includes a payor bank, a depositary bank that takes an instrument for collection or a purchaser of the instrument. Subsection (b)(i) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] is based on Uniform Fiduciaries Act Section 4 in providing that if the instrument is payable to the fiduciary, as such, or to the represented person, the taker has notice of a claim if the instrument is negotiated for the fiduciary's personal debt. If fiduciary funds are deposited to a personal account of the fiduciary or to an account that is not an account of the represented person or of the fiduciary, as such, there is a split of authority concerning whether the bank is on notice of a breach of fiduciary duty. Subsection (b)(iii) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] states that the bank is given notice of breach of fiduciary duty because of the deposit. The Uniform Fiduciaries Act states that the bank is not on notice unless it has knowledge of facts that makes its receipt of the deposit an act of bad faith.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is based on Uniform Fiduciaries Act Section 6 and applies when the instrument is drawn by the fiduciary as such to the fiduciary personally. The term "personally" is used as it is used in the Uniform Fiduciaries Act to mean that the instrument is payable to the payee as an individual and not as a fiduciary. Here the taker may assume that the fiduciary may use the instrument for the personal benefit of the fiduciary.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] can be illustrated by a hypothetical case. Corporation draws a check payable to Bank. X, an officer or employee of corporation delivers the check to Bank. The person signing the check on behalf of Corporation is X or another person. If Bank takes this check from X knowing X is a fiduciary, Bank is on notice of a claim by Corporation if it takes the instrument under the same circumstances stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. This subsection rejects the contrary view of Eldon's Super Fresh Stores, Inc. v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 296 Minn. 130, 207 N.W.2d 282 (1973).

Case Notes

Existence of Fiduciary Duty Considered Question of Law, Not Fact — Summary Judgment on Question Proper if No Genuine Issue of Material Fact Exists: To resolve several inconsistent prior opinions, the Supreme Court held that the issue of whether a fiduciary duty exists between two parties is a question of law, not fact, and thus may be resolved on summary judgment if no genuine issues of material fact exist. Similarly, the issue of whether a special relationship exists between two parties that would give rise to a fiduciary relationship is also a question of law, not fact. In order to determine whether a special relationship exists in cases in which it does not normally exist, such as between a bank and a customer, a court may be required to make a fact-intensive inquiry. The circumstances of a particular relationship are factual, so disputes over material facts will preclude summary judgment, but the conclusion drawn by a court from undisputed facts is one of law, not of fact. Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006), overruling Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640 (1993), and Kondelik v. First Fidelity Bank of Glendive, 259 M 446, 857 P2d 687 (1993).

30-3-309. Enforcement of lost, destroyed, or stolen instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-309, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

Proposed Section 3-309 [30-3-309] is a modification of present Section 3-804 [30-3-804, now repealed]. The rights stated are those of "a person entitled to enforce the instrument" at the time of loss rather than those of an "owner" as in present Section 3-804 [30-3-804, now repealed]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], judgment to enforce the instrument cannot be given unless the court finds that the defendant will be adequately protected against a claim to the instrument by a holder that may appear at some later time. The court is given discretion in determining how adequate protection is to be assured. Present Section 3-804 [30-3-804, now repealed] allows the court to "require security indemnifying the defendant against loss." Under proposed Section 3-309 [30-3-309] adequate protection is a flexible concept. For example, there is substantial risk that a holder in due course may make a demand for payment if the instrument was payable to bearer when it was lost or stolen. On the other hand if the instrument was payable to the person who lost the instrument and that person did not indorse the instrument, no other person could be a holder of the instrument. In some cases there is risk of loss only if there is doubt about whether the facts alleged by the person who lost the instrument are true. Thus, the type of adequate protection that is reasonable in the circumstances may depend on the degree of certainty about the facts in the case.

30-3-310. Effect of instrument on obligation for which taken.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-310, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Proposed Section 3-310 [30-3-310] is a modification of present Section 3-802 [30-3-802, now repealed]. As a practical matter, application of present Section 3-802 [30-3-802, now repealed] is limited to cases in which a check or a note was given for an obligation. Subsections (a) and (b) of proposed Section 3-310 [30-3-310(1) and (2)] are therefore stated in terms of checks and notes in the interests of clarity. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] covers the rare cases in which some other instrument is given to pay an obligation.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] deals with the case in which a certified check, cashier's check or teller's check is given in payment of an obligation. In that case the obligation is discharged unless there is an agreement to the contrary. Proposed subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] drops the exception in present Section 3-802 [30-3-802, now repealed] for cases in which there is a right of recourse on the instrument against the obligor. Under present Section 3-802(1)(a) [30-3-802, now repealed] the obligation is not discharged if there is a right of recourse on the instrument against the obligor. Proposed subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] changes this result. The underlying obligation is discharged, but any right of recourse on the instrument is preserved.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] concerns cases in which an uncertified check or a note is taken for an obligation. The typical case is that in which a buyer pays for goods or services by giving the seller the buyer's personal check, or in which the buyer signs a note for the purchase price. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] also applies to the uncommon cases in which a check or note of a third person is given in payment of the obligation. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] preserves the rule under present Section 3-802(1)(b) [30-3-802, now repealed] that the buyer's obligation to pay the price is suspended, but subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] spells out the effect more precisely. If the check or note is dishonored, the seller may sue on either the dishonored instrument or the contract of sale if the seller has possession of the instrument and is the person entitled to enforce it. If the right to enforce the instrument is held by somebody other than the seller, the seller can't enforce the right to payment of the price under the sales contract because that right is represented by the instrument which is enforceable by somebody else. Thus, if the seller sold the note or the check to a holder and has not reacquired it after dishonor, the only right that survives is the right to enforce the instrument.

The last sentence of subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] applies to cases in which an instrument of another person is indorsed over to the obligee in payment of the obligation. For example, Buyer delivers an uncertified personal check of X payable to the order of Buyer to Seller in payment of the price of goods. Buyer indorses the check over to Seller. Buyer is liable on the check as indorser. If Seller neglects to present the check for payment or to deposit it for collection within 30 days of the indorsement, Buyer's liability as indorser is discharged. Section 3-415(e) [30-3-414(5)]. Under the last sentence of Section 3-310(b)(3) [30-3-310(2)(c)] Buyer is also discharged on the obligation to pay for the goods.

4. There is uncertainty concerning the applicability of present Section 3-802 [30-3-802, now repealed] to the case in which the check given for the obligation has been stolen from the payee, the payee's signature has been forged, and the forger has obtained payment. The last sentence of proposed subsection (b)(4) [subsection (2)(d) of this section] addresses this issue. If the payor bank pays a holder, the drawer is discharged on the underlying obligation because the check was paid. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. If the payor bank pays a person not entitled to enforce the instrument, as in the hypothetical case, the suspension of the underlying obligation continues because the check has not been paid. Section 3-603(a) [30-3-604(1)]. The payee's cause of action is against the depositary bank or payor bank in conversion under proposed Section 3-420 [30-3-419] or against the drawer under proposed Section 3-309 [30-3-309]. The payee cannot merely ignore the instrument and sue the drawer on the underlying contract. This would impose on the drawer the risk that the check when stolen was indorsed in blank or to bearer.

5. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] deals with rare cases in which other instruments are taken for obligations. If a bank is the obligor on the instrument, subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies and the obligation is discharged. In any other case subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies.

Case Notes

Retention of Personal Check as Suspending Underlying Obligation — No Default During Period of Suspension: The Quigleys agreed to purchase property from the Ackers and to assume the obligations of the buyer under the original sale contract. About 5 years later, the Quigleys missed a payment, but they subsequently tendered a personal, uncertified check for the missed payment to the escrow agent. The Ackers instructed the escrow agent to hold the check and then sent a default notice to the Quigleys, who did not cure the default. About 1 month later, the Quigleys received a termination notice informing them that the entire balance on the contract had been accelerated. Four days later, the Ackers returned the Quigleys' personal check to them. The Ackers' retention of the Quigleys' check was held to be a taking for an underlying obligation, suspending the obligation until the time that the check was returned. Because the obligation was suspended, there was, by definition, no default during the suspension. Consequently, the default and termination notices were based on an erroneous assessment of default and had no legal effect, and the District Court's conclusion that the notices were defective was a correct interpretation of the law. Quigley v. Acker, 1998 MT 72, 288 M 190, 955 P2d 1377, 55 St. Rep. 295 (1998), following Grumet v. Bristol, 484 A2d 1099 (N.H. 1984).

30-3-311. Accord and satisfaction by use of instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-311, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section deals with an informal method of dispute resolution carried out by use of a negotiable instrument. In the typical case there is a dispute concerning the amount that is owed on a claim.

Case #1. The claim is for the price of goods or services sold to a consumer who asserts that he or she is not obliged to pay the full price for which the consumer was billed because of a defect or breach of warranty with respect to the goods or services.

Case #2. A claim is made on an insurance policy. The insurance company alleges that it is not liable under the policy for the amount of the claim. In either case the person against whom the claim is asserted may attempt an accord and satisfaction of the disputed claim by tendering a check to the claimant for some amount less than the full amount claimed by the claimant. A statement will be included on the check or in a communication accompanying the check to the effect that the check is offered as full payment or full satisfaction of the claim. Frequently, there is also a statement to the effect that obtaining payment of the check is an agreement by the claimant to a settlement of the dispute for the amount tendered. The case law is in conflict over the question of whether obtaining payment of the check has the effect of an agreement to the settlement proposed by the debtor. This issue is governed by a common law rule, but some courts hold that the common law is modified by Section 1-207 [30-1-207] which they interpret as applying to full settlement checks.

2. Comment d. to Restatement of Contracts, Section 281 discusses the full satisfaction check and the applicable common law rule. In a case like Case #1, the buyer can propose a settlement of the disputed bill by a clear notation on the check indicating that the check is tendered as full satisfaction of the bill. Under the common law rule the seller, by obtaining payment of the check accepts the offer of compromise by the buyer. The result is the same if the seller adds a notation to the check indicating that the check is accepted under protest or in only partial satisfaction of the claim. Under the common law rule the seller can refuse the check or can accept it subject to the condition stated by the buyer, but the seller can't accept the check and refuse to be bound by the condition. The rule applies only to an unliquidated claim or a claim disputed in good faith by the buyer. The dispute in the courts is whether Section 1-207 [30-1-207] changes the common law rule. The Restatement states that section "need not be read as changing this well-established rule."

3. A proposed amendment to Section 1-207 [30-1-207] follows decisions that hold that Section 1-207 [30-1-207] was not intended to change the common law rule. The amendment states that Section 1-207 [30-1-207] "does not apply to an accord and satisfaction." Under the amendment, Section 3-311 [30-3-311] governs full satisfaction checks. Proposed section 3-311 [30-3-311] follows the common law rule with a minor variation to reflect modern business conditions. In cases covered by Section 3-311 [30-3-311] there will often be an individual on one side of the dispute and a business organization on the other. This section is not designed to favor either the individual or the business organization. In Case #1 the person seeking the accord and satisfaction is an individual. In Case #2 the person seeking the accord and satisfaction is an insurance company. Section 3-311 [30-3-311] is based on a belief that the common law rule produces a fair result and that informal dispute resolution by full satisfaction checks should be encouraged.

4. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states three requirements for application of Section 3-311 [30-3-311]. The person seeking the accord and satisfaction must prove that those requirements are met. If that person also proves that the communication required by subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] was given, the claim is discharged unless subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies. Normally the communication required by subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is written on the check. Thus, the canceled check can be used to prove the communication as well as the fact that the claimant obtained payment of the check. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] requires a "conspicuous" statement in the communication that the instrument was tendered in full satisfaction of the claim. "Conspicuous" is defined in Section 1-201(10) [30-1-201(10)]. The statement is conspicuous if "it is so written that a reasonable person against whom it is to operate ought to have noticed it." If the claimant can reasonably be expected to examine the check, almost any statement on the check should be noticed and is therefore conspicuous. In cases in which the claimant is an individual the claimant will receive the check and will have to indorse it. Since the statement concerning tender in full satisfaction normally will appear above the space provided for the claimant's indorsement of the check, the claimant "ought to have noticed" the statement.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is a limitation on subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] in cases in which the claimant is an organization. If the claimant is an organization payment of the check might be obtained without notice to the personnel of the organization concerned with the disputed claim. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is designed to protect the claimant against an inadvertent accord and satisfaction. Some business organizations have claims against very large numbers of customers. Examples are department stores, public utilities and the like. These claims are normally paid by checks sent by customers to a designated office at which clerks employed by the claimant or a bank acting for the claimant process the checks and record the amounts paid. If the processing office is not designed to deal with communications extraneous to recording the amount of the check and the account number of the customer, payment of a full satisfaction check can easily be obtained without knowledge by the claimant of the existence of the full satisfaction statement. Normally, the clerks of the claimant have no reason to look at the reverse side of a check. Indorsement by the claimant normally is done by mechanical means or, in some cases, no indorsement is made. Section 4-205(1) [30-4-205(1)]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows the claimant to protect itself by advising customers by a conspicuous statement (Section 1-201(10) [30-1-201(10)]) that communications regarding disputed debts must be sent to a particular person, office or place. The statement must be given to the customer within a reasonable time before the tender is made. This requirement is designed to assure that the customer has reasonable notice that the full satisfaction check must be sent to a particular place. The reasonable time requirement could be satisfied by a notice on the billing statement sent to customer. If the full satisfaction check is sent to the designated destination and the check is paid, the claim is discharged. If the claimant proves that the check was not received at the designated destination the claim is not discharged under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] unless subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] applies.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] allows the customer to avoid the effect of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section], by proving that an agent of the claimant having direct responsibility with respect to the disputed claim received the full satisfaction check and communication indicating that a full satisfaction tender was being made or knew about it before collection was initiated. For example, if the check and communication are received by a collection agency acting for the claimant to collect the disputed claim, obtaining payment of the check will result in an accord and satisfaction even if the claimant gave notice that full satisfaction checks be sent to some other office. Similarly, if a customer asserting a claim for breach of warranty with respect to defective goods purchased in a retail outlet of a large chain store delivers the full satisfaction check to the manager of the retail outlet at which the goods were purchased, obtaining payment of the check will also result in an accord and satisfaction. On the other hand, if the check is mailed to the chief executive officer of the chain store subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] would probably not be satisfied. The chief executive officer of a large corporation may have general responsibility for operations of the company, but does not normally have direct responsibility for resolving a small disputed bill to a customer. A check for a relatively small amount mailed to a high executive officer of a large organization is not likely to receive the executive's personal attention.

In some cases the disputed claim may have been assigned to a finance company or bank as part of a financing arrangement with respect to accounts receivable. If the account debtor was notified of the assignment, the claimant is the assignee of the account receivable and the "agent of the claimant" in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] refers to an agent of the assignee.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Finding of Judgment or Insolvency Required: When the record did not indicate that the bank obtained a judgment and when the District Court had not made a finding that the signer of a contract was insolvent, it was improper to allow the bank a setoff of funds from a guarantor's checking account. Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991).

Guarantor Owes Pro Rata Share: Appellant and four other shareholders in company executed continuing guaranties for promissory notes on behalf of their shared business. Appellant subsequently signed away his share in company and left the business. Although the court considered appellant's equitable defense that he was not liable for his pro rata share of the notes because the other four guarantors personally profited from the sale of the business after appellant departed, he remains liable for his pro rata share. He signed the guaranty knowing the lender could sue him directly on the notes. All five shareholders shared equal liability on the promissory notes, and appellant is required to contribute his one-fifth pro rata share. Citizens St. Bank v. Bossard, 226 M 75, 733 P2d 1296, 44 St. Rep. 468 (1987).

Guarantors' Right of Contribution When Benefits Unequal: Where the defendant claimed he was promised stock in a corporation in exchange for his guaranty of a note made by the corporation but subsequently revoked the guaranty when no stock was issued to him, the District Court erred in granting summary judgment against the defendant in an action for contribution brought by the other guarantors when the corporation defaulted on the note. Contribution among co-obligors is an equitable concept, and an equitable defense of one obligor must be permitted to be raised and presented. The defendant was entitled to present his proof of lack of equality of benefits and was erroneously prevented from doing so by the District Court's summary judgment. Bossard v. Sullivan, 206 M 392, 670 P2d 1389, 40 St. Rep. 1733 (1983).

Guarantor's Duty: In the language of a guaranty the guarantor assured that all sums stated in the note "shall be promptly paid in full, in accordance with the provisions thereof, at maturity, by acceleration, or otherwise", which brings the guarantor within the provisions of this section. Consequently, if the instrument is not paid when due, the guarantor must pay it according to its tenor. Stewart v. Casey, 182 M 185, 595 P2d 1176 (1979).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 18, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Obligation on an instrument depends on a signature that is binding on the obligor. The signature may be made by the obligor personally or by an agent authorized to act for the obligor. Signature by agents is covered by Section 3-402 [30-3-403]. It is not necessary that the name of the obligor appear on the instrument, so long as there is a signature that binds the obligor. Signature includes an indorsement.

2. A signature may be handwritten, typed, printed or made in any other manner. It need not be subscribed, and may appear in the body of the instrument, as in the case of "I, John Doe, promise to pay . . ." without any other signature. It may be made by mark, or even by thumbprint. It may be made in any name, including any trade name or assumed name, however false and fictitious, which is adopted for the purpose. Parol evidence is admissible to identify the signer, and when the signer is identified the signature is effective. Indorsement in a name other than that of the indorser is governed by Section 3-204(d) [30-3-203(4)].

This section is not intended to affect any other law requiring a signature by mark to be witnessed, or any signature to be otherwise authenticated, or requiring any form of proof.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Parol Evidence Held Inadmissible to Prove Representative Capacity of Maker of Note — Definition of Debtor — Unambiguous Terms Notwithstanding Security Agreement — Statute Not Retroactive — Former Statute Inapplicable: By use of a note and security agreement, Carelli sold 38 elk to Hall who, as Stireses' partner, operated the Elk Valley Game Ranch (Game Ranch). Later, Carelli brought an action against Stireses, alleging that Stireses were also liable on the debt because Hall had orally told Carelli at the time of the sale that the elk were being purchased for the Game Ranch. The Supreme Court held that Hall's oral statements to Carelli were inadmissible on the issue of Stireses' liability on the note for three reasons: (1) The note was clear and unambiguous in that Hall's representative capacity did not appear on the note, Hall was the "debtor" as defined in the security agreement, and a reference to the Game Ranch in the security agreement did not make the note ambiguous so as to require explanation by parol evidence. (2)

The Supreme Court held that a 1991 amendment to 30-3-403 regarding the capacity in which a person signs an instrument, if applied in this case, would cause a difference in the liability of the parties. Therefore, the amendment is substantive. Because there was no expression of legislative intent that the 1991 version be applied retroactively, the 1985 version of 30-3-403 and not the 1991 version applies, and parol evidence is not relevant to that 1985 version. (3) The facts of the case did not fall within the terms of the 1985 version of 30-3-403. Carelli v. Hall, 279 M 202, 926 P2d 756, 53 St. Rep. 1116 (1996).

30-3-403. Signature by representative.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-402, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 19, 20 and 21, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states when the represented person is bound on an instrument when the instrument is signed by a representative. If under the law of agency the represented person would be bound by the act of the representative in signing either the name of the represented person or that of the representative, the signature is the authorized signature of the represented person. Present Section 3-401(1) [30-3-401(1) prior to 1991 revision] states that "no person is liable on an instrument unless his signature appears thereon." This has been interpreted as meaning that an undisclosed principal is not liable on an instrument. This is an exception to ordinary agency law that binds an undisclosed principal on a simple contract.

There is no reason to retain this exception and it is changed by subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] which returns to ordinary rules of agency. If P, the principal, authorized A, the agent, to borrow money on P's behalf and A signed A's name to a note without disclosing that the signature was on behalf of P, A is liable on the instrument. But if the person entitled to enforce the note can also prove that P authorized A to sign on P's behalf, why shouldn't P also be liable on the instrument? To recognize the liability of P takes nothing away from the currency of negotiable instruments. Furthermore, imposing liability on P has the merit of making it impossible to have an instrument on which nobody is liable even though it was authorized by P. That result can occur under present Section 3-401(1) [30-3-401(1) prior to 1991 revision] if an authorized agent signs "as agent" but does not identify the principal on the note. The agent can escape liability on the note by proving that the agent and the payee who is seeking enforcement of the note did not intend that the agent be liable on the note when the note was issued. Present Section 3-403(2)(b) [30-3-403(2)(b) prior to 1991 revision]. The principal is not liable on the note under present 3-401(1) [30-3-401(1) prior to 1991 revision] because the principal's name does not appear on the note. Thus, nobody is liable on the note even though all parties knew that the note was signed by the agent on behalf of the principal. Under proposed Section 3-402 [30-3-403] the principal would be liable on the note.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] concerns the question of when an agent who signs an instrument on behalf of a principal is bound on the instrument. The approach followed by present Section 3-403 [30-3-403 prior to 1991 revision] is to specify the form of signature that imposes or avoids liability. This approach is unsatisfactory. There are many ways in which there can be ambiguity about a signature. It is better to state a general rule. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] states that if the form of the signature unambiguously shows that it is made on behalf of an identified represented person (for example, "P, by A, Treasurer") the agent is not liable. This is a workable standard for a court to apply. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] partly changes present Section 3-403(2) [30-3-403(2) prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] relates to cases in which the agent signs on behalf of a principal but the form of the signature does not fall within subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. The following cases are illustrative. In each case John Doe is the authorized agent of Richard Roe and John Doe signs a note on behalf of Richard Roe. In each case the intention of the original parties to the instrument is that Roe is to be liable on the instrument but Doe is not to be liable.

Case #1. Doe signs "John Doe" without indicating in the note that Doe is signing as agent. The note does not identify Richard Roe as the represented person.

Case #2. Doe signs "John Doe, Agent" but the note does not identify Richard Roe as the represented person.

Case #3. The name "Richard Roe" is written on the note and immediately below that name Doe signs "John Doe" without indicating that Doe signed as agent. In each case Doe is liable on the instrument to a holder in due course without notice that Doe was not intended to be liable. In none of the cases does Doe's signature unambiguously show that Doe was signing as agent for an identified principal. A holder in due course should be able to resolve any ambiguity against Doe.

But the situation is different if a holder in due course is not involved. In each case Roe is liable on the note. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. If the original parties to the note did not intend that Doe also be liable, imposing liability on Doe is a windfall to the person enforcing the note. Under subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] Doe is prima facie liable because his signature appears on the note and the form of the signature does not unambiguously refute personal liability. But Doe can escape liability by proving that the original parties did not intend that he be liable on the note. This is a change from present Section 3-403(2)(a) [30-3-403(2)(a) prior to 1991 revision].

A number of cases have involved situations in which an agent has signed the agent's name to a note, without qualification and without naming the person represented, intending to bind the principal but not the agent. The agent attempted to prove that the other party had the same intention. Some of these cases involved mistake, and in some there was evidence that the agent may have been deceived into signing in that manner. Some of the cases have refused to allow proof of the intention of the parties and have imposed liability on the agent based on present Section 3-403(2)(a) [30-3-403(2)(a) prior to 1991 revision] even though both parties to the instrument may have intended that the agent not be liable. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] changes the result of those cases, and is consistent with proposed Section 3-117 [30-3-119] which allows oral or written agreements to modify or nullify apparent obligations on the instrument.

Present Section 3-403 [30-3-403 prior to 1991 revision] speaks of the represented person being "named" in the instrument. Proposed Section 3-402 [30-3-403] speaks of the represented person being "identified" in the instrument. This change in terminology is intended to reject decisions under present Section 3-403(2) [30-3-403(2) prior to 1991 revision] requiring that the instrument state the legal name of the represented person.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is directed at the check cases. It states that if the check identifies the represented person the agent who signs on the signature line does not have to indicate agency status. Virtually all checks used today are in personalized form which identify the person on whose account the check is drawn. In this case, nobody is deceived into thinking that the person signing the check is meant to be liable. This subsection is meant to overrule cases such as Griffin v. Ellinger, 538 S.W.2d 97 (Texas 1976).

Question of Personal Obligation When Successor Corporation Not Named and Representative Capacity Not Noted — Directed Verdict Improper: Defendant, who was general manager of a development company but who held no ownership interest, signed a memorandum guaranteeing payment of an advertising account prior to the company's reincorporation under another name. He was held personally obligated for payment on a motion for directed verdict. However, the Supreme Court reversed upon finding that the memorandum neither named as principal the successor company, which was not in existence at the time the note was drafted, nor noted defendant's representative capacity. These fact questions precluded a directed verdict on defendant's obligation. Huisenga v. Parkman, 231 M 210, 752 P2d 175, 45 St. Rep. 552 (1988).

Debtor's Signature in Representative and Personal Capacities — Subject to Personal Liability: Debtor entered an agreement with creditor by signing a "check-note" that consisted of two parts. The first part was in the name of the corporation and was signed by debtor in his capacity as corporate representative. The second part was an unconditional promise to pay and was signed in debtor's name only, without reference to the corporation or the debtor's signatory capacity. The District Court incorrectly concluded that debtor's signature unambiguously imparted personal liability for the debt. However, the finding that the parties intended to make debtor personally liable was supported by substantial evidence, including the fact that debtor omitted any reference to his signatory capacity in the second signature. Accounts Management Corp. v. Lyman Ranch, 230 M 35, 748 P2d 919, 44 St. Rep. 2233 (1987), distinguished in Carelli v. Hall, 279 M 202, 926 P2d 756, 53 St. Rep. 1116 (1996).

Summary Judgment Improper — Capacity in Which Promissory Note Signed: Summary judgment was not proper in an action on a promissory note when defendants had been sued individually but claimed, despite the appearance of the note, to have executed the note in their capacity as officers of a landscaping company. Although generally an unambiguous note cannot be varied by parol evidence, 30-4-403 specifically allows proof beyond the provisions of the note itself; thus, defendants' contentions established the existence of an issue of material fact. Clarks Fork Nat'l Bank v. Papp, 215 M 494, 698 P2d 851, 42 St. Rep. 577 (1985), distinguished in Carelli v. Hall, 279 M 202, 926 P2d 756, 53 St. Rep. 1116 (1996).

Deposit of Check Made to Another — When No Customer Warranties Breached — When Settlement of Check Final: A bank initiated an action against a customer to recover the amount of a check she deposited. The check was a paycheck made out to her former husband. She had deposited his paychecks for a time, and the Supreme Court found an agency relationship in the situation. On the occasion leading to this action, the appellant had deposited the check unsigned to her checking account. The bank stamped the check "deposited to the credit of" and filled in the name of the former husband. Meanwhile, the former husband told the check's issuer his ex-wife had forged his name on the check and deposited it. The issuer completed necessary documents and issued a new check. The former husband then disappeared, being suspected of embezzlement. Whether the customer breached her warranties under the U.C.C. depended on whether the settlement on the check became final. The Supreme Court overruled the trial court and held the settlement had become final. The return of the check occurred after the posting. The bank where the check was deposited was not entitled to a refund under 30-4-212. The customer warranties issue was decided by the principle that an agency could not be denied by a principal accepting its benefits. Because the appellant was not in breach of customer warranties, the bank's remedy, if any, was against the maker or the payee, the appellant's former husband. First Nat'l Bank v. Nunn, 192 M 487, 628 P2d 1110, 38 St. Rep. 869 (1981).

Pleading of Execution by Principal: An allegation in an action on a promissory note that it was executed by a certain person is sustained by proof of execution by an authorized agent of such person, and ratification of the acts of the agent can be proved under the general allegation that the principal executed it. Coffman v. Niece, 110 M 541, 105 P2d 661 (1940).

Nonnegotiable Instruments: In the absence of a special agreement to that effect, one who signs his name on the back of a nonnegotiable note is not an endorser in the sense that term is used in the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law; hence an instruction in the language of section 55-604, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), that a person who places his signature upon an instrument otherwise than as maker, drawer or acceptor is deemed to be an endorser, was inapplicable in an action on such a note. Newer v. First Nat'l Bank of Harlem, 74 M 549, 241 P 613 (1925).

Effect of Signature by Agent: Under section 55-219, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), the signature of any party to a negotiable instrument may be made by a duly authorized agent. Commercial Nat'l Bank of Great Falls v. Reichelt, 62 M 302, 204 P 1037 (1922).

Corporate Officer: Under section 55-220, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), the endorsement, "J. H. Irwin, Presdt. Great Northern Surety Co.", on a note made payable to the company was its endorsement and not that of the individual signer, the contention that the words following the name were merely descriptio personae and did not indicate the character in which he acted not being maintainable under the Negotiable Instruments Law. Commercial Nat'l Bank of Great Falls v. Reichelt, 62 M 302, 204 P 1037 (1922).

Business Association: Persons conducting business as a voluntary association, using a common or trade name, may be held jointly and severally liable upon a note executed in the trade name by their agent authorized to do so. Larson v. Marcy, 61 M 1, 201 P 685 (1921).

30-3-404. Unauthorized signatures.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-403, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 23, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. "Unauthorized" signature is defined in Section 1-201(43) [30-1-201(43)] as one that includes a forgery as well as a signature made by one exceeding actual or apparent authority. Present Section 3-404(1) [30-3-404(1) prior to 1991 revision] states that an unauthorized signature is inoperative as the signature of the person whose name is signed unless that person "is precluded from denying it." Under present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision] if negligence by the person whose name is signed contributes to an unauthorized signature, that person "is precluded from asserting the . . . lack of authority." Both of these sections have been applied to cases in which a forged signature appears on an instrument and the person asserting rights on the instrument alleges that the negligence of the purported signer contributed to the forgery. Since the standards for liability between the two sections differ, the overlap between the sections causes great confusion. Proposed Section 3-403(a) [30-3-404(1)] deals with the problem by removing the preclusion language that appears in present Section 3-404 [30-3-404 prior to 1991 revision].

2. The except clause of the first sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the generally accepted rule that the unauthorized signature, while it is wholly inoperative as that of the person whose name is signed, is effective to impose liability upon the signer or to transfer any rights that the signer may have in the instrument. The signer's liability is not in damages for breach of warranty of authority, but is full liability on the instrument in the capacity in which the signer signed. It is, however, limited to parties who take or pay the instrument in good faith; and one who knows that the signature is unauthorized cannot recover from the signer on the instrument.

3. The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] allows an unauthorized signature to be ratified. Ratification is a retroactive adoption of the unauthorized signature by the person whose name is signed and may be found from conduct as well as from express statements. For example, it may be found from the retention of benefits received in the transaction with knowledge of the unauthorized signature. Although the forger is not an agent, ratification is governed by the rules and principles applicable to ratification of unauthorized acts of an agent.

Ratification is effective only for the purposes of this Article. The unauthorized signature becomes valid so far as its effect as a signature is concerned. The ratification relieves the signer of liability on the instrument. It does not of itself relieve the signer of liability to the person whose name is signed. It does not in any way affect the criminal law. No policy of the criminal law prevents the person whose name is forged to assume liability to others on the instrument by ratifying the forgery, but the ratification cannot affect the rights of the state. While the ratification may be taken into account with other relevant facts in determining punishment, it does not relieve the signer of criminal liability.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] clarifies the meaning of "unauthorized" in cases in which an instrument contains less than all of the signatures that are required as authority to pay a check. Judicial authority is split on the issue whether the one-year notice period under present Section 4-406(4) [30-4-406(4) prior to 1991 revision] bars a customer's suit against a payor bank that paid a check containing less than all of the signatures required by the customer to authorize payment of the check. Some cases take the view that if a customer requires that a check contain the signatures of both A and B to authorize payment and only A signs, there is no unauthorized signature within the meaning of that term in Section 4-406(4) [30-4-406(4) prior to 1991 revision] because A's signature is neither unauthorized nor forged. The other cases correctly point out that it is the customer's signature at issue and not that of A; hence, the customer's signature is unauthorized if all signatures required to authorize payment of the check are not on the check. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] follows the latter line of cases.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] refers to "the authorized signature of an organization." The definition of "organization" in Section 1-201(28) [30-1-201(28)] is very broad. It covers not only commercial entities but also "two or more persons having a joint or common interest." Hence subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] would apply when a husband and wife are both required to sign an instrument.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) Any unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative as that of the person whose name is signed unless he ratifies it or is precluded from denying it; but it operates as the signature of the unauthorized signer in favor of any person who in good faith pays the instrument or takes it for value.

(2) Any unauthorized signature may be ratified for all purposes of this chapter. Such ratification does not of itself affect any rights of the person ratifying against the actual signer."

Question Whether Checks Cashed Without Authorization — Summary Judgment Improper: The District Court improperly granted summary judgment to bank when it assumed, absent evidence in the record, that checks were cashed by an unauthorized signer. The determination that the signature was unauthorized could not be made without dealing with the rights and liabilities between the signer and the person to whom the checks were originally made out. Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 9(3), Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is based on present Section 3-405(1)(a) [30-3-405(1)(a) prior to 1991 revision]. The present provision can be read to mean that the indorsement must be in the exact name of the named payee. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] requires only that the indorsement be substantially similar. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] also changes present law in a case in which the impostor is impersonating an agent. Under present Section 3-405(1)(a) [30-3-405(1)(a) prior to 1991 revision], if Impostor impersonates Smith and induces the drawer to draw a check to the order of Smith, Impostor can negotiate the check. If Impostor impersonates Smith, the president of Smith Corporation, and the check is to the order of Smith Corporation, the section does not apply. See the last paragraph of Comment 2 to present Section 3-405 [30-3-405 prior to 1991 revision]. [Comment now deleted.] Proposed subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] gives Impostor the power to negotiate the check in both cases.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is based in part on present Section 3-405(1)(b) [30-3-405(1)(b) prior to 1991 revision] and in part on N.I.L. Section 9(3). It covers cases in which an instrument is payable to a fictitious or nonexisting person and to cases in which the payee is a real person but the drawer or maker does not intend the payee to have any interest in the instrument. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies to any instrument, but its primary importance is with respect to checks of corporations and other organizations. It also applies to forged check cases. The following cases illustrate subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]:

Case #1. Treasurer is authorized to draw checks in behalf of Corporation. Treasurer fraudulently draws a check of Corporation payable to Supplier Co., a non-existent company. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies because Supplier Co. is a fictitious person and because Treasurer did not intend Supplier Co. to have any interest in the check. Under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] Treasurer, as the person in possession of the check, becomes the holder of the check. Treasurer indorses the check in the name "Supplier Co." and deposits it in Depositary Bank. Under subsection (b)(2) and (c)(i) [subsection (2)(b) and (3)(a) of this section], the indorsement is effective to make Depositary Bank the holder and therefore a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Section 3-301 [30-3-301].

Case #2. Same facts as Case #1 except that Supplier Co. is an actual company that does business with Corporation. If Treasurer intended to steal the check when the check was drawn, the result in Case #2 is the same as the result in Case #1. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies because Treasurer did not intend Supplier Co. to have any interest in the check. It does not make any difference whether Supplier Co. was or was not a creditor of Corporation when the check was drawn. If Treasurer did not decide to steal the check until after the check was drawn, the case is covered by Section 3-405 [30-3-420] rather than Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)], but the result is the same. See Case #6 in Comment 3 to Section 3-405 [30-3-420].

Case #3. Checks of Corporation must be signed by two officers. President and Treasurer both sign a check of Corporation payable to Supplier Co., a company that does business with Corporation from time to time but to which Corporation does not owe any money. Treasurer knows that no money is owed to Supplier Co. and does not intend that Supplier Co. have any interest in the check. President believes that money is owed to Supplier Co. Treasurer obtains possession of the check after it is signed. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies because Treasurer is "a person whose intent determines to whom an instrument is payable" and Treasurer does not intend Supplier Co. to have any interest in the check. Treasurer becomes holder of the check and may negotiate it by indorsing it in the name "Supplier Co.".

Case #4. Checks of Corporation are signed by a check-writing machine. Names of payees of checks produced by the machine are determined by information entered into the computer that operates the machine. Thief, a person who is not an employee or other agent of Corporation, obtains access to the computer and causes the check-writing machine to produce a check payable to Supplier Co., a non-existent company. Subsection (b)(ii) [subsection (2) (part) of this section] applies. Thief then obtains possession of the check. At that point Thief becomes the holder of the check because Thief is the person in possession of the instrument. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. Under Section 3-301 [30-3-301] Thief, as holder, is the "person entitled to enforce the instrument" even though Thief does not have title to the check and is in wrongful possession of it. Thief indorses the check in the name "Supplier Co." and deposits it in Depositary

Bank. Under subsection (b)(2) and (c)(i) [subsections (2)(b) and (3)(a) of this section], the indorsement is effective. The bank becomes the holder and the person entitled to enforce the check. Although the check was issued without authority given by Corporation, the drawee bank is entitled to pay the check and charge Corporation's account under an agreement with Corporation allowing the bank to debit Corporation's account for payment of checks produced by the check-writing machine whether or not authorized. The indorsement is also effective if Supplier Co. is a real person. In that case subsection (b)(i) [subsection (2)(part) of this section] applies. Under Section 3-110(b) [30-3-126(2)] Thief is the person whose intent determines to whom the check is payable, and Thief did not intend Supplier Co. to have any interest in the check. If the drawee bank pays the check, there is no breach of warranty under Section 3-417(a)(1) [30-3-424(1)(a)] because Depositary Bank was a person entitled to enforce the check when it was forwarded for payment.

Case #5. Thief, who is not an employee or agent of Corporation, steals check forms of Corporation. John Doe is president of Corporation and is authorized to sign checks on behalf of Corporation as drawer. Thief draws a check in the name of Corporation as drawer by forging the signature of Doe. Thief makes the check payable to the order of Supplier Co. with the intention of stealing it. Whether Supplier Co. is a fictitious person or a real person, Thief becomes the holder of the check and the person entitled to enforce it. The analysis is the same as that in Case #4. Thief deposits the check in an account in Depositary Bank which Thief opened in the name "Supplier Co." Thief either indorses the check in an assumed name other than "Supplier Co." or does not indorse the check at all. Under Section 4-205 [30-4-205] a depositary bank may become holder of a check deposited to the account of a customer without the customer's indorsement. Subsection (c)(ii) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] treats deposit to an account in a name substantially similar to that of the payee as the equivalent of indorsement in the name of the payee. Thus, the deposit is an effective indorsement of the check. Depositary Bank becomes the holder of the check and the person entitled to enforce the check. If the check is paid by the drawee bank, there is no breach of warranty under Section 3-417(a)(1) [30-3-424(1)(a)] with respect to the indorsement and, unless Depositary Bank knew about the forgery of Doe's signature, there is no breach of warranty under Section 3-417(a)(3) [30-3-424(1)(c)]. Because the check was a forged check the drawee bank is not entitled to charge Corporation's account unless Section 3-406 [30-3-406] or Section 4-406 [30-4-406] applies.

3. In cases governed by subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] the dispute will normally be between the drawer of the check that was obtained by the impostor and the drawee bank that paid it. The drawer is precluded from obtaining recredit of the drawer's account by arguing that the check was paid on a forged indorsement so long as the drawee bank acted in good faith in paying the check. Cases governed by subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] are illustrated by Cases #1 through #5 in Comment 2. In Cases #1, #2, and #3 there is no forgery of the check, thus the drawer of the check takes the loss if there is no lack of good faith by the banks involved. Cases #4 and #5 are forged check cases. Depositary Bank is entitled to retain the proceeds of the check if it didn't know about the forgery. Unless Section 3-406 [30-6-406] applies the loss is taken by the drawee bank if a forged check is paid, and that is the result in Case #5. In Case #4 the loss is taken by Corporation, the purported drawer, because an agreement between Corporation and the drawee bank allowed the bank to debit Corporation's account despite the unauthorized use of the check-writing machine. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] allows the person who suffers a loss as a result of payment of a check covered by subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2) of this section] to recover a portion of the loss from a person that pays the check or takes it for value or for collection if that person failed to exercise ordinary care and that failure contributed to the loss. In most cases the defendant will be either the drawee bank or the depositary bank. The person suffering the loss under subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2) of this section] has a cause of action against the offending bank to recover a portion of the loss. The amount of loss to be allocated to each party is left to the trier of fact. Ordinary care is defined in Section 3-103(a)(7) [30-3-102(1)(g)].

(b) a person signing as or on behalf of a maker or drawer intends the payee to have no interest in the instrument; or

(c) an agent or employee of the maker or drawer has supplied him with the name of the payee intending the latter to have no such interest.

30-3-406. Negligence contributing to forged signature or alteration of instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-406, U.C.C.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Proposed Section 3-406(a) [30-3-406(1)] is based on present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision]. With respect to alteration, present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision] adopts the doctrine of Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253 (1827), which held that a drawer who so negligently draws an instrument as to facilitate its material alteration is liable to a drawee who pays the altered instrument in good faith. Under Section 3-406 [30-3-406] the doctrine is expanded to apply not only to drafts but to all instrument [sic]. It includes in the protected class any "person that, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value." Section 3-406 [30-3-406] rejects decisions holding that the maker of a note owes no duty of care to the holder because at the time the instrument is issued there is no contract between them. By issuing the instrument and "setting it afloat upon a sea of strangers" the maker or drawer voluntarily enters into a relation with later holders which justifies imposition of a duty of care. In this respect an instrument so negligently drawn as to facilitate alteration does not differ in principle from an instrument containing blanks which may be filled. Under Section 3-407 [30-3-407] a person paying an altered instrument or taking it for value, in good faith and without notice of the alteration may enforce rights with respect to the instrument according to its original terms. If negligence of the obligor substantially contributes to an alteration, this section gives the holder or the payor the alternative right to treat the altered instrument as though it had been issued in the altered form.

No attempt is made to define particular conduct that will constitute "failure to exercise ordinary care [that] substantially contributes to an alteration." Rather, "ordinary care" is defined in Section 3-103(a)(7) [30-3-102(1)(g)] in general terms. The question is left to the court or the jury for decision in the light of the circumstances in the particular case including reasonable commercial standards that may apply.

Section 3-406 [30-3-406] does not make the negligent party liable in tort for damages resulting from the alteration. If the negligent party is estopped from asserting the alteration the person taking the instrument is fully protected because the taker can treat the instrument as having been issued in the altered form.

2. Section 3-406 [30-3-406] applies equally to a failure to exercise ordinary care that substantially contributes to the making of a forged signature on an instrument. Proposed Section 3-406 [30-3-406] refers to "forged signature" rather than "unauthorized signature" that appeared in present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision] because it more accurately describes the scope of the provision. Unauthorized signature is a broader concept that includes not only forgery but also the signature of an agent which does not bind the principal under the law of agency. The agency cases are resolved independently under agency law. Section 3-406 [30-3-406] is not necessary in those cases.

The "substantially contributes" test of present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision] is continued in this section in preference to a "direct and proximate cause" test. The "substantially contributes" test is meant to be less stringent than a "direct and proximate cause" test. Under the less stringent test the preclusion should be easier to establish. Conduct "substantially contributes" to a material alteration or forged signature if it is a contributing cause of the alteration or signature and a substantial factor in bringing it about. Since Section 3-404(d) [30-3-405(4)] and Section 3-405(b) [30-3-420(2)] also use the words "substantially contributes" the analysis of these words also applies to those provisions.

3. The following cases illustrate the kind of conduct that can be the basis of a preclusion under Section 3-406(a) [30-3-406(1)]:

Case #1. Employer signs checks drawn on Employer's account by use of a rubber stamp of Employer's signature. Employer keeps the rubber stamp along with Employer's personalized blank check forms in an unlocked desk drawer. An unauthorized person fraudulently uses the check forms to write checks on Employer's account. The checks are signed by use of the rubber stamp. If Employer demands that Employer's account in the drawee bank be recredited because the forged check was not properly payable, the drawee bank may defend by asserting that Employer is precluded from asserting the forgery. The trier of fact could find that Employer failed to exercise ordinary care to safeguard the rubber stamp and the check forms and that the failure substantially contributed to the forgery of Employer's signature by the unauthorized use of the rubber stamp.

Case #2. An insurance company draws a check to the order of Sarah Smith in payment of a claim of a policyholder, Sarah Smith, who lives in Alabama. The insurance company also has a policyholder with the same name who lives in Illinois. By mistake, the insurance company mails the check to the Illinois Sarah Smith who indorses the check and obtains payment. Because the payee of the check is the Alabama Sarah Smith, the indorsement by the Illinois Sarah Smith is a forged indorsement. Section 3-110(a) [30-3-126(1)]. The trier of fact could find that the insurance company failed to exercise ordinary care when it mailed the check to the wrong person and that the failure substantially contributed to the making of the forged indorsement. In that event the insurance company could be precluded from asserting the forged indorsement against the drawee bank that honored the check.

Case #3. A company writes a check for $10. The figure "10" and the word "ten" are typewritten in the appropriate spaces on the check form. A large blank space is left after the figure and the word. The payee of the check, using a typewriter with a typeface similar to that used on the check, writes the word "thousand" after the word "ten" and a comma and three zeros after the figure "10". The drawee bank in good faith pays $10,000 when the check is presented for payment and debits the account of the drawer in that amount. The trier of fact could find that the drawer failed to exercise ordinary care in writing the check and that the failure substantially contributed to the alteration. In that case the drawer is precluded from asserting the alteration against the drawee if the check was paid in good faith.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] differs from present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision] in that it adopts a concept of comparative negligence. If the person precluded under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] proves that the person asserting the preclusion failed to exercise ordinary care and that failure contributed to the loss, the loss may be allocated between the two parties on a comparative negligence basis. For example, in an altered check case there may be an issue whether the depositary bank might have prevented the loss if its employee had examined the check more carefully to detect the alteration. In a forged indorsement case there may be an issue whether the depositary bank should have been alerted to possible fraud when a new account is opened for a corporation shortly before a very large check payable to a payee with the same name is deposited. Circumstances surrounding the opening of the account may have suggested that the corporation to which the check was payable may not be the same as the corporation for which the account was opened. In each of these cases the relative negligence of each of the parties can be weighed by the trier of fact.

30-3-407. Alteration.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-407, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 14, 15, 124 and 125, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This provision restates present Section 3-407 [30-3-407 prior to 1991 revision]. Present Section 3-407 [30-3-407 prior to 1991 revision] defines a "material" alteration as any alteration that changes the contract of the parties in any respect. Proposed Section 3-407 [30-3-407] refers to such a change as an alteration. As under subsection (2) of present Section 3-407 [30-3-407(2) prior to 1991 revision], discharge because of alteration occurs only in the case of an alteration fraudulently made. There is no discharge if a blank is filled in the honest belief that it is authorized or if a change is made with a benevolent motive such as a desire to give the obligor the benefit of a lower interest rate. Changes favorable to the obligor are unlikely to be made with any fraudulent intent, but if such an intent is found the alteration may operate as a discharge.

Discharge is a personal defense of the party whose obligation is modified and anyone whose obligation is not affected is not discharged. But if an alteration discharges a party there is also discharge of any party having a right of recourse against the discharged party because the obligation of the party with the right of recourse is affected by the alteration. Assent to the alteration given before or after it is made will prevent the party from asserting the discharge. The phrase "or is precluded from asserting the defense" in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] recognizes the possibility of an estoppel or other ground barring the defense which does not rest on assent.

2. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] a person paying a fraudulently altered instrument or taking it for value, in good faith and without notice of the alteration, is not affected by a discharge under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. The person paying or taking the instrument may assert rights with respect to the instrument according to its original terms or, in the case of an incomplete instrument that is altered by unauthorized completion, according to its terms as completed. If blanks are filled or an incomplete instrument is otherwise completed, subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] places the loss upon the party who left the instrument incomplete by permitting enforcement in its completed form. This result is intended even though the instrument was stolen from the maker or drawer and completed after the theft.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) Any alteration of an instrument is material which changes the contract of any party thereto in any respect, including any such change in:

(a) the number or relations of the parties; or

(b) an incomplete instrument, by completing it otherwise than as authorized; or

(c) the writing as signed, by adding to it or by removing any part of it.

(2) As against any person other than a subsequent holder in due course:

(a) alteration by the holder which is both fraudulent and material discharges any party whose contract is thereby changed unless that party assents or is precluded from asserting the defense;

(b) no other alteration discharges any party and the instrument may be enforced according to its original tenor, or as to incomplete instruments according to the authority given.

(3) A subsequent holder in due course may in all cases enforce the instrument according to its original tenor, and when an incomplete instrument has been completed, he may enforce it as completed."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Material Alterations: In conviction of grand larceny, in which defendant had stolen and subsequently cashed check, the tearing of the check and its repair did not constitute spoliation under section 55-907, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), so as to make the check a nonnegotiable instrument. St. v. Romero, 146 M 77, 404 P2d 500 (1965).

Marks of Alteration: Where a check on its face showed signs of alteration, the figures having been written with different pencil than balance of writing and the surface of paper underlying such figures bearing unmistakable signs of erasure so that alteration appeared suspicious, it would not be presumed that alteration was made prior to delivery and with assent of maker. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 119 M 581, 179 P2d 750, 171 ALR 790 (1947).

Negligence: Where an alteration of a check is so obvious as to impart notice thereof to bank cashing for payee, a finding is authorized that bank's action amounted to bad faith toward maker or at least gross negligence. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 119 M 581, 179 P2d 750, 171 ALR 790 (1947).

Holder in Due Course: Where check has been materially altered after its execution and delivery and holder is a holder in due course, not a party to the alteration, holder may recover on check according to its original tenor as established by evidence. Miles City Bank v. Askin, 119 M 581, 179 P2d 750, 171 ALR 790 (1947).

Recovery From Endorser: Where a check is paid on a forged endorsement by a bank other than the drawee, and there is no estoppel to assert the forgery, the rights of the drawee bank against the paying bank on its endorsement are fixed by sections 65 and 66 of the UNIL not by 55-906, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). First Nat'l Bank of Miles City v. Fed. Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, 88 M 589, 294 P 1105 (1931).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 127 and 189, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This section is a restatement of present Section 3-409(1) [30-3-409(1) prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (2) of present Section 3-409 [30-3-409(2) prior to 1991 revision] is deleted as misleading and superfluous. Comment 3 says of [present] subsection (2) [30-3-409(2) prior to 1991 revision]: "It is intended to make it clear that this section does not in any way affect any liability which may arise apart from the instrument." [Comment now deleted.] In reality [present] subsection (2) [30-3-409(2) prior to 1991 revision] has not made anything clear and has been a source of confusion. If all it means is that a bank that has not certified a check may engage in other conduct that might make it liable to a holder, it states the obvious and is superfluous. Section 1-103 [30-1-102] is adequate to cover those cases. But some courts have mistakenly looked to present Sections 3-409(2) [30-3-409(2) prior to 1991 revision] for substantive content, and it offers none. For instance, in Graybar Electric Co., Inc., v. Brookline Trust Co., 39 UCC Rep. Serv. 1721 (Mass. 1984), the court cited [present] Section 3-409(2) [30-3-409(2) prior to 1991 revision] to show that a bank may be liable on a personal money order without an express acceptance because of an implied representation that it intends to accept.

2. Liability with respect to drafts may arise under other law. For example, Section 4-302 [30-4-302] imposes liability on a payor bank for late return of an item.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current catchline for former catchline that read: "Draft not an assignment"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Nothing in this section shall affect any liability in contract, tort or otherwise arising from any letter of credit or other obligation or representation which is not an acceptance"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Lack of Consideration or Setoff: There was no issue of material fact precluding summary judgment, either of lack of consideration or of setoff, because the express language of the note sued on stated that consideration existed, and the second action was a personal claim unrelated to the note. Keller v. Llewellyn, 175 M 164, 573 P2d 166 (1977).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Novation: Where there was fraud and partial failure of consideration in that makers of original note never received from payees part of loan for which note was given, execution of renewal note to payees did not cut off defenses under original note. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Question for Jury:

In action by payees against makers for balance due on renewal note, wherein makers contended that $1,000 makers never received on $20,000 loan was to represent drawing account for makers, and payees contended that the $1,000 represented payees' share of profits from purchase of machinery at reduced rate, question whether there had been partial failure of consideration because makers never received $1,000 was for jury. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Where a defendant sets up want of consideration and the evidence is conflicting, the question of consideration becomes one for the jury. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934); Miles Sav. Bank v. Liquin & Swandal, 90 M 513, 4 P2d 482 (1931); Fifty Associates Co. v. Quigley, 56 M 348, 185 P 155 (1919).

Partial Failure: In action by payees for balance due on renewal note wherein makers who had borrowed money and given note and renewal note therefor to payees alleged in answer that payees misrepresented amount due on original note and that makers believed the representations and executed renewal note for more than correct amount, answer sufficiently alleged elements of fraud and partial failure of consideration, which would be defense pro tanto. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Evidence of Prior Indebtedness: When defendant signed written guaranty to pay for goods sold by plaintiff to a codefendant and thereafter, while unpaid indebtedness remained on this contract a "renewal contract" was executed by the same parties, in action against guarantor on second contract where defense was lack of consideration, the first contract was admissible to prove consideration for the second, since it showed the guarantor's prior indebtedness, a valid consideration under section 55-302, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Miller, 105 M 456, 73 P2d 552 (1937).

Promissory Note Constitutes Valuable Consideration: A promissory note given in consideration of an oil and gas lease was a valuable consideration, and the fact that the lessor more than a year after its delivery returned it to the lessee was immaterial; it having been the property of the lessor, he could do with it as he saw fit. Nadeau v. The Texas Co., 104 M 558, 69 P2d 586 (1937).

Transfer to Secure Antecedent Debt: While the cancellation or satisfaction of an antecedent debt constitutes a sufficient consideration for a transfer under section 55-302, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and may make the transferee a bona fide purchaser, the mere transfer of property to secure an antecedent debt does not make the transferee an innocent purchaser. Rasmussen v. Lee & Co., Inc., 104 M 278, 66 P2d 119 (1937).

Pleading Want of Consideration:

Under section 55-305, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), absence of consideration is a matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course. This is an affirmative defense and must be pleaded. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936).

In an action by the payee of a promissory note against the maker, defendant's general averment that the note "was executed without any consideration whatever and there was a total absence and failure of consideration" was sufficient without setting out the evidentiary facts upon which defendant relied. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Chappell, 71 M 553, 230 P 1084 (1924).

Presumption of Continued Existence: In view of the ease with which a note and mortgage may be transferred without the necessity of making a public record thereof, the presumption that a thing once shown to have existed will be presumed to have continued as long as is usual with things of that nature (26-1-602), standing alone was too weak as proof of ownership to establish a prima facie case of want or absence of consideration after 15 years. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936).

Validity of Original Note: The surrender of a note which was obtained through undue influence or misrepresentation does not constitute any consideration for a new note. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934).

Effect of Words "Value Received": The words "value received" import consideration. Miles Sav. Bank v. Liquin & Swandal, 90 M 513, 4 P2d 482 (1931).

Preexisting Debt:

A preexisting debt constitutes value and, therefore, the surrender of an old promissory note upon execution of one to take its place is a sufficient consideration for the latter, and the fact that the obligation surrendered is that of another person is immaterial. First St. Bank of Philipsburg v. Mussigbrod, 83 M 68, 271 P 695 (1928).

An antecedent or preexisting debt constitutes value, and therefore one who takes property in satisfaction of such a debt is a purchaser for value and entitled to full protection as such. Hackney v. Birely, 67 M 155, 215 P 642 (1923); Schauer v. Morgan, 67 M 455, 216 P 347 (1923); Mulany v. Murray, 68 M 245, 216 P 1105 (1923).

Burden of Proof:

The burden of showing a want of consideration to support a written instrument lies with the party seeking to invalidate it on that ground, the presumption being that there was a consideration. Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928).

In an action on a promissory note against the maker, plaintiff is not required to prove consideration, a note being deemed to have been issued for a valuable consideration, and absence of it being a matter of defense. Alley v. Butte & W. Min. Co., 77 M 477, 251 P 517 (1926).

Partially Valid Consideration: A note given in aid of a contract which is invalid under the Statute of Frauds is without consideration and payment thereof cannot be enforced; but where only a portion of a note is given in payment of such a void contract, the remaining portion being based upon a valid consideration, payment may be enforced as to such latter portion. Eccles v. Kendrick, 80 M 120, 259 P 609 (1927).

Extension of Time as Consideration: Where the vendor of land accepted a note in payment of interest past due on a deferred payment of the purchase price, he waived the right given him under the contract of sale to declare the contract terminated by its breach, and extended the time in which the amount might be paid, and such extension was a sufficient consideration for the note. Edwards v. Muri, 73 M 339, 237 P 209 (1925).

Sufficiency of Consideration: Where plaintiff, in possession of public land under a claim of right to desert entry and upon which he had made improvements consisting of about 3 miles of fencing, located defendants thereon, delivered possession and surrendered the improvements to them, defendants giving a note for $650 in payment, there was sufficient consideration for the instrument. McConnell v. Blackley, 66 M 510, 214 P 64 (1923).

Detriment to Promisee: Detriment to the promisee is sufficient consideration. Ford v. Drake, 46 M 314, 127 P 1019 (1912).

Notes Generally: In the case of a note which is negotiable in form consideration is presumed. Ford v. Drake, 46 M 314, 127 P 1019 (1912).

Note of Bank Officer: The note of a bank officer in substitution for assets withdrawn rests on good consideration. St. Bank v. Forsyth, 41 M 249, 108 P 914, 28 L.R.A., N.S. 501 (1910).

Agreement as to Nonliability: A promissory note made and executed without consideration and received by the payee under an agreement that the maker shall never be called on to pay the same cannot be enforced against the maker in an action by the payee. St. Bank v. Forsyth, 41 M 249, 108 P 914, 28 L.R.A., N.S. 501 (1910).

Forbearance to Sue: Forbearance to sue is a good consideration for a negotiable instrument, but the claim must be enforceable to make forbearance good consideration. Bank of Ontario v. Hoskins, 33 M 306, 83 P 493 (1905).

30-3-410. Acceptance of draft — certified check.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-409, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 161—170, and 191, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. The first three subsections of Section 3-409 [30-3-410] are a restatement of present Section 3-410 [30-3-410 prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] adds a definition of certified check which is a type of accepted draft.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the generally recognized rule that the mere signature of the drawee on the instrument is a sufficient acceptance. Customarily the signature is written vertically across the face of the instrument, but since the drawee has no reason to sign for any other purpose a signature in any other place, even on the back of the instrument, is sufficient. It need not be accompanied by such words as "Accepted," "Certified," or "Good." It must not, however, bear any words indicating an intent to refuse to honor the draft. The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the generally recognized rule that an acceptance written on the draft takes effect when the drawee notifies the holder or gives notice according to instructions.

3. The purpose of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is to provide a definite date of payment if none appears on the instrument. An undated acceptance of a draft payable "thirty days after sight" is incomplete. Unless the acceptor writes in a different date the holder is authorized to complete the acceptance according to the terms of the draft by supplying a date of presentment. Any date which the holder chooses to write in is effective providing the choice of date is made in good faith.

4. The last sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] states the generally recognized rule that in the absence of agreement a bank is under no obligation to certify a check. A check is a demand instrument calling for payment rather than acceptance. The bank may be liable for breach of any agreement with the drawer, the holder, or any other person by which it undertakes to certify. Its liability is not on the instrument, since the drawee is not so liable until acceptance. Section 3-408 [30-3-409]. Any liability is for breach of the separate agreement.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current catchline for former catchline that read: "Definition and operation of acceptance"; in (1), near middle of first sentence after "signed", substituted "agreement to pay a" for "engagement to honor the" and substituted last sentence relating to time and effect of acceptance for former sentence that read: "It becomes operative when completed by delivery or notification"; inserted (4) defining certified check; and made minor changes in style.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Supply of Presentment Date by Holder: The holder of a 160-day sight draft may supply a date of presentment when the drawee fails to provide his written acceptance or date thereof. Thus, the holder of the draft could in good faith treat the date on which the collecting bank acknowledged receipt of the draft as the date of acceptance and could properly treat the draft as dishonored when payment was received 162 days after the date the draft was received from the bank. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Burden of Proof: In the absence of proof showing the length of time for which the check in this action was held by the bank upon which drawn before returning it dishonored, the contention of defendant drawer that the bank having held it for more than 24 hours, his obligation thereon was discharged under this section, may not be sustained; the burden of proving payment in this manner having been upon him. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Application to Checks: The provisions of sections 55-1105 and 55-1106, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), (Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law), that the drawee of a bill of exchange is allowed 24 hours after presentment in which to decide whether he will or will not accept it, and will be deemed to have accepted it if he fails to return it within that time, are applicable to a check which, under section 55-1702, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is declared to be a bill of exchange drawn on a bank. Blackwelder v. Fergus Motor Co., 80 M 374, 260 P 734 (1927); Clarke v. Nat'l Bank of Mont., 78 M 48, 252 P 373 (1926).

Time of Retention: Failure of the drawee bank to return a check within 24 hours as "nonaccepted" constitutes acceptance and creates debtor and creditor relation between the payee and the drawee bank. Blackwelder v. Fergus Motor Co., 80 M 374, 260 P 734 (1927).

30-3-412. Acceptance varying draft.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-410, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 139, 140, 141 and 142, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. This section is a restatement of present Section 3-412 [30-3-412 prior to 1991 revision]. It applies to conditional acceptances, acceptances for part of the amount, acceptances to pay at a different time from that required by the draft, or to the acceptance of less than all of the drawees. It applies to any other engagement changing the essential terms of the draft. If the drawee makes a varied acceptance the holder may either reject it or assent to it. The holder may reject by insisting on acceptance of the draft as presented. Refusal by the drawee to accept the draft as presented is dishonor. In that event the drawee is not bound by the varied acceptance and is entitled to have it canceled.

If the holder assents to the varied acceptance, the drawee's obligation as acceptor is according to the terms of the varied acceptance. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] the effect of the holder's assent is to discharge any drawer or indorser who does not also assent. The assent of the drawer or indorser must be affirmatively expressed. Mere failure to object within a reasonable time is not assent which will prevent the discharge.

2. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] an acceptance does not vary from the terms of the draft if it provides for payment at any particular bank or place in the United States unless the acceptance states that the draft is to be paid only at such bank or place. Section 3-501(b)(1) [30-3-504(2)(a)] states that if an instrument is payable at a bank in the United States presentment must be made at the place of payment (Section 3-111 [30-3-127]) which in this case is at the designated bank.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, substituted "If the terms of a drawee's acceptance vary from the terms of" for "Where the drawee's proffered acceptance in any manner varies" and at end of second sentence substituted "may cancel the acceptance" for "is entitled to have his acceptance canceled"; and in (3), after "draft", inserted "the obligation of" and near end substituted "expressly assent to the acceptance" for "affirmatively assent".

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-412, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 60, 61 and 62, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. The obligations of the maker, acceptor, drawer, and indorser are stated in four separate sections. Proposed Section 3-412 [30-3-413] states the obligation of the maker and is consistent with present Section 3-413(1) [30-3-413(1) prior to 1991 revision]. Under proposed Section 3-105(b) [30-3-125(2)] nonissuance of either a complete or incomplete instrument is a defense by a maker or drawer against a person that is not a holder in due course.

2. The obligation of the maker may be modified in the case of alteration if, under Section 3-406 [30-3-406], the maker is precluded from asserting the alteration.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Contract of maker, drawer and acceptor. (1) The maker or acceptor engages that he will pay the instrument according to its tenor at the time of his engagement or as completed pursuant to 30-3-115 on incomplete instruments.

(2) The drawer engages that upon dishonor of the draft and any necessary notice of dishonor or protest he will pay the amount of the draft to the holder or to any endorser who takes it up. The drawer may disclaim this liability by drawing without recourse.

(3) By making, drawing or accepting the party admits as against all subsequent parties including the drawee the existence of the payee and his then capacity to endorse."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Partial Enforcement of Promissory Note: Respondent signed a promissory note to her former husband in the amount of $2,000. She did not make any payments on the note. At trial, she testified that the only consideration she had received for the note was $1,000 and the use of a pickup. Thus, the lower court's decision to enforce the note only partially was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Effective Date of Disability Insurance: Disability insurance, subject to acceptance by the insurer, commences on the date when the debtor becomes obligated to the creditor. A promissory note takes effect from the time of its delivery. The promissory note was considered delivered at the time it was mailed to the bank. The note thereupon became the property of the payee when it was posted to the bank. It was beyond the control of the makers at that time. The time of mailing therefore became the "time of his engagement" under 30-3-413 fixing the liability of the maker. It was at that time that the insured became obligated to the creditor under 33-21-204, and the disability insurance financed by the note became effective. First Sec. Bank v. Goddard, 181 M 407, 593 P2d 1040 (1979).

Out-of-State Bank Not Party to Be Joined: Interest in loans transferred to out-of-state bank under participation agreement between lending Montana bank and out-of-state bank prior to commencement of action does not make out-of-state bank true party in interest or person to be joined if feasible when borrower sued on loan agreement and notes payable to lending Montana bank because loan agreement only establishes rights and liabilities between lending Montana bank and borrower, while participation agreement only establishes rights and liabilities between lending Montana bank and out-of-state bank. Neither establishes any contractual relationship, rights or liabilities between borrower and out-of-state bank. Additionally lending Montana bank is owner and sole payee on notes and as holder of notes is entitled to sue in its own name. State ex rel. Drum v. District Court, 169 M 494, 548 P2d 1377 (1976).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Absolute and Contingent Liability: The liability of the maker of a promissory note is absolute, while that of an endorser is contingent upon the default of the maker. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Existence and Capacity of Payee: By making a promissory note to a corporation the maker admits the payee's corporate existence and its capacity to endorse. Commercial Nat'l Bank of Great Falls v. Reichelt, 62 M 302, 204 P 1037 (1922).

30-3-414. Obligation of indorser.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-415, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 38, 44, 66, 67 and 68, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] restate the substance of present Section 3-414(1) [30-3-414(1) prior to 1991 amendment]. Subsection (2) of present Section 3-414 [30-3-414 prior to 1991 revision] has been dropped because it is superfluous. Although notice of dishonor is not mentioned in subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section], it must be given in some cases to charge an indorser. It is covered in subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section].

2. Proposed Section 3-503 [30-3-508] states when notice of dishonor is required and how it must be given. If required notice of dishonor is not given in compliance with Section 3-503 [30-3-508], subsection (c) of Section 3-415 [30-3-414(3)] states that the effect is to discharge the indorser's obligation.

3. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is similar in effect to Section 3-414(b) [30-3-423(2)]. See Comment 2 to Section 3-414 [30-3-423]. If a draft is indorsed after it is accepted by a bank, the indorser incurs the obligation stated in subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section].

4. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] modifies present Section 3-503(2)(b) [30-3-503(2)(b) prior to 1991 revision] and Section 3-502(1)(a) [30-3-502(1)(a) prior to 1991 revision] by stating a 30-day rather than a seven-day period, and stating it as an absolute rather than a presumptive period.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Contract of endorser — order of liability. (1) Unless the endorsement otherwise specifies (as by such words as "without recourse") every endorser engages that upon dishonor and any necessary notice of dishonor and protest he will pay the instrument according to its tenor at the time of his endorsement to the holder or to any subsequent endorser who takes it up, even though the endorser who takes it up was not obligated to do so.

(2) Unless they otherwise agree endorsers are liable to one another in the order in which they endorse, which is presumed to be the order in which their signatures appear on the instrument."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Nonnegotiable Instrument:

A promissory note, negotiable on its face, executed prior to the 1923 amendment of section 55-205, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was nonnegotiable when secured by a mortgage on real property, and the assignee of the mortgage with the note endorsed in blank, taking it with full knowledge that it was a mortgage note, took it as a nonnegotiable instrument. Barnes v. Rowles, 84 M 393, 276 P 15, 79 ALR 717 (1929).

The provisions of section 55-607, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), prescribing the extent of the liability of a general endorser, relate only to negotiable instruments; hence the blank endorsement of a nonnegotiable note did not carry with it a legal liability on the part of the endorser to pay the amount of the note, in the absence of a special agreement to pay, and the holding of the court in an action to foreclose that plaintiffs were not entitled to a deficiency judgment as against him was correct. Barnes v. Rowles, 84 M 393, 276 P 15, 79 ALR 717 (1929).

Independent Contract: The contract of an endorser is separate and distinct from the contract expressed by the note. Morgan v. Huffman, 76 M 396, 247 P 326 (1926).

30-3-415. Instruments signed for accommodation.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-419, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 28, 29 and 64, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. An accommodation party is a person who signs an instrument to benefit the accommodated party either by signing at the time value is obtained by the accommodated party or later, and who is not a direct beneficiary of the value obtained. An accommodation party will usually be a co-maker or anomalous indorser. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] distinguishes between direct and indirect benefit. For example, if X cosigns a note of Corporation that is given for a loan to Corporation, X is an accommodation party if no part of the loan was paid to X or for X's direct benefit. This is true even though X may receive indirect benefit from the loan because X is employed by Corporation or is a stockholder of Corporation, or even if X is the sole stockholder so long as Corporation and X are recognized as separate entities.

2. It does not matter whether an accommodation party signs gratuitously either at the time the instrument is issued or after the instrument is in the possession of a holder. Subsection (b) of Section 3-419 [30-3-415(2)] takes the view stated in Comment 3 [now deleted] to present Section 3-415 [30-3-415 prior to 1991 revision] that there need be no consideration running to the accommodation party: "The obligation of the accommodation party is supported by any consideration for which the instrument is taken before it is due. Subsection (2) [subsection (2) of this section prior to 1991 revision] is intended to change occasional decisions holding that there is no sufficient consideration where an accommodation party signs a note after it is in the hands of a holder who has given value. The [accommodation] party is liable to the holder in such a case even though there is no extension of time or other concession."

3. Whether a person is an accommodation party is a question of fact that is discussed in Comment 1. But it is almost always the case that a co-maker who signs with words of guaranty after the signature is an accommodation party. The same is true of an anomalous indorser. In either case a person taking the instrument is put on notice of the accommodation status of the co-maker or indorser. This is relevant to Section 3-605(g) [30-3-607(7)]. But, under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section], signing with words of guaranty or as an anomalous indorser also creates a presumption that the signer is an accommodation party. A party challenging accommodation party status would have to rebut this presumption by producing evidence that the signer was in fact a direct beneficiary of the value given for the instrument.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states that an accommodation party is liable on the instrument in the capacity in which the party signed the instrument. In most cases that capacity will be either that of a maker or indorser of a note. But subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] provides a limitation on subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. If the signature of the accommodation party is accompanied by words indicating unambiguously that the party is guaranteeing collection rather than payment of the instrument, liability is limited to that stated in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section], which is based on present Section 3-416(2) [30-3-416(2) prior to 1991 revision].

Present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision] is confusing because the obligation of a guarantor is covered both in Section 3-415 [30-3-414] and in Section 3-416 [30-3-417]. The latter section suggests that a signature accompanied by words of guaranty creates an obligation distinct from that of an accommodation party. Proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] eliminates that confusion by stating the obligation of a guarantor only in Section 3-419 [30-3-415]. Portions of present Section 3-416 [30-3-416, now repealed] are preserved. Present Section 3-416(2) [30-3-416, now repealed] is reflected in proposed Section 3-419(d) [30-3-415(4)] and present Section 3-416(4) [30-3-416, now repealed] is reflected in proposed Section 3-419(c) [30-3-415(3)].

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] restates subsection (5) of present subsection [sic] 3-415 [30-3-415(5) prior to 1991 revision]. Since the accommodation party that pays the instrument is entitled to enforce the instrument against the accommodated party, the accommodation party also obtains rights to any security interest or other collateral that secures payment of the instrument.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 10 in (1), after "another", substituted "party" for "part".

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Contract of accommodation party. (1) An accommodation party is one who signs the instrument in any capacity for the purpose of lending his name to another party to it.

(2) When the instrument has been taken for value before it is due the accommodation party is liable in the capacity in which he has signed even though the taker knows of the accommodation.

(3) As against a holder in due course and without notice of the accommodation oral proof of the accommodation is not admissible to give the accommodation party the benefit of discharges dependent on his character as such. In other cases the accommodation character may be shown by oral proof.

(4) An endorsement which shows that it is not in the chain of title is notice of its accommodation character.

(5) An accommodation party is not liable to the party accommodated, and if he pays the instrument has a right of recourse on the instrument against such party."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Impairment of Collateral — Defenses of Accommodation Maker: A Shaklee distributor negotiated with Storms Trust for a $10,000 loan to increase his inventory. Trustee Storms drafted a promissory note but refused to approve the loan until the distributor's wife had signed the note. The agreement granted Storms a security interest in the purchased inventory, yet Storms failed to record the security agreement. The distributor subsequently secured a second loan from a bank, which filed a financing statement on the inventory. The distributor defaulted on both loans. Storms took possession of the inventory but relinquished possession upon the bank's demand. Storms obtained a judgment against both the distributor and his wife. Wife appealed a District Court judgment for the full balance due on the promissory note and contract, contending she was discharged from liability on the note because Storms failed to perfect a security interest in the inventory, causing an impairment of collateral. Storms argued the wife was primarily liable as co-maker without benefit of defenses. The court stated that the law discharges all parties who occupy the position of a surety, including accommodation makers, endorsers, and acceptors. At the note signing, Storms had notice that the wife signed merely to aid her husband in obtaining the loan. Therefore, the wife was an accommodation maker entitled to the benefit of the defense of discharge. Storms' failure to perfect his security interest resulted in its loss to another secured party and entitled the wife to a discharge to the extent of the collateral's value. El-Ce Storms Trust v. Svetahor, 223 M 113, 724 P2d 704, 43 St. Rep. 1575 (1986).

Exoneration by Death of Surety: Where deceased had previously cosigned a promissory note for the purpose of lending his name to another party, he became an accommodation maker. As such he is primarily responsible for the payment of the note, without necessity of resort to the principal, and it was error for the District Court to disallow the holder's claim against the deceased's estate. In re Estate of Harbaugh, 196 M 274, 639 P2d 495, 39 St. Rep. 84 (1982).

Defenses of Accommodation Maker: Where a person who agreed to sign a note as original maker failed to do so, accommodation maker could interpose any defense that such person could have interposed. May v. Whitbeck, 111 M 568, 113 P2d 332 (1941).

Admissibility of Evidence: Evidence tending to show that the maker of a negotiable instrument was merely an accommodation maker was properly excluded in an action by a holder in due course, since under section 55-306, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), an accommodation maker is liable to a holder for value (even though the latter knew at the time of taking the instrument that the former was but an accommodation maker). Lister v. Donlan, 85 M 571, 281 P 348, 72 ALR 1 (1929).

Absolute Liability of Maker: The liability of the maker of a promissory note is absolute, while that of an endorser is contingent upon the default of the maker. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Joint Liability Inferred: While it is the general rule that where a number of persons successively sign a note, they are prima facie liable in the order in which their names appear even though they are in fact accommodation endorsers, their intention that there should be a joint, rather than a successive, liability may be inferred from the circumstances incident to the endorsements, and parol evidence is admissible to show that there was an agreement between them to that effect. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Endorsement After Delivery: Section 55-605, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), with reference to liability of irregular or accommodation endorsers, has no application where a party places his endorsement on a promissory note after its delivery to the payee unless he does so pursuant to an agreement or understanding had prior to delivery that the endorsement should relate back and be considered as having been made before delivery; in the absence of such an agreement the endorsement constitutes a contract of guaranty rather than one of surety. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Consideration to Accommodation Maker Not Required: Where defendant signed a renewal note taking the place of a note signed by her husband and another, at the request of the husband for the purpose of lending her name to him as comaker, she was an accommodation maker within the meaning of section 55-306, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and not a guarantor, and liable as such to a holder for value though the latter knew her to be only an accommodation maker and that no consideration moved to her for signing it, the consideration moving to one or both of her comakers having been sufficient to uphold the note. Mulany v. Murray, 68 M 245, 216 P 1105 (1923).

Release of Mortgage Given by Principal: Defendant, an accommodation maker, was primarily liable on the note, though the payee bank at the time it took the instrument knew that he was lending his name to his comaker, and was not discharged from liability by the act of the bank in releasing mortgage security furnished by the latter, without his (defendant's) knowledge or consent. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Accommodation Maker Primarily Liable: Under the Negotiable Instruments Law, an accommodation maker of a promissory note is primarily liable and is not discharged by an extension of time given his comaker; the fact that plaintiff, a holder for value, knew that defendant was an accommodation maker did not change the rule. First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597, 9 ALR 1139 (1918).

30-3-417. Transfer warranties.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-416, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 65 and 69, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is taken from subsection (2) of present Section 3-417 [30-3-417(2) prior to 1991 revision]. Subsections (3) and (4) of present Section 3-417 [30-3-417(3) and (4) prior to 1991 revision] are deleted. Warranties under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] in favor of the immediate transferee apply to all persons who transfer an instrument for consideration whether or not the transfer is accompanied by indorsement. Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract will support those warranties. If there is an indorsement the warranty runs with the instrument and the remote holder may sue the indorser-warrantor directly and thus avoid a multiplicity of suits.

2. Since the purpose of transfer (Section 3-203(a) [30-3-210(1)]) is to give the transferee the right to enforce the instrument, subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] is a warranty that the transferor is a person entitled to enforce the instrument (Section 3-301 [30-3-301]). Under Section 3-203(b) [30-3-210(2)] transfer gives the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] is in effect a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing indorsements that prevent the transferor from making the transferee a person entitled to enforce the instrument.

3. The rationale of subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d) of this section] is that the transferee does not undertake to buy an instrument that is not enforceable in whole or in part, unless there is a contrary agreement. Even if the transferee takes as a holder in due course who takes free of the defense or claim in recoupment, the warranty gives the transferee the option of proceeding against the transferor rather than litigating with the obligor on the instrument the issue of the holder-in-due-course status of the transferee. Subsection (3) of present Section 3-417 [30-3-417(3) prior to 1991 revision] which limits this warranty is deleted. The rationale is that the purpose of a "no recourse" indorsement is to avoid the obligation to guarantee payment and has no relation to disclaimer of warranties.

4. Under subsection (a)(5) [subsection (1)(e) of this section] the transferor does not warrant against difficulties of collection, impairment of the credit of the obligor or even insolvency. The transferee is expected to determine such questions before taking the obligation. If insolvency proceedings as defined in Section 1-201(22) [30-1-201(22)] have been instituted against the party who is expected to pay and the transferor knows it, the concealment of that fact amounts to a fraud upon the transferee, and the warranty against knowledge of such proceedings is provided accordingly.

5. Transfer warranties may be disclaimed with respect to any instrument except a check. Between the immediate parties disclaimer may be made by agreement. In the case of an indorser, disclaimer of transferor's liability, to be effective, must appear in the indorsement with words such as "without warranties" or some other specific reference to warranties. But in the case of a check, subsection (c) of proposed Section 3-416 [30-3-417(3)] provides that transfer warranties cannot be disclaimed at all because of the reliance of the banking system on these warranties in the collection process.

6. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states the measure of damages for breach of warranty. There is no express provision for attorney's fees, but attorney's fees are not meant to be necessarily excluded. They could be granted because they fit within the phrase "expenses incurred as a result of the breach." The intention is to leave to other state law the issue as to when attorney's fees are recoverable.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Warranties on presentment and transfer. (1) Any person who obtains payment or acceptance and any prior transferor warrants to a person who in good faith pays or accepts that:

(a) he has a good title to the instrument or is authorized to obtain payment or acceptance on behalf of one who has a good title; and

(b) he has no knowledge that the signature of the maker or drawer is unauthorized, except that this warranty is not given by a holder in due course acting in good faith:

(i) to a maker with respect to the maker's own signature; or

(ii) to a drawer with respect to the drawer's own signature, whether or not the drawer is also the drawee; or

(iii) to an acceptor of a draft if the holder in due course took the draft after the acceptance or obtained the acceptance without knowledge that the drawer's signature was unauthorized; and

(c) the instrument has not been materially altered, except that this warranty is not given by a holder in due course acting in good faith:

(i) to the maker of a note; or

(ii) to the drawer of a draft whether or not the drawer is also the drawee; or

(iii) to the acceptor of a draft with respect to an alteration made prior to the acceptance if the holder in due course took the draft after the acceptance, even though the acceptance provided "payable as originally drawn" or equivalent terms; or

(iv) to the acceptor of a draft with respect to an alteration made after the acceptance.

(2) Any person who transfers an instrument and receives consideration warrants to his transferee and if the transfer is by endorsement to any subsequent holder who takes the instrument in good faith that:

(a) he has a good title to the instrument or is authorized to obtain payment or acceptance on behalf of one who has a good title and the transfer is otherwise rightful; and

(b) all signatures are genuine or authorized; and

(c) the instrument has not been materially altered; and

(d) no defense of any party is good against him; and

(e) he has no knowledge of any insolvency proceeding instituted with respect to the maker or acceptor or the drawer of an unaccepted instrument.

(3) By transferring "without recourse" the transferor limits the obligation stated in subsection (2)(d) to a warranty that he has no knowledge of such a defense.

(4) A selling agent or broker who does not disclose the fact that he is acting only as such gives the warranties provided in this section, but if he makes such disclosure warrants only his good faith and authority."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

Applicability of Discovery Doctrine to Uniform Commercial Code Conversion Cases: Over a 2 ½-year period, one of plaintiff's employees forged signatures on more than 100 company checks and money orders, made them payable to herself, and deposited the proceeds in her personal account at defendant credit union. Plaintiff ultimately filed an action against the credit union, seeking damages in the amount of the checks and money orders and alleging unlawful conversion of negotiable instruments under 30-3-419 and breach of transfer warranties under 30-4-207. The credit union moved for summary judgment on grounds that the conversion action was barred by the statutes of limitations in 30-4-207(5) and subsection (4) of this section. However, the statutes of limitations in 30-4-207(5) and subsection (4) of this section apply only to breach of warranty actions, not to conversion actions. The credit union then asserted that the discovery doctrine should apply. The doctrine is an equitable exception to the general rule that the statute of limitations begins to run as soon as the cause of action accrues, allowing instead that the applicable statute of limitations begins to run once plaintiff knew or should have known that a cause of action existed. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to apply the discovery doctrine to the Uniform Commercial Code conversion claim. Conversion actions are subject to the statute of limitations in 30-3-122(7), which requires commencement of a conversion action within 3 years of the action's accrual. The public would be poorly served by a rule that shifts the responsibility for careful bookkeeping and employee supervision away from those in the best position to monitor accounts and employees. Although predictably harsh in some cases, the 3-year statute of limitations will be strictly applied as best serving the goals of the Uniform Commercial Code. The facts regarding the date of the conversion and the filing of plaintiff's complaint were not in dispute, so the credit union was entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the conversion claim. Yarbro, Ltd. v. Missoula Fed. Credit Union, 2002 MT 152, 310 M 346, 50 P3d 158 (2002).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Forged Prior Endorsement: Plaintiff's right of action does not depend upon any express promise or warranty, but rather upon the implied warranty that all preceding endorsements are genuine and that it had good title to the check (sections 55-606, 55-607, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed)). The endorsement of the payee having been forged, the warranties were broken, defendant had no title whatever to the check and, consequently, no right to collect any money thereon, and plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount paid and its right to recover was not affected by delay in giving notice of the forgery after discovery. First Nat'l Bank in Miles City v. Fed. Reserve Bank of Minneapolis, 88 M 589, 294 P 1105 (1931).

Warranties Enumerated: An unqualified endorsement of a promissory note warrants to all subsequent holders in due course that the instrument is genuine, that the endorser has good title to it, that all prior parties had capacity to contract, that the note at the time of his endorsement was valid and subsisting, that it will be paid according to its tenor, and that in case of its dishonor he will pay the amount of it to the holder or to any subsequent endorser who may be compelled to pay it. Wood v. Ferguson, 71 M 540, 230 P 592 (1924).

30-3-419. Conversion of instrument.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-420, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 137, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment:

1. Section 3-420 [30-3-419] is a modification of present Section 3-419 [30-3-419 prior to 1991 revision]. Present Section 3-419(1) [30-3-419(1) prior to 1991 revision] purports to state when an instrument is converted, but in fact the three cases stated do not include all the situations in which an instrument is converted. The first sentence of proposed Section 3-420(a) [30-3-419(1)] states a general rule that the law of conversion applicable generally to personal property also apply [sic] to instruments. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of present Section 3-419(1) [30-3-419(1)(a) and (1)(b) prior to 1991 revision] are deleted as inappropriate in cases of noncash items that may be delivered for acceptance or payment in collection letters that contain varying instructions as to what to do in the event of nonpayment on the day of delivery. It is better to leave such cases to be covered by the general law of conversion that would address the issue of when, under the circumstances prevailing, the presenter's right to possession has been denied. The second sentence of Section 3-420(a) [30-3-419(1)] makes clear that it includes not only cases of forged indorsement, but also cases in which the instrument lacks an indorsement necessary for negotiation. Thus, it covers cases of two-payee checks in which only one payee has indorsed as well as cases in which the indorsement of the payee is lacking. This amendment is for clarification only. It does not change current law.

The cases are divided on the issue of whether the drawer of a check with a forged indorsement can assert rights against a depositary bank that took the check. The last sentence of Section 3-420(a) [30-3-419(1)] resolves the conflict by following the rule stated in Stone & Webster Engineering Corp. v. First National Bank & Trust Co., 184 N.E.2d 358 (Mass. 1962). There is no reason why a drawer should have an action in conversion. The check represents an obligation of the drawer rather than property of the drawer. The drawer has an adequate remedy against the payor bank for recredit of the drawer's account for unauthorized payment of the check.

There is also a split of authority on the issue of whether a payee who never received the instrument is a proper plaintiff in a conversion action. The typical case is one in which a check is stolen from the drawer. Or the case may be one in which the check is mailed to an address different from that of the payee and is stolen after it arrives at that address. The thief forges the indorsement of the payee and obtains payment by depositing the check to an account in a depositary bank. The issue is whether the payee may bring an action in conversation [sic] against the depositary bank or the drawee bank. Under the last sentence of Section 3-420(a) [30-3-419(1)] the payee has no conversion action because the check was never delivered to the payee. Until delivery, the payee does not have any interest in the check. The payee never became the holder of the check nor a person entitled to enforce the check. Section 3-301 [30-3-301]. Nor is the payee injured by the fraud. Normally the drawer of a check intends to pay an obligation owed to the payee. But if the check is never delivered to the payee, the obligation owed to the payee is not affected. If the check falls into the hands of a thief who obtains payment after forging the signature of the payee as an indorsement, the obligation owed to the payee continues to exist after the thief receives payment. Since the payee's right to enforce the underlying obligation is unaffected by the fraud of the thief, there is no reason to give any remedy to the payee. The drawer of the check has no conversion remedy, but the drawee is not entitled to charge the drawer's account when the drawee wrongfully honored the check. The remedy of the drawee is against the depositary bank for breach of warranty under Section 3-417(a)(1) [30-3-424(1)(a)]. The loss will fall on the person who gave value to the thief for the check.

The situation is different if the check is delivered to the payee. If the check is taken for an obligation owed to the payee, the last sentence of Section 3-310(b)(4) [30-3-310(2)(d)] provides that the obligation may not be enforced to the extent of the amount of the check. The payee's rights are restricted to enforcement of the payee's rights in the instrument. In this event the payee is injured by the theft and has a cause of action for conversion.

The payee receives delivery when the check comes into the payee's possession, as for example when it is put into the payee's mailbox. Delivery to an agent is delivery to the payee. If a check is payable to more than one payee, delivery to one of the payees is deemed to be delivery to all of the payees. Occasionally, the person asserting a conversion cause of action is an indorsee rather than the original payee. If the check is stolen before the check can be delivered to the indorsee and the indorsee's indorsement is forged, the analysis is similar. For example, a check is payable to the order of A. A indorses it to B and puts it into an envelope addressed to B. The envelope is never delivered to B. Rather, Thief steals the envelope, forges B's indorsement to the check and obtains payment. Because the check was never delivered to B, the indorsee, B has no cause of action for conversion, but A does have such an action. A is the owner of the check. B never obtained rights in the check. If A intended to negotiate the check to B in payment of an obligation, that obligation was not affected by the conduct of Thief. B can enforce that obligation. Thief stole A's property not B's.

2. Subsection (2) of present Section 3-419 [30-3-419(2) prior to 1991 revision] is amended because it is not clear why the present law distinguishes between the liability of the drawee and that of other converters. Why should there be a conclusive presumption that the liability is face amount if a drawee refuses to pay or return an instrument or makes payment on a forged indorsement, while the liability of a maker who does the same thing is only presumed to be the face amount? Moreover, it is not clear what face amount means. If a note for $10,000 is payable in a year at 10% interest, it is common to refer to $10,000 as the face amount, but if the note is converted the loss to the owner also includes the loss of interest. Subsection (b) of Section 3-420 [30-3-419(2)] by referring to "amount payable on the instrument" allows the full amount due under the instrument to be recovered.

The "but" clause in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] addresses the problem of conversion actions in multiple payee checks. Proposed Section 3-110(d) [30-3-126(4)] states that an instrument cannot be enforced unless all payees join in the action. But an action for conversion might be brought by a payee having no interest or a limited interest in the proceeds of the check. This clause prevents such a plaintiff from receiving a windfall. An example is a check by the owner of a building payable to the building contractor and a supplier of building material. Depending upon the contract between the contractor and the supplier, the amount of the check may be due entirely to the contractor, entirely to the supplier or part may be due to one and the rest to the other.

3. Subsection (3) of present Section 3-419 [30-3-419(3) prior to 1991 revision] has drawn criticism from the courts, who see no reason why a depositary bank should have the defense stated in the subsection. See Knesz v. Central Jersey Bank & Trust Co., 477 Atl.2d 806 (N.J. 1984). The depositary bank is ultimately liable in the case of a forged indorsement check because of its warranty to the payor bank under present Section 4-207(1)(a) [30-4-207(1)(a) prior to 1991 revision] and it is usually the most convenient defendant in cases involving multiple checks drawn on different banks. There is no basis for requiring the owner of the check to bring multiple actions against the various payor banks and to require those banks to assert warranty rights against the depositary bank. Subsection (c) of proposed Section 3-420 [30-3-419(3)] limits the defense of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] to collecting banks other than the depositary bank. Under proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420], which puts the loss in cases of forged indorsement by employees on the employer, forged indorsement losses by depositary banks should be substantially reduced.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Conversion of instrument — innocent representative. (1) An instrument is converted when:

(a) a drawee to whom it is delivered for acceptance refuses to return it on demand; or

(b) any person to whom it is delivered for payment refuses on demand either to pay or to return it; or

(c) it is paid on a forged endorsement.

(2) In an action against a drawee under subsection (1) the measure of the drawee's liability is the face amount of the instrument. In any other action under subsection (1) the measure of liability is presumed to be the face amount of the instrument.

(3) Subject to the provisions of this code concerning restrictive endorsements a representative, including a depositary or collecting bank, who has in good faith and in accordance with the reasonable commercial standards applicable to the business of such representative dealt with an instrument or its proceeds on behalf of one who was not the true owner is not liable in conversion or otherwise to the true owner beyond the amount of any proceeds remaining in his hands.

(4) An intermediary bank or payor bank which is not a depositary bank is not liable in conversion solely by reason of the fact that proceeds of an item endorsed restrictively (30-3-205 and 30-3-206) are not paid or applied consistently with the restrictive endorsement of an endorser other than its immediate transferor."

Saving Clause: Section 232, Ch. 410, L. 1991, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1991 REVISION

Applicability of Discovery Doctrine to Uniform Commercial Code Conversion Cases: Over a 2 ½-year period, one of plaintiff's employees forged signatures on more than 100 company checks and money orders, made them payable to herself, and deposited the proceeds in her personal account at defendant credit union. Plaintiff ultimately filed an action against the credit union, seeking damages in the amount of the checks and money orders and alleging unlawful conversion of negotiable instruments under this section and breach of transfer warranties under 30-4-207. The credit union moved for summary judgment on grounds that the conversion action was barred by the statutes of limitations in 30-3-417(4) and 30-4-207(5). However, the statutes of limitations in 30-3-417(4) and 30-4-207(5) apply only to breach of warranty actions, not to conversion actions. The credit union then asserted that the discovery doctrine should apply. The doctrine is an equitable exception to the general rule that the statute of limitations begins to run as soon as the cause of action accrues, allowing instead that the applicable statute of limitations begins to run once plaintiff knew or should have known that a cause of action existed. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court declined to apply the discovery doctrine to the Uniform Commercial Code conversion claim. Conversion actions are subject to the statute of limitations in 30-3-122(7), which requires commencement of a conversion action within 3 years of the action's accrual. The public would be poorly served by a rule that shifts the responsibility for careful bookkeeping and employee supervision away from those in the best position to monitor accounts and employees. Although predictably harsh in some cases, the 3-year statute of limitations will be strictly applied as best serving the goals of the Uniform Commercial Code. The facts regarding the date of the conversion and the filing of plaintiff's complaint were not in dispute, so the credit union was entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the conversion claim. Yarbro, Ltd. v. Missoula Fed. Credit Union, 2002 MT 152, 310 M 346, 50 P3d 158 (2002).

Prior Adjudication of Common-Law Conversion as Collaterally Estopping Subsequent Claim of Statutory Conversion: Boyds contended that a previous action for common-law conversion did not collaterally estop subsequent litigation on a theory of statutory conversion. However, the prior litigation determined that Boyds had no interest in or right to checks deposited by the bank into the account of third-party defendants and that because the checks were correctly deposited, no conversion occurred. Because the subsequent cause depended on the same question of conversion that had already been determined, relitigation was properly barred by estoppel. Boyd v. First Interstate Bank of Kalispell, 253 M 214, 833 P2d 149, 49 St. Rep. 459 (1992), distinguishing Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 207 M 248, 675 P2d 83 (1983).

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Unendorsed Check — Payment to Joint Payee Who Converts Proceeds — Liability:

The District Court, on remand, properly followed the Supreme Court's directions in determining the wife's interest in two checks, wrongfully negotiated by the husband and converted by the defendant banks, to be the face amount of the checks. Based on the clear language of 30-3-419 and on expert testimony on statutory conversion, the findings and conclusions that the wife was entitled to the face amount were supported by ample authority. Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 219 M 323, 711 P2d 1364, 42 St. Rep. 2056 (1985), modifying Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 207 M 248, 675 P2d 83, 40 St. Rep. 2015 (1983).

Payment on a "forged endorsement", within the meaning of this section, includes payment on an unauthorized endorsement or payment when there is no endorsement at all. A person to whom an instrument is delivered, and who pays the instrument, is best able to prevent conversion by carefully checking endorsements. Therefore, where husband deposited in the bank two checks made out to him and his wife, neither of whom had endorsed the checks, the two drawee banks paid the checks, and husband withdrew the money, all without his wife's knowledge or consent, converted the money, and divorced his wife, all three banks were liable to wife for conversion of the checks. This section does not fix the extent of liability to a joint payee. To allow one of two joint payees to recover the face amount of an instrument would grant a windfall equal to half that amount, and each joint payee could recover the full face amount, requiring the defendant(s) to pay twice. The court held that the drawee banks were, under this section, absolutely liable for the face amount, since this section states the "liability is the face amount", but that payees' relative interests should be determined and a payee could recover only to the extent of his interest. The depositary bank was presumably liable for the full face amount under the wording of this section but could offer evidence to the contrary and must indemnify the drawee banks. The checks were in payment of the sale of property husband and wife jointly held, and wife was thus entitled to recover half the face amount of the checks absent proof to the contrary. Stapleton v. First Sec. Bank, 207 M 248, 675 P2d 83, 40 St. Rep. 2015 (1983), distinguished in Boyd v. First Interstate Bank of Kalispell, 253 M 214, 833 P2d 149, 49 St. Rep. 459 (1992).

Summary Judgment Proper — Improperly Endorsed Check Admittedly Negotiated by Bank: Plaintiff drew a check on her account at defendant bank payable to a building supply store to be used for supplies specifically listed on the face of the check and gave it to a contractor who was working for her. Contractor, unknown to plaintiff, endorsed the check "for exchange only" to the supply store. Based on this endorsement, defendant bank issued a new check payable to the supply store but without restriction on its face. Contractor applied the check to his own account with the supply store, rather than using it to buy materials for plaintiff. Several weeks later, the same thing was done with a check made payable to another building supply store. Plaintiff sued defendant bank for conversion. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of plaintiff's motion for summary judgment because the undisputed evidence showed that the defendant bank accepted and negotiated two checks that were not endorsed by the payees or by anyone clothed with apparent or actual authority to act for them. Eatinger v. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown, 199 M 377, 649 P2d 1253, 39 St. Rep. 1465 (1982).

Plaintiff Estopped From Denying Ownership of Account: There was substantial evidence to support the District Court's conclusion that plaintiff was equitably estopped from denying his joint and beneficial ownership of a checking account by virtue of his acknowledgment and use of the account and the defendant-bank's reliance thereon in crediting a check to that account. The plaintiff could not complain that he lacked authority to draw checks on the account when he could have remedied that situation simply by signing the signature card. Beyer v. First Nat'l Bank of Dillon, 188 M 208, 612 P2d 1285, 37 St. Rep. 1035 (1980).

30-3-420. Employer responsibility for fraudulent indorsement by employee.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-405, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section applies to instruments generally but normally the instrument will be a check. Section 3-405 [30-3-420] adopts the principle that the risk of loss for fraudulent indorsements by employees who are entrusted with responsibility with respect to checks should fall on the employer rather than the bank that takes the check or pays it, if the bank was not negligent in the transaction. If the bank failed to exercise ordinary care, subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] allows the employer to shift part of the loss to the bank to the extent the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss. "Ordinary care" is defined in Section 3-103(a)(7) [30-3-102(1)(g)]. Section 3-405 [30-3-420] is based on the belief that the employer is in a far better position to avoid the loss by care in choosing employees, in supervising them, and in adopting other measures to prevent forged indorsements on instruments payable to the employer or fraud in the issuance of instruments in the name of the employer. The provision applies regardless of whether the employer is negligent. Proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] governs cases that are covered by present Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision]. It also covers cases in which an entrusted employee forges the employer's signature as an indorsement and some cases not covered by present Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision] in which the entrusted employee makes a forged indorsement to a check drawn by the employer. An example is Case #6 in Comment 3. The latter cases are covered by present Section 3-406 [30-3-406 prior to 1991 revision], and under present law the employer takes the loss only if negligence of the employer can be proved. The proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] imposes the loss on the employer without proof of negligence. The definition of fraudulent indorsement covers the indorsement of the name of the payee on checks issued by the employer. These cases are covered by present Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision]. The result under proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] is similar, but the scope of proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] is somewhat wider. The scope is found in the definition of "responsibility" with respect to instruments, which includes some employees that may not be covered under present Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision]. This definition allows an employer to identify employees for whom the employer is responsible. An employer can insure this risk by bonding such employees.

2. With respect to cases governed by present Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision], proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] is more favorable to employers in one respect. Under present law, the bank is entitled to the preclusion provided by [present] Section 3-405(1)(c) [30-3-405(1)(c) prior to 1991 revision] if it took the check in good faith. The fact that the bank acted negligently does not shift the loss to the bank if the bank was acting in good faith. Under proposed Section 3-405 [30-3-420] part of the loss may be recovered from the bank according to the extent of the failure of the bank to exercise ordinary care.

3. Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)] and Section 3-405 [30-3-420] both apply to cases of employee fraud. Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)] is not limited to cases of employee fraud, but most of the cases to which it applies will be cases of employee fraud. The following cases illustrate the application of Section 3-405 [30-3-420]. In each case it is assumed that the bank that took the check acted in good faith and was not negligent.

Case #1. Janitor, an employee of Employer, breaks into Employer's safe and steals checks payable to Employer. Janitor forges Employer's indorsements on these checks. Since Janitor was not entrusted with "responsibility" with respect to the checks, Section 3-405 [30-3-420] does not make the indorsements effective. Section 3-406 [30-3-406] might apply to this case. The issue would be whether Employer was negligent in safeguarding the checks. If not, Employer could assert that the indorsements were forged and bring an action for conversion under Section 3-420 [30-3-419].

Case #2. X is Treasurer of Corporation and is authorized to write checks on behalf of Corporation by signing X's name as Treasurer. X draws a check in the name of Corporation and signs X's name as Treasurer. The check is payable to X. X then indorses the check and obtains payment. Assume that Corporation did not owe any money to X and did not authorize X to write the check. Although the writing of the check was not authorized, Corporation is bound as drawer of the check because X had authority to sign checks on behalf of Corporation. This result follows from agency law and Section 3-402(a) [30-3-403(1)]. Section 3-405 [30-3-420] is not needed in this case because there is no forged indorsement. X was payee of the check. Section 3-110(a) [30-3-126(1)].

Case #3. The duties of Employee, a bookkeeper, include posting the amounts of checks payable to Employer to the accounts of the drawers of the checks. Employee steals a check payable to Employer and forges Employer's indorsement. The check is deposited by Employee to an account in Depositary Bank which Employee opened in the same name as Employer, and the check is honored by the drawee bank. The indorsement is effective as Employer's indorsement because Employee's duties include processing checks for bookkeeping purposes. Thus, Employee is entrusted with "responsibility" with respect to the check. Neither Depositary Bank nor the drawee bank is liable to Employer for conversion of the check. The same result follows if Employee deposited the check in the account in Depositary Bank without indorsement. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] deposit in a depositary bank in an account in a name substantially similar to that of Employer is the equivalent of an indorsement in the name of Employer.

Case #4. Employee's duties include stamping Employer's unrestricted blank indorsement on checks received by Employer and depositing them in Employer's bank account. After stamping Employer's unrestricted blank indorsement on a check, Employee steals the check and deposits it in Employee's personal bank account. Section 3-405 [30-3-420] doesn't apply because there is no forged indorsement. Employee is authorized by Employer to indorse Employer's checks. The fraud by Employee is not the indorsement but rather the theft of the check. Whether Employer has a cause of action against the bank in which the check was deposited is determined by whether the bank had notice of the breach of fiduciary duty by Employee. The issue is determined under Section 3-307 [30-3-308].

Case #5. The computer that controls Employer's check-writing machine was programmed to cause a check to be issued to Supplier Co. to which money was owed by Employer. The address of Supplier Co. was included in the information in the computer. Employee is an accounts payable clerk whose duties include entering information into the computer. Employee fraudulently changed the address of Supplier Co. in the computer data bank to an address of Employee. The check was subsequently produced by the check-writing machine and mailed to the address that Employee had entered into the computer. Employee obtained possession of the check, indorsed it in the name of Supplier Co, and deposited it to an account in Depositary Bank which Employee opened in the name "Supplier Co." The check was honored by the drawee bank. The indorsement is effective under Section 3-405(b) [30-3-420(2)] because Employee's duties allowed Employee to supply information determining the address of the payee of the check. An employee that has the ability to determine the address to which a check is to be sent controls the disposition of the check and facilitates forgery of the indorsement. The employer is held responsible. The drawee may debit the account of Employer for the amount of the check. There is no breach of warranty by Depositary Bank under Section 3-417(a)(1) [30-3-424(1)(a)].

Case #6. Treasurer is authorized to draw checks in behalf of Corporation. Treasurer draws a check of Corporation payable to Supplier Co., a company that sold goods to Corporation. The check was issued to pay the price of these goods. At the time the check was signed Treasurer had no intention of stealing the check. Later, Treasurer stole the check, indorsed it in the name "Supplier Co." and obtained payment by depositing it to an account in Depositary Bank which Treasurer opened in the name "Supplier Co.". The indorsement is effective under Section 3-405(b) [30-3-420(2)]. Section 3-404(b) [30-3-405(2)] does not apply to this case.

Case #7. Checks of Corporation are signed by Treasurer in behalf of Corporation or drawer. Clerk's duties include the preparation of checks for issue by Corporation. Clerk prepares a check payable to the order of Supplier Co. for Treasurer's signature. Clerk fraudulently informs Treasurer that the check is needed to pay a debt owed to Supplier Co, a company that does business with Corporation. No money is owed to Supplier Co. and Clerk intends to steal the check. Treasurer signs it and returns it to Clerk for mailing. Clerk does not indorse the check but deposits it to an account in Depositary Bank which Clerk opened in the name "Supplier Co.". The check is honored by the drawee bank. Section 3-404(b)(i) [30-3-405(2)(part)] does not apply to this case because Clerk, under Section 3-110(a) [30-3-126(1)], is not the person whose intent determines to whom the check is payable. But Section 3-405 [30-3-420] does apply and it treats the deposit by Clerk as an effective indorsement by Clerk because Clerk was entrusted with responsibility with respect to the check. If Supplier Co. is a fictitious person Section 3-404(b)(ii) [30-3-405(2)(part)] applies. But the result is the same. Clerk's deposit is treated as an effective indorsement of the check whether Supplier Co. is a fictitious or a real person or whether money was or was not owing to Supplier Co. The drawee bank may debit the account of Corporation for the amount of the check and there is no breach of warranty by Depositary Bank under Section 3-417(1)(a) [30-3-424(1)(a)].

4. The last sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is similar to subsection (d) of Section 3-404 [30-3-405(4)] which is discussed in Comment 3 to Section 3-404 [30-3-405]. For example, in Case #5, Case #6, or Case #7 the depositary bank may have failed to exercise ordinary care when it allowed the employee to open an account in the name "Supplier Co." and to deposit checks payable to "Supplier Co." in that account. If the trier of fact finds that there was such a failure and that the failure substantially contributed to loss, it could find the depositary bank liable to the extent the failure contributed to the loss.

Case Notes

Employer Responsible for Employee's Fraudulent Endorsement of Instrument Absent Evidence of Lack of Ordinary Care by Party Taking Instrument for Value — Breach of Warranty Claim Properly Dismissed: Over a 2 ½-year period, one of plaintiff's employees forged signatures on more than 100 company checks and money orders, made them payable to herself, and deposited the proceeds in her personal account at defendant credit union. Plaintiff ultimately filed an action against the credit union, seeking damages in the amount of the checks and money orders and alleging breach of transfer warranties under 30-4-207. After finding that plaintiff produced no evidence to refute the credit union's assertion that the employee was entrusted with responsibility for processing instruments and that the credit union had exercised ordinary care in accepting the instruments for payment, the District Court entered summary judgment for the credit union on the breach of warranty claim. The Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiff was not considered a transferee under the terms of 30-4-207. Plaintiff received no instrument or transfer warranty from the credit union, so plaintiff was not entitled to claim a breach of the warranty against the credit union. Plaintiff was responsible for the employee's actions under this section. Yarbro, Ltd. v. Missoula Fed. Credit Union, 2002 MT 152, 310 M 346, 50 P3d 158 (2002).

30-3-421. Refusal to pay cashier's checks, teller's checks, and certified checks.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-411, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

In some cases a creditor may require that the debt be paid by an obligation of a bank. The debtor may comply by obtaining certification of the debtor's check, but more frequently the debtor buys from a bank a cashier's check or teller's check payable to the creditor. The check is taken by the creditor as a cash equivalent on the assumption that the bank will pay the check. Sometimes, the debtor wants to retract payment by inducing the obligated bank not to pay. That bank is the bank that certifies the debtor's check or the bank from which the debtor bought the cashier's check or teller's check. The typical case involves a dispute between the parties to the transaction in which the check is given in payment. In the case of a certified check or cashier's check, the bank can safely pay the holder of the check despite notice that there may be an adverse claim to the check (Section 3-602 [30-3-603]). It is also clear that the bank that sells a teller's check has no duty to order the bank on which it is drawn not to pay it. A debtor using any of these types of checks has no right to stop payment. Nevertheless, some banks will refuse payment as an accommodation to a customer. Section 3-411 [30-3-421] is designed to discourage this practice.

The term "obligated bank" refers to the issuer of the cashier's check, the acceptor of the certified check, and the drawer of the teller's check. If the obligated bank wrongfully refuses to pay, it is liable to pay for expenses and loss of interest resulting from the refusal to pay. There is no express provision for attorney's fees, but attorney's fees are not meant to be necessarily excluded. They could be granted because they fit within the language "expenses . . . resulting from the nonpayment." In addition the bank may be liable to pay consequential damages if it has notice of the particular circumstances giving rise to the damages.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] provides that expenses or consequential damages are not recoverable if the refusal to pay is because of the reasons stated. The purpose is to limit that recovery to cases in which the bank refuses to pay even though its obligation to pay is clear and it is able to pay. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies only if the refusal to honor the check is wrongful. If the bank is not obliged to pay there is no recovery. The bank may assert any claim or defense that it has, but normally the bank would not have a claim or defense. In the usual case it is a remitter that is asserting a claim to the check on the basis of a rescission of negotiation to the payee under Section 3-202 [30-3-209]. See Section 3-201(a) [30-3-202(1)] and Comment to Section 3-201 [30-3-202]. The bank can assert that claim if there is compliance with Section 3-305(c) [30-3-305(3)], but the bank is not protected from damages under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] if the claim of the remitter is not upheld. In that case, the bank is insulated from damages only if payment is enjoined under Section 3-603(b)(1) [30-3-604(2)(a)]. Subsection (c)(iii) [subsection (3)(c) of this section] refers to cases in which the bank may have a reasonable doubt about the identity of the person demanding payment. For example, a cashier's check is payable to "Supplier Co." The person in possession of the check presents it for payment over the counter and claims to be an officer of Supplier Co. The bank may refuse payment until it has been given adequate proof that the presentment in fact is being made for Supplier Co., the person entitled to enforce the check.

30-3-422. Obligation of acceptor.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-413, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is consistent with present Section 3-413(1) [30-3-413(1) prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] has primary importance with respect to certified checks. It protects the holder in due course of a certified check that was altered after certification and before negotiation to the holder in due course. A bank can avoid liability for the altered amount by stating on the check the amount the bank agrees to pay. The subsection applies to other accepted drafts as well.

30-3-423. Obligation of drawer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-414, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] relates to the obligation of the drawer on an unaccepted draft. It replaces present Section 3-413(2) [30-3-413(2) prior to 1991 revision]. The requirement in present law of notice of dishonor or protest has been eliminated. Notice of dishonor is necessary only with respect to indorser's liability. The liability of the drawer of an unaccepted draft is treated as a primary liability. The effect of a draft drawn without recourse is stated in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section].

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] relieves the drawer of liability on a draft accepted before or after issue or negotiation of the draft if the acceptor is a bank. This changes present law. Under present Section 3-411(1) [30-3-411, now repealed] the drawer is discharged only if the holder obtains certification. Holders that have a bank obligation do not normally rely on the drawer to guarantee the bank's solvency. A holder can obtain protection against the insolvency of a bank acceptor by a specific guaranty of payment by the drawer or by obtaining an indorsement by the drawer. See Section 3-205(d) [30-3-204(4)].

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] concerns the liability of the drawer if a draft is accepted by a drawee other than a bank and the acceptor dishonors. The drawer of an unaccepted draft is the party primarily liable on the instrument. The drawee has no liability on the draft. When the draft is accepted, the obligations change. The drawee, as acceptor, becomes primarily liable and the drawer's liability is that of a person secondarily liable. The drawer's liability is identical to that of an indorser, and subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] states the drawer's liability that way. The drawer is liable to pay the person entitled to enforce the draft or any indorser that pays pursuant to Section 3-415 [30-3-414]. The drawer in this case is discharged if notice of dishonor is required by Section 3-503 [30-3-508] and is not given in compliance with that section. A drawer that pays has a right of recourse against the acceptor. Section 3-413(a) [30-3-422(1)].

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] does not permit the drawer of a check to avoid liability under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] by drawing the check without recourse. There is no legitimate purpose served by issuing a check on which nobody is liable. Drawing without recourse is effective to disclaim liability of the drawer if the draft is not a check. For example, in a documentary sale, Seller draws a draft on Buyer for the price of goods shipped to Buyer. The draft is payable upon delivery of an order bill of lading covering the goods. Seller delivers the draft with the bill of lading to Finance Company that is named as payee of the draft. If Seller draws without recourse Finance Company takes the risk that Buyer will dishonor. If Buyer dishonors, Finance Company has no recourse against Seller but it can obtain reimbursement by selling the goods which it controls through the bill of lading.

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] is derived from present Section 3-502(1)(b) [30-3-502, now repealed]. It is designed to protect the drawer of a check against loss resulting from suspension of payments by the drawee bank when the holder of the check delays collection of the check. For example, X writes a check payable to Y for $1,000. The check is covered by funds in X's account in the drawee bank. Y delays initiation of collection of the check for more than 30 days after the date of the check. The drawee bank suspends payments after the 30-day period and before the check is presented for payment. If the $1,000 of funds in X's account have not been withdrawn, X has a claim for those funds against the drawee bank and, if subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] were not in effect, X would be liable to Y on the check because the check was dishonored. Section 3-502(e) [30-3-512(5)]. If the suspension of payments by the drawee bank will result in payment to X of less than the full amount of the $1,000 in the account or if there is a significant delay in payment to X, X will suffer a loss which would not have been suffered if Y had promptly initiated collection of the check. In most cases, X will not suffer any loss because of the existence of federal bank deposit insurance that covers accounts up to $100,000. Thus, subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] has relatively little importance. There might be some cases, however, in which the account is not fully insured because it exceeds $100,000 or because the account doesn't qualify for deposit insurance. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] retains the phrase "deprived of funds maintained with the drawee" appearing in present Section 3-502(1)(b) [30-3-502, now repealed]. The quoted phrase applies if the suspension of payments by the drawee prevents the drawer from receiving the benefit of funds which would have paid the check if the holder had been timely in initiating collection. Thus, any significant delay in obtaining full payment of the funds is a deprivation of funds. The drawer can discharge drawer's liability by assigning rights against the drawee with respect to the funds to the holder.

30-3-424. Presentment warranties.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-417, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section replaces subsection (1) of present Section 3-417 [30-3-417(1) prior to 1991 revision]. The present provision is difficult to understand because it purports to state in one subsection all warranties given to any person paying any instrument. The result is a provision that is replete with exceptions that cannot be readily understood except after close scrutiny of the language. Proposed Section 3-417 [30-3-424] covers presentment warranties made to the drawee of an unaccepted draft, to the acceptor of an accepted draft and to the maker of a note. Warranties made to drawees of uncertified checks and other unaccepted drafts are covered in subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section].

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states three warranties. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] in effect is a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing indorsements. "Person entitled to enforce" is defined in Section 3-301 [30-3-301]. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] is a warranty that there is no alteration. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] is a warranty of no knowledge that there is a forged drawer's signature. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states that the warranties are made to the drawee and subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3) of this section] identify the drawee as the person entitled to recover for breach of warranty. There is no warranty made to the drawer under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] when presentment is made to the drawee. Warranty to the drawer is governed by subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] and that applies only when presentment for payment is made to the drawer with respect to a dishonored draft. In Sun 'N Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank, 582 P.2d 920 (Cal. 1978), the court held that a warranty is made to the drawer of a check when the check is presented to the drawee for payment. The result in this case is rejected by Section 3-417 [30-3-424].

3. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] retains the rule that the drawee does not admit the authenticity of indorsements and subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] retains the rule of Price v. Neal, 3 Burr. 1354 (1762), that the drawee takes the risk that the drawer's signature is unauthorized unless the person presenting the draft has knowledge that the drawer's signature is unauthorized. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] the warranty of no knowledge that the drawer's signature is unauthorized is also given by prior transferors of the draft.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] applies to presentment for payment in all cases not covered by subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. It applies to presentment of notes and accepted drafts to any party obliged to pay the instrument, including an indorser, and to presentment of dishonored drafts if made to the drawer or an indorser. In cases covered by subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section], there is only one warranty and it is the same as that stated in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. There are no warranties comparable to subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) [subsections (1)(b) and (1)(c) of this section] because they are appropriate only in the case of presentment to the drawee. If presentment is made to the drawer or maker, there is no necessity for a warranty concerning the signature of that person or with respect to alteration. If presentment is made to an indorser, the indorser had itself warranted authenticity of signatures and that the instrument was not altered. Section 3-416(a)(2) and (3) [30-3-417(1)(b) and (1)(c)].

5. The measure of damages for breach of warranty under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. There is no express provision for attorney's fees, but attorney's fees are not meant to be necessarily excluded. They could be granted because they fit within the language "expenses . . . resulting from the breach." See Comment 2 to Section 3-416 [30-3-417]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] provides that the right of the drawee to recover for breach of warranty is not affected by a failure of the drawee to exercise ordinary care in paying the draft. This provision follows the result reached in Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. v. First Pennsylvania Bank, 859 F.2d 295 (3d Cir. 1988).

6. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies to checks and other unaccepted drafts. It gives to the warrantor the benefit of rights that the drawee has against the drawer under Section 3-404 [30-3-405], Section 3-405 [30-3-420], Section 3-406 [30-3-406], and Section 4-406 [30-4-406]. If the drawer's conduct contributed to a loss from forgery or alteration, the drawee should not be allowed to shift the loss to the warrantor.

7. The first sentence of subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] recognizes that checks are normally paid by automated means and that payor banks rely on warranties in making payment. Thus, it is not appropriate to allow disclaimer of warranties appearing on checks that normally will not be examined by the payor bank. The second sentence requires a breach of warranty claim to be asserted within 30 days after the drawee learns of the breach and the identity of the warrantor.

Official Comment:

1. This section covers payment or acceptance by mistake and replaces present Section 3-417 [30-3-417 prior to 1991 revision]. Under present law, the remedy of a drawee that pays or accepts a draft by mistake is based on the law of mistake and restitution which is referred to in Section 1-103 [30-1-103]. Present Section 3-418 [30-3-418, now repealed] is simply a limitation on this right of restitution which is not specifically stated in present Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision]. Proposed Section 3-418 [30-3-425] specifically states the right of restitution in subsection (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies to the most common cases in which the problem is presented. It covers payment or acceptance of forged checks, insufficient funds checks and checks on which the drawer has stopped payment. If the drawee acted under a mistaken belief that the check was not forged, had not been stopped or was not an insufficient funds check, the drawee is entitled to recover the funds paid or to revoke the acceptance whether or not the drawee acted negligently. But in each case, by virtue of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section], the drawee loses the remedy if the person receiving payment or acceptance was a person who took the check in good faith and for value. Subsection (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3) of this section] are consistent with present Section 3-418 [30-3-418, now repealed] and incorporate the rule of Price v. Neal. The result in the three cases covered by subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is that the drawee in most cases will not have a remedy against the person paid because there is usually a person who took the check in good faith and for value.

The remedy of a drawee to recover funds paid on bad checks is principally found in Section 3-417 [30-3-424]. The drawee wins in forged indorsement cases (Section 3-417(a)(1) [30-3-424(1)(a)]) and in alteration cases (Section 3-417(a)(2) [30-3-424(1)(b)]) and loses in forged check cases unless the warrantor had knowledge of the forgery (Section 3-417(a)(3) [30-3-424(1)(c)]). Insufficient funds cases are of three types:

Case #1. The check is not covered by a credit balance in the customer's account and the drawee paid the check intending to honor an overdraft. This case is not covered by Section 3-418 [30-3-425] because no mistake was made by the drawee. The drawee intended to give credit to the drawer.

Case #2. The check is not covered by a credit balance and the check was paid because the bank neglected to verify the balance before paying. This case is covered by Section 3-418 [30-3-425].

Case #3. The check is covered by a credit balance but the balance does not represent funds that are available for withdrawal by the drawer under applicable law. Section 3-418 [30-3-425] applies if the bank mistakenly believed that the credit balance represented available funds. But if the check was covered by a credit balance available for withdrawal by the customer, Section 3-418 [30-3-425] doesn't apply even if the bank learns at a later date that the credit balance was subject to a charge-back because of a returned item. In that case there was no mistake of fact. The funds were available for withdrawal. The only remedy of the drawee bank is to recover from the drawer of the check by charge-back or otherwise.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] covers cases of payment or acceptance by mistake that are not covered by subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. It directs courts to deal with those cases under the law governing mistake and restitution. This subsection is also subject to subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section].

3. The right of the drawee to recover a payment or to revoke an acceptance under Section 3-418 [30-3-425] is not affected by the rules under Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] that determine when an item is paid. Even though a payor bank may have paid an item under proposed Section 4-215 [30-4-213], it may have a right to recover the payment under Section 3-418 [30-3-425]. National Savings & Trust Co. v. Park Corp. 722 F.2d 1303 (6th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 466 U.S. 939 (1984), correctly states the present law on the issue.

Part 5
Presentment, Notice of Dishonor, and Protest

Part Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Supply of Presentment Date by Holder: The holder of a 160-day sight draft may supply a date of presentment when the drawee fails to provide his written acceptance or date thereof. Thus, the holder of the draft could in good faith treat the date on which the collecting bank acknowledged receipt of the draft as the date of acceptance and could properly treat the draft as dishonored when payment was received 162 days after the date the draft was received from the bank. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Interest Coupons in Effect Promissory Notes: Interest coupons are in effect promissory notes, and as to such commercial paper laches of the holder in failure promptly to make presentment for payment does not discharge the maker (in the instant case the district issuing the coupon bonds) from liability thereon; the maker (district) is primarily liable and presentment is unnecessary to preserve such liability. J. K. & C. S. Mullen Benev. Corp. v. School District, 99 M 388, 43 P2d 902 (1935).

Successive Endorsements: In an action against the drawer of a check to recover thereon, defendant pleading payment by reason of the delay of plaintiff in presenting it before the bank on which drawn closed its doors, the rule is that transfers to successive endorsees do not extend the time within which it must be presented, so far as defendant drawer is concerned, which, under section 55-1703, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is within a reasonable time after its issue. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Wrongful Refusal by Drawee to Pay: Under section 55-1703, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), the drawer of a check is discharged from liability thereon for delay in presenting it for payment only "to the extent of the loss caused by the delay"; hence where the endorsee of a check, drawn on a bank in another town, immediately upon its receipt 3 days after its issuance, mailed it to his bank, which in turn on the same day mailed it to the bank upon which drawn, which, while paying checks presented over the counter, refused to pay check presented by mail, of which fact the endorsee was ignorant, the loss sustained by the drawer was due to the wrongful act of the drawee bank and not to delay in presenting the check for payment. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Maker's Liability Regardless of Presentment:

Demand upon the maker of a promissory note for payment or presentment to him, is not necessary before action against him thereon. Barrett v. Morton, 137 M 190, 351 P2d 601 (1960); Quickenden v. Hubert, 83 M 501, 272 P 994 (1928).

In an action to enforce a note against the maker, it is not necessary to prove presentment for payment; it is only persons secondarily liable that the law has reference to in specifying the time and manner in which presentment must be made, and, unless the Statute of Limitations bars a demand against the maker, he cannot say it was not made in time. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

Presentment for payment is not necessary to charge the makers of a demand note payable at a particular place. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

Delay in Giving Notice: The general rule is that unless the drawer of a check has sustained loss or damage by reason of delay in giving notice of dishonor or nonpayment, such delay is of no consequence; hence where, even if timely notice had been given, it could not have reached him and therefore not aided him in preventing loss, the delay was immaterial. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Loss Required to Discharge Drawer: A check must be presented for payment within a reasonable time after its issuance, or the drawer will be discharged from liability thereon to the extent of the loss caused by the delay, but this result follows only on a showing of loss or injury by reason of delay. Blackwelder v. Fergus Motor Co., 80 M 374, 260 P 734 (1927).

Repeal of Prior Law: The effect of the repeal of section 5923, Revised Codes of 1907, by Ch. 82, L. 1909, which section provided that presentment of instrument payable at a bank must be made during banking hours, and substituting therefor section 55-706, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which made no reference to the time when presentment must be made, was to make presentment for payment at any time proper, whether during banking hours or not. Clarke v. Nat'l Bank of Mont., 78 M 48, 252 P 373 (1926).

Failure to Prove Presentment: Where plaintiff in an action against the endorser of a promissory note contented himself with introducing the note in evidence, failing to show that defendant's liability had been fixed by presentment to and demand of payment thereof from the maker and notice of nonpayment to defendant, or facts excusing presentment, demand and notice, or a waiver thereof by defendant, judgment for defendant was proper. Morgan v. Huffman, 76 M 396, 247 P 326 (1926).

Re-Presentment After Dishonor: Where the Board of County Commissioners had wrongfully refused to issue an order for the payment of a warrant not represented for payment until after the 60-day period provided for in section 16-2609, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), had expired, and thereafter the bank in which its funds were deposited became insolvent, the county was not discharged from liability thereon under this section by the holder's neglect to make timely demand for payment, since the detriment suffered by it was traceable to its improper refusal and not to the holder's failure to act. State ex rel. Case v. Bolles, 74 M 54, 238 P 586 (1925).

Presentment to Bank Where Payable: Sending of a check direct to the drawee bank by a Federal Reserve Bank is a good presentment. Jensen v. Laurel Meat Co., 71 M 582, 230 P 1081 (1924).

Demand Note: The provision of section 55-701, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), that where a note is by its terms payable at a special place, and the maker is able and willing to pay it there at maturity, such ability and willingness are equivalent to a tender of payment by him, has no application to a demand note. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

"Maturity" Defined: "Maturity" of a note, within the meaning of section 55-701, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is the time when a note or bill becomes due. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

Purpose of Presentment: Section 55-701, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), defined the purpose of presentment, and was not modified by subsequent sections. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918).

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] restates present Section 3-504(1) [30-3-504(1) prior to 1991 revision]. Proposed Section 3-502 [30-3-512] states when presentment is a condition to dishonor. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] states the place and manner of presentment. Electronic presentment is authorized. The communication of the demand for payment or acceptance is effective when received. Subsection (b)(2)(ii), (iii), and (iv) [subsections (2)(b)(ii) through (2)(b)(iv) of this section] restate present Section 3-505 [30-3-505, now repealed]. Subsection (b)(2)(ii) [subsection (2)(b)(ii) of this section] allows the person to whom presentment is made to require exhibition of the instrument, unless the parties have agreed otherwise as in an electronic presentment agreement. Present Section 3-507(3) [30-3-507, now repealed] is the antecedent of subsection (b)(2)(v) [subsection (2)(b)(v) of this section]. Since a payor must decide whether to pay or accept on the day of presentment, subsection (b)(2)(i) [subsection (2)(b)(i) of this section] allows the payor to set a cut-off hour for receipt of instruments presented.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "How presentment made. (1) Presentment is a demand for acceptance or payment made upon the maker, acceptor, drawee or other payor by or on behalf of the holder.

(2) Presentment may be made:

(a) by mail, in which event the time of presentment is determined by the time of receipt of the mail; or

(b) through a clearinghouse; or

(c) at the place of acceptance or payment specified in the instrument or if there be none at the place of business or residence of the party to accept or pay. If neither the party to accept or pay nor anyone authorized to act for him is present or accessible at such place presentment is excused.

(3) It may be made:

(a) to any one of two or more makers, acceptors, drawees or other payors; or

(b) to any person who has authority to make or refuse the acceptance or payment.

(4) A draft accepted or a note made payable at a bank in the United States must be presented at such bank.

(5) In the cases described in 30-4-210 presentment may be made in the manner and with the result stated in that section."

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

"Demand Item" and "Presentment" Construed — Waiver of Midnight Deadline Rule: When defendant's, Nuernberger's, check was twice refused and returned for insufficient funds by the payor bank, First Bank of Billings (First Bank), an officer of the joint payee, Montana Livestock Production Credit Association (MLPCA) returned the check to First Bank with a written memo authorizing First Bank to "hold it for longer than the usual 24-hour period" and to pay when funds became available. The District Court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff (the other joint payee) and MLPCA and found First Bank strictly liable for the face amount of the check because of its failure to comply with the midnight deadline rule. The Supreme Court reversed and found that the midnight deadline rule did not apply, holding that the check was not a "demand item" because it was transmitted with the understanding it would be held for sufficient funds and that there had been no "presentment" by the plaintiff, but only by the joint payee, MLPCA. The Supreme Court further held that there had been a waiver of the midnight rule time requirements by MLPCA's memo. Iverson v. First Bank of Billings, 219 M 283, 712 P2d 1285, 42 St. Rep. 2021 (1985).

Supply of Presentment Date by Holder: The holder of a 160-day sight draft may supply a date of presentment when the drawee fails to provide his written acceptance or date thereof. Thus, the holder of the draft could in good faith treat the date on which the collecting bank acknowledged receipt of the draft as the date of acceptance and could properly treat the draft as dishonored when payment was received 162 days after the date the draft was received from the bank. Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 90 through 108, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is based on present Section 3-501(2)(a) [30-3-501, now repealed]. However, as explained in Comment 1 to Section 3-414 [30-3-423], notice of dishonor is no longer relevant to the liability of a drawer except for the case of a draft accepted by an acceptor other than a bank. There is no reason why drawers should be discharged on instruments they draw until payment or acceptance. They are entitled to have the instrument presented to the drawee and dishonored (Section 3-414(1) [30-3-423(1)]) before they are liable to pay, but no formal notice of dishonor need be made to them as a condition of liability. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], which states how notice of dishonor is given, is based on present Section 3-508(3) [30-3-508(3) prior to 1991 revision].

2. The second sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is based on present Section 3-508(2) [30-3-508(2) prior to 1991 revision]. It differs from that section in that it provides a longer time for a person who is not a collecting bank to give notice of dishonor than the three-day period allowed in the present statute. Delay in giving notice of dishonor may be excused under Section 3-504(d) [30-3-513(4)].

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) Notice of dishonor may be given to any person who may be liable on the instrument by or on behalf of the holder or any party who has himself received notice, or any other party who can be compelled to pay the instrument. In addition an agent or bank in whose hands the instrument is dishonored may give notice to his principal or customer or to another agent or bank from which the instrument was received.

(2) Any necessary notice must be given by a bank before its midnight deadline and by any other person before midnight of the third business day after dishonor or receipt of notice of dishonor.

(3) Notice may be given in any reasonable manner. It may be oral or written and in any terms which identify the instrument and state that it has been dishonored. A misdescription which does not mislead the party notified does not vitiate the notice. Sending the instrument bearing a stamp, ticket or writing stating that acceptance or payment has been refused or sending a notice of debit with respect to the instrument is sufficient.

(4) Written notice is given when sent although it is not received.

(5) Notice to one partner is notice to each although the firm has been dissolved.

(6) When any party is in insolvency proceedings instituted after the issue of the instrument notice may be given either to the party or to the representative of his estate.

(7) When any party is dead or incompetent notice may be sent to his last known address or given to his personal representative.

(8) Notice operates for the benefit of all parties who have rights on the instrument against the party notified."

Oral Notice of Dishonor Insufficient Under Circumstances: Oral notice of dishonor of check was insufficient to release payor bank from strict liability rule under 30-4-302 where bank president told payee that, although it would take time, checks would clear because things were looking better but checks were never paid and bank made withdrawals from drawer's account to apply against loans not in default. Drawer's Whereabouts Unknown: Under sections 55-824 and 55-825, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), where the drawer of a check was out of the state at the time of its dishonor and despite the efforts of the holder to ascertain his whereabouts could not be reached until the bank upon which drawn had closed its doors, a finding exculpating the holder for failure to give notice sooner was warranted. Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Protest is no longer mandatory but must be requested by the holder. Even if requested, protest is not a condition to the liability of indorsers or drawers. Protest is a service provided by the banking system to establish that dishonor has occurred. Like other services provided by the banking system, it will be available if market incentives, interbank agreements, or governmental regulations require it, but liabilities of parties no longer rest on it.

Promissory Note — Undue Influence in Making: A promissory note was executed to appellant by the deceased with whom he had a close confidential relationship. The decedent's age caused her to rely quite heavily on appellant in running her farm and made her more susceptible to his influence. The amount of the note was also quite large in relation to the alleged consideration. Under the five-factor test enumerated in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), there was substantial evidence to support a finding of undue influence in the creation of the note. Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

30-3-512. Dishonor.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-502, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Section 3-415 [30-3-414] provides that indorsers are obliged to pay an instrument if the instrument is dishonored and are discharged if they are entitled to notice of dishonor and notice is not given. Under Section 3-414 [30-3-423], the drawer is obliged to pay an unaccepted draft if it is dishonored. The drawer, however, is not entitled to notice of dishonor except to the extent required in a case governed by Section 3-414(c) [30-3-423(3)]. Part 5 tells when an instrument is dishonored (Section 3-502 [30-3-512]) and what it means to give notice of dishonor (Section 3-503 [30-3-508]). Often dishonor does not occur until presentment (Section 3-501 [30-3-504]), and frequently presentment and notice of dishonor are excused (Section 3-504 [30-3-513]).

2. In the great majority of cases presentment and notice of dishonor are waived with respect to notes. In most cases a formal demand for payment from the maker of the note is not contemplated. Rather, the maker is expected to send payment to the holder of the note on the date or dates on which payment is due. If payment is not made when due, the holder usually makes a demand for payment, but in the normal case in which presentment is waived, demand is irrelevant and the holder can proceed against indorsers when payment is not received. In the small minority of cases in which presentment and dishonor are not waived with respect to notes, the present law discharges the indorser from liability (proposed Section 3-502(1)(a) [30-3-512(1)(a)]) unless the holder makes formal presentment to the maker on the exact day the note is due (proposed Section 3-503(1)(c) [30-3-508(1)(c)]) and gives notice of dishonor to the indorser before midnight of the third business day after dishonor (proposed Section 3-508(2) [30-3-508(2)]).

The present procedure is unnecessarily technical and outmoded. Proposed Section 3-502 [30-3-512] is a change in the law that would recognize and accommodate modern methods of doing business. Under both present Section 3-413 [30-3-413 prior to 1991 revision] and proposed Section 3-412 [30-3-413], the obligation of the maker of a note to pay the note does not depend upon presentment and dishonor. Moreover, there is no reason to require a formal presentment to the maker to hold the indorser unless the note is payable on demand, presentment is required by the terms of the note, or the note is payable at or through a bank.

3. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies to notes. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] applies to notes payable on demand. Dishonor requires presentment, and dishonor occurs if payment is not made on the day of presentment. There is no change in present law. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section] applies to notes payable at a definite time if the note is payable at or through a bank or, by its terms, presentment is required. Dishonor requires presentment and dishonor occurs if payment is not made on the due date or the day of presentment if presentment is made after the due date. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] applies to all other notes. If the note is not paid on its due date it is dishonored. This allows holders to collect notes in ways that make sense commercially without having to be concerned about a formal presentment on a given day.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies to unaccepted drafts other than documentary drafts. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] applies to checks. Except for checks presented for immediate payment over the counter, which are covered by subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section], dishonor occurs according to rules stated in Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4]. When a check is presented for payment through the check-collection system, the drawee bank normally makes a provisional settlement, i.e. provisional payment, for the amount of the check to the presenting bank. Under Section 4-301 [30-4-301] the drawee bank may revoke this settlement if it returns the check within its midnight deadline (Section 4-104 [30-4-104]). In that case the check is not paid and dishonor occurs under Section 3-502(b)(1) [30-3-512(2)(a)]. If the drawee bank does not return the check or give notice of dishonor or nonpayment within the midnight deadline, the provisional settlement becomes final payment of the check. Section 4-215 [30-4-213]. Thus, no dishonor occurs regardless of whether the check is retained or is returned after the midnight deadline. In some cases the drawee bank might not settle for the check when it is received. Under Section 4-302 [30-4-302] if the drawee bank retains the check without settling for it beyond midnight of the day it is presented for payment, the bank becomes "accountable" for the amount of the check, i.e. it is obliged to pay the amount of the check. In this case the check has not been paid and, under Section 3-502(b)(1) [30-3-512(2)(a)], the check is dishonored. The fact that the bank is obliged to pay the check does not mean that the check has been paid. When a check is presented for payment, the person presenting the check is entitled to payment not just the obligation of the drawee to pay. Until that payment is made, the check is dishonored. To say that the drawee bank is obliged to pay the check necessarily means that the check has not been paid. If the check is eventually paid, the drawee bank no longer is accountable.

Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] applies to demand drafts other than those governed by subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. It covers checks presented for immediate payment over the counter and demand drafts other than checks. Dishonor occurs if presentment for payment is made and payment is not made on the day of presentment.

Subsection (b)(3) and (4) [subsections (2)(c) and (2)(d) of this section] applies to time drafts. An unaccepted time draft differs from a time note. The maker of a note knows that the note has been issued, but the drawee of a draft may not know that a draft has been drawn on it. Thus, with respect to drafts, presentment for payment or acceptance is required. Subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] applies to drafts payable on a date stated in the draft. Dishonor occurs if presentment for payment is made and payment is not made on the day the draft becomes payable or the day of presentment if presentment is made after the due date. The holder of an unaccepted draft payable on a stated date has the option of presenting the draft for acceptance before the day the draft becomes payable to establish whether the drawee is willing to assume liability by accepting. Under subsection (b)(3)(ii) [subsection (2)(c)(ii) of this section] dishonor occurs when the draft is presented and not accepted. Subsection (b)(4) [subsection (2)(d) of this section] applies to unaccepted drafts payable on elapse of a period of time after sight or acceptance. If the draft is payable 30 days after sight, the draft must be presented for acceptance to start the running of the 30-day period. Dishonor occurs if it is not accepted. The rules in subsection (b)(3) and (4) [subsections (2)(c) and (2)(d) of this section] follow present Section 3-501(1)(a) [30-3-501, now repealed].

5. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] gives drawees an extended period to pay documentary drafts because of the time that may be needed to examine the documents. The period prescribed is that given by Section 5-112 [30-5-112, now repealed] in cases in which a letter of credit is involved.

6. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] governs accepted drafts. If the acceptor's obligation is to pay on demand the rule, stated in subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a) of this section], [i]s the same as for that of a demand note stated in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. If the acceptor's obligation is to pay at a definite time the rule, stated in subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b) of this section], is the same as that of a time note payable at a bank stated in subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section].

7. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] is a limitation on subsection (a)(1) and (2), subsection (b), subsection (c), and subsection (d) [subsections (1)(a), (1)(b), and (2) through (4) of this section]. Each of those provisions states dishonor as occurring after presentment. If presentment is excused under Section 3-504 [30-3-513], dishonor occurs under those provisions without presentment if the instrument is not duly accepted or paid.

8. Under subsection (b)(3)(ii) and (4) [subsections (2)(c)(ii) and (2)(d) of this section] if a draft is presented for acceptance and the draft is not accepted on the day of presentment, there is dishonor. But after dishonor, the holder may consent to late acceptance. In that case, under subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section], the late acceptance cures the dishonor. The draft is treated as never having been dishonored. If the draft is subsequently presented for payment and payment is refused dishonor occurs at that time.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Dishonor of Sight Draft — Absence of Date of Acceptance: When the holder of a 160-day sight draft, upon which the drawee had failed to provide written acceptance or date thereof, supplied a date of presentment as provided under 30-3-410, the payee was entitled to treat the draft as dishonored when he did not receive payment within 160 days of the date he had supplied. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

Promissory Note — Undue Influence in Making: A promissory note was executed to appellant by the deceased with whom he had a close confidential relationship. The decedent's age caused her to rely quite heavily on appellant in running her farm and made her more susceptible to his influence. The amount of the note was also quite large in relation to the alleged consideration. Under the five-factor test enumerated in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), there was substantial evidence to support a finding of undue influence in the creation of the note. Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Official Comment:

Section 3-504 [30-3-513] is largely a restatement of present Section 3-511 [30-3-511, now repealed]. Subsection (4) of present Section 3-511 [30-3-511, now repealed] is found in proposed Section 3-502(f) [30-3-512(6)].

Applicability: Subsection (4) does not apply to demand items. Payor bank was not excused from failure to comply with "midnight deadline" rule of 30-4-302 by subsection (4) of this section where checks presented by payees were demand items. Sun River Cattle Co., Inc. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 237, 521 P2d 679 (1974).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Burden of Proof: In the absence of proof showing the length of time for which the check in this action was held by the bank upon which drawn before returning it dishonored, the contention of defendant drawer that the bank having held it for more than 24 hours, his obligation thereon was discharged under section 55-1106, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), may not be sustained; the burden of proving payment in this manner having been upon him. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Drawer's Whereabouts Unknown: Under sections 55-824 and 55-825, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), where the drawer of a check was out of the state at the time of its dishonor and despite efforts of the holder to ascertain his whereabouts could not be reached until the bank upon which drawn had closed its doors, a finding exculpating the holder for failure to give notice sooner was warranted. Cellars v. Dwinnell, 87 M 73, 285 P 181 (1930).

Application to Checks: The provisions of sections 55-1105 and 55-1106, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), that the drawee of a bill of exchange is allowed 24 hours after presentment in which to decide whether he will or will not accept it, and will be deemed to have accepted it if he fails to return it within that time, are applicable to a check which, under section 55-1702, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is declared to be a bill of exchange drawn on a bank. Blackwelder v. Fergus Motor Co., 80 M 374, 260 P 734 (1927); Clarke v. Nat'l Bank of Mont., 78 M 48, 252 P 373 (1926).

Payment of Interest: Payment of interest by an endorser after maturity waives notice of dishonor. Morgan v. Huffman, 76 M 396, 247 P 326 (1926).

Discharge

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] restates subsections (1) and (2) of present Section 3-601 [30-3-601(1) and (2) prior to 1991 revision]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] restates present Section 3-602 [30-3-602, now repealed]. Notice of discharge is not treated as notice of a defense that prevents holder in due course status. Section 3-302(b) [30-3-302(2)]. Discharge is effective against a holder in due course only if the holder had notice of the discharge when holder in due course status was acquired. For example, if an instrument bearing a canceled indorsement is taken by a holder, the holder has notice that the indorser has been discharged. Thus, the discharge is effective against the holder even if the holder is a holder in due course.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Discharge of parties. (1) The extent of the discharge of any party from liability on an instrument is governed by the sections on:

(a) payment or satisfaction (30-3-603); or
(b) tender of payment (30-3-604); or
(c) cancellation or renunciation (30-3-605); or
(d) impairment of right of recourse or of collateral (30-3-606); or
(e) reacquisition of the instrument by a prior party (30-3-208); or
(f) fraudulent and material alteration (30-3-407); or
(g) certification of a check (30-3-411); or
(h) acceptance varying a draft (30-3-412); or
(i) unexcused delay in presentment or notice of dishonor or protest (30-3-502).

(2) Any party is also discharged from his liability on an instrument to another party by any other act or agreement with such party which would discharge his simple contract for the payment of money.

(3) The liability of all parties is discharged when any party who has himself no right of action or recourse on the instrument:

(a) reacquires the instrument in his own right; or

(b) is discharged under any provision of this chapter, except as otherwise provided with respect to discharge for impairment of recourse or of collateral (30-3-606)."

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Exoneration by Death of Surety: Where deceased had previously cosigned a promissory note for the purpose of lending his name to another party, he became an accommodation maker. As such he is primarily responsible for the payment of the note, without necessity of resort to the principal, and it was error for the District Court to disallow the holder's claim against the deceased's estate. In re Estate of Harbaugh, 196 M 274, 639 P2d 495, 39 St. Rep. 84 (1982).

Existing Indebtedness: The execution of new notes and mortgage security therefor on surrender and cancellation of the first notes does not extinguish the existing indebtedness, and the only effect thereon is to extend the time of payment. White v. Hulls, 59 M 98, 195 P 850 (1921).

Construction: Section 55-901, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), relates only to a discharge of the instrument and not to a discharge of the parties. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Check or Draft: A check is merely an order for money, and in the absence of any agreement to the contrary its acceptance in discharge of an indebtedness is conditioned upon its payment. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918). See also Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Hess, 85 M 293, 279 P 236 (1929).

Renewal Instrument: The giving of a renewal note does not operate as a payment or discharge in the absence of an agreement to that effect. Stamping the note "paid" does not change this rule. First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597, 9 ALR 1139 (1918).

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 51, 88, 119, 121 and 171-177, Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

This section is based on present Section 3-603(1) [30-3-603(1) prior to 1991 revision]. "Claims to an instrument" is defined in Section 3-306 [30-3-306] to mean a claim of ownership or possession and not a claim in recoupment. Subsection (b)(1)(ii) [subsection (2)(a)(ii) of this section] is added to conform to Section 3-411 [30-3-421]. Payment of a cashier's check, teller's check, or certified check discharges the obligor even though indemnity has been given by the person asserting the claim. The obligor is not discharged if payment is made in violation of an injunction against payment.

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "Payment or satisfaction. (1) The liability of any party is discharged to the extent of his payment or satisfaction to the holder even though it is made with knowledge of a claim of another person to the instrument unless prior to such payment or satisfaction the person making the claim either supplies indemnity deemed adequate by the party seeking the discharge or enjoins payment or satisfaction by order of a court of competent jurisdiction in an action in which the adverse claimant and the holder are parties. This subsection does not, however, result in the discharge of the liability:

(a) of a party who in bad faith pays or satisfies a holder who acquired the instrument by theft or who (unless having the rights of a holder in due course) holds through one who so acquired it; or

(b) of a party (other than an intermediary bank or a payor bank which is not a depositary bank) who pays or satisfies the holder of an instrument which has been restrictively endorsed in a manner not consistent with the terms of such restrictive endorsement.

(2) Payment or satisfaction may be made with the consent of the holder by any person including a stranger to the instrument. Surrender of the instrument to such a person gives him the rights of a transferee (30-3-201)."

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Foreclosure of Mortgage Securing Note — Payment to Holder Required: The Dahls executed a note to Sythe and also executed a real estate mortgage in Sythe's favor. The note was placed in an escrow account in the Culbertson State Bank, and the bank was designated as the place where payment was to be made. Sythe assigned the note to the bank as security for a note obtained by him. Sythe later gave the bank a written assignment of the mortgage. Defendant Dahl was given written notice of this assignment. The bank did not receive any payments from Sythe on his notes or from Dahl on the note assigned to the bank. The bank brought an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage against Dahl. Dahl contended that the note was discharged because it was paid in full, with payments being made to Sythe. The bank was never able to make service of process on Sythe. The bank was a "holder" of the note since it was in possession of the note endorsed by Sythe. As a holder and having produced the note, the bank was entitled to recover unless the defendant established a defense. Defendant's sole defense was that he had paid the note to Sythe. The defense of payment only discharges the maker's liability on the instrument if payment is made to the holder. Defendant never attempted to prove payment to the holder. Since the bank was the holder of the note and a valid assignee of the mortgage securing the note, it was entitled to a decree of foreclosure. Culbertson St. Bank v. Dahl, 190 M 33, 617 P2d 1295, 37 St. Rep. 1752 (1980).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Pleading Payment: The defense of payment is new matter and a special affirmative defense and if relied on must be pleaded specially. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Presumption of Payee's Ownership: In payee's action on notes, formal allegation in complaint that payee is still owner and holder was unnecessary where execution and delivery of the instrument and default of the maker or acceptor was alleged, since payee's ownership will be presumed from such facts. Parkinson v. Diefenderfer, 128 M 547, 280 P2d 424 (1955).

Evidence Required to Prove Payment: In order to justify a verdict for defendant under a plea of payment, defendant must introduce sufficient evidence to rebut the prima facie case made out by the plaintiff's possession of the note, and also outweigh any other evidence of nonpayment. Vesel v. Polich Trading Co., 96 M 118, 28 P2d 858 (1934).

Possession by Maker: Possession of a note by the maker is prima facie evidence of its payment. Anderson v. Border, 87 M 4, 285 P 174 (1930).

Sale and Payment Distinguished: Where the holder of a promissory note endorsed it and delivered it to a bank as collateral to secure his note to it, and a stranger to the transaction paid the latter note, the bank neither endorsing nor assigning it to him but simply surrendering it to him together with the note given as collateral, there was no sale of either note but the transaction resulted in a voluntary payment of the note so paid, and the maker was entitled to a return of the collateral. Watterson v. Hill, 84 M 549, 276 P 948 (1929), distinguished in Kennedy v. Conrad, 91 M 356, 9 P2d 1075 (1932).

Voluntary Payment by Another: Payment by one of the debt of another with full knowledge of the facts, or without the latter's request or promise to repay, is voluntary; by it the obligation is discharged and the volunteer cannot compel reimbursement. Watterson v. Hill, 84 M 549, 276 P 948 (1929).

Parol Evidence: Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a note containing an absolute promise to pay a specified amount of money at a stated time was by agreement of the parties to be paid out of a particular fund. Swan v. LeClair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926).

Payment on New Note: Payment on the new note is to be credited to the payor in an action on old note retained as collateral. Swan v. LeClair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926).

Bank as Agent: The bank at which a note is made payable is the agent of the payee to receive payment. Dehnert v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 74 M 104, 239 P 773 (1925).

Accommodation Maker: An accommodation maker is not released by any act which releases the sureties. Merchants' Nat'l Bank of Billings v. Smith, 59 M 280, 196 P 523, 15 ALR 430 (1921).

Acceptance by Agent: An agent has no implied authority to accept payment in anything but money. U. S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Shupak, 54 M 542, 172 P 324 (1918). See also First St. Bank of Hilger v. Lang, 55 M 146, 174 P 597, 9 ALR 1139 (1918).

Release of Comaker: Where a note is joint and several, payment by one of the makers extinguishes the liability of all. First Nat'l Bank of Butte v. Silver, 45 M 231, 122 P 584 (1912).

Complaint: In an action on a note, an allegation of nonpayment is material and essential. First Nat'l Bank of Butte v. Silver, 45 M 231, 122 P 584 (1912).

Possession by Person Other Than Maker: The possession of an uncanceled note by a person other than the maker is prima facie evidence that the debt evidenced thereby is unpaid. McCauley v. Darrow, 36 M 13, 91 P 1059 (1907).

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Section 3-603 [30-3-604] replaces present Section 3-604 [30-3-604 prior to 1991 revision]. Proposed subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] generally incorporates the law of tender of payment applicable to simple contracts. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3) of this section] state particular rules. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] restates present Section 3-604(2) [30-3-604(2) prior to 1991 revision]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] refusal of a tender of payment discharges any indorser or accommodation party having a right of recourse against the party making the tender. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] restates present Section 3-604(1) and (3) [30-3-604(1) and (3) prior to 1991 revision].

1991 Amendment: Substituted current language (see 1991 Session Law for text) for former text that read: "(1) Any party making tender of full payment to a holder when or after it is due is discharged to the extent of all subsequent liability for interest, costs and attorney's fees.

(2) The holder's refusal of such tender wholly discharges any party who has a right of recourse against the party making the tender.

(3) Where the maker or acceptor of an instrument payable otherwise than on demand is able and ready to pay at every place of payment specified in the instrument when it is due, it is equivalent to tender."

No Default When Agreement Made to Accept Full Payment: The defendant requested payment on a promissory note and was notified of plaintiff's intention to pay off the entire amount due. Defendant agreed by phone to accept full payment by mail, and plaintiff sent a check for the balance. Defendant later argued that plaintiff had defaulted on the note. The District Court found that plaintiff was not in default. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that under 30-3-604 any party making tender of full payment to a holder when or after it is due is discharged to the extent of all subsequent liability for interest, costs, and attorney fees. DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Sufficiency of Cancellation: Where a note payable at a bank was deposited by the holder with another bank as collateral security and the maker paid the note at the place of payment named therein and that bank remitted to the holder of the note the full amount of the payee's debt to it, the note was paid, the strict rule as to payment in absence of the note not being applicable where there was no loss. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Lynn, 73 M 473, 237 P 490 (1925).

Rescinded Contract: Section 55-904, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), providing that the holder of a promissory note may in writing renounce his rights under it, was inapplicable to an action by the payee against the maker where the contract under which it was given was rescinded by mutual consent. Hollingsworth v. Ruckman, 72 M 147, 232 P 180 (1924).

30-3-607. Discharge of indorsers and accommodation parties.

Official Comment

Source: Section 3-605, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. A person who needs credit may not be able to obtain it unless some other person is willing to incur liability to pay the debt if the credit is granted. In the typical case a note represents the debt. For example, Bank lends $10,000 to Borrower who signs a note under which Borrower is obliged to pay $10,000 to Bank on a due date stated in the note. Bank insists, however, that Accommodation Party also become liable to pay the note. Accommodation Party can incur this liability by signing the note as a co-maker or by indorsing the note. In either case the note is signed for accommodation and Borrower is the accommodated party. Rights and obligations of Accommodation Party in this case are stated in Section 3-419 [30-3-415]. Suppose that after the note is signed, Bank agrees to a modification of the rights and obligations between Bank and Borrower. For example, Bank agrees that Borrower may pay the note at some date after the due date, or that Borrower may discharge Borrower's $10,000 obligation to pay the note by paying Bank $3,000, or that Bank releases collateral given by Borrower to secure the note. Under the law of suretyship a surety or guarantor of a debt, such as Accommodation Party in our example, can be discharged under certain circumstances if changes of this kind are made by Bank without the consent of Accommodation Party. Rights of the surety to discharge in such cases are commonly referred to as suretyship defenses. Section 3-605 [30-3-607] is concerned with this kind of problem in the context of a negotiable instrument to which the principal debtor and the surety are parties. But Section 3-605 [30-3-607] has a wider scope. It also applies to indorsers who are not accommodation parties. For example, if Bank in our hypothetical case indorsed the note and transferred it to Bank #2, Bank has rights given to an indorser under Section 3-605 [30-3-607] if it is Bank #2 that modifies rights and obligations of Borrower. The scope of Section 3-605 [30-3-607] is also widened by subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] which deals with rights of a person such as a co-maker of a note who is not an accommodation party when collateral is impaired.

2. The importance of suretyship defenses is greatly diminished by the fact that they can be waived. The waiver is usually made by a provision in the note or other writing that represents the obligation of the principal debtor. It is standard practice to include a waiver of suretyship defenses in notes given to financial institutions or other commercial creditors. Section 3-605(g) [30-3-607(7)] also allows waiver. Thus, Section 3-605 [30-3-607] applies to the occasional case in which the creditor did not include a waiver clause in the instrument or in which the creditor did not obtain the permission of the surety to take the action that triggers the suretyship defense.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] addresses the effect of discharge under Section 3-604 [30-3-605] of the principal debtor. In the hypothetical case stated in Comment 1, release of Borrower by Bank does not release Accommodation Party. As a practical matter, Bank will not gratuitously release Borrower. Discharge will arise in the context of a settlement with a debtor who is insolvent or in financial difficulty. If Borrower is unable to pay all creditors, it may be prudent for a creditor to take partial payment, but Borrower will normally insist on a release of the obligation. If Bank takes $3,000 and releases Borrower from the $10,000 debt, Accommodation Party is not injured. To the extent of the payment Accommodation Party's obligation to Bank is reduced. The release of Borrower by Bank does not affect the right of Accommodation Party to obtain reimbursement from Borrower if Accommodation Party pays Bank. Section 3-419(e) [30-3-415(5)]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is designed to allow a creditor to settle with the principal debtor without risk of losing rights against the accommodation party or indorser. Settlement is in the interest of secondary parties as well as the creditor. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] changes the law, but the change relates largely to formalities rather than substance. Under the present law, Bank can settle with and release Borrower without releasing Accommodation Party, but to accomplish that result Bank has to either obtain the consent of Accommodation Party or make an express reservation of rights against Accommodation Party at the time it releases Borrower. The hoary doctrine of reservation of rights has very little to recommend it. The reservation of rights is made in the agreement between Bank and Borrower by which the release of Borrower is made and is binding on Accommodation Party even though Accommodation Party has no knowledge of it. There is no requirement in present Section 3-606 [30-3-606, now repealed] that any notice be given to Accommodation Party. The reservation of rights doctrine is abolished in proposed Section 3-605 [30-3-607] with respect to rights on instruments.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] relates to material modifications of the obligation of the principal debtor, including an extension of the due date of the instrument. In most cases an extension of time to pay a note is a benefit to both the principal debtor and parties having recourse against the debtor, but in some cases the extension may cause loss to the party having recourse by reducing the amount that the accommodation party or indorser will be able to recover on its right of recourse when default occurs. Present Section 3-606(1)(a) [30-3-606, now repealed] does not take into account the presence or absence of loss to the surety. For example, if the instrument is an installment note and the principal debtor is temporarily short of funds to pay a monthly installment, the payee may agree to extend the due date of the installment for a month or two to allow the debtor to pay when funds are available. Under present Section 3-606 [30-3-606, now repealed] an accommodation party or indorser is released if consent is not given unless the payee expressly reserves rights against the secondary party. It does not matter that the extension of time is a trivial change in the guaranteed obligation and that there is no evidence that the secondary party will suffer any loss because of the extension. Wilmington Trust Co. v. Gesullo, 29 U.C.C. Rep. 144 (Del. Super. Ct. 1980). On the other hand if the extension is for a long period of time the risk of the accommodation party may be substantially increased and loss may occur if there is a deterioration in the financial condition of the principal debtor that causes the debtor to be unable to pay during the period of extension.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] changes the law in several respects. Present Section 3-606 [30-3-606, now repealed] applies to extensions of time but not to other modifications of the obligation of the principal debtor. There is no apparent reason why present Section 3-606 [30-3-606, now repealed] does not follow general suretyship law in covering both. Proposed Section 3-605(c) [30-3-607(3)] relates to both, but it distinguishes between extensions or other modifications that cause loss to the accommodation party or indorser and those that don't. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] a material modification of the obligation of a party to an instrument will result in discharge of an indorser or accommodation party having a right of recourse against the obligor, unless the person enforcing the instrument proves lack of loss to the indorser or accommodation party. Loss refers to impairment of the value of the right of recourse. The issue will be presented when an action is brought to enforce the obligation of the indorser or accommodation party. The indorser or accommodation party that pays has a right of recourse against the principal debtor. If the person seeking enforcement can prove that the modification did not reduce the value of the right of recourse, there is no discharge. If the proof is that the modification caused only a partial reduction in the value of the right to recourse, discharge is limited to the amount of the reduction. For example, suppose the amount of an unsecured note is $10,000 and the original due date is April 1, 1988. In 1987 the payee of the note agrees to extend the due date to October 1, 1988. On October 1, 1988 the principal debtor has no assets and is in default on the note. Thus, the right of recourse of the accommodation party has no value on the extended due date. The accommodation party will lose $10,000 if required to pay the note. The payee brings an action against the accommodation party for $10,000, the amount of the note. If no proof is made with respect to loss caused by the modification, the accommodation party is discharged. But if the payee proves that the principal debtor did not have any assets on the original due date, there is no discharge because the extension of the due date did not cause loss. The accommodation party's loss would have been $10,000 even if no extension had occurred. If the payee proves that the principal debtor was insolvent on the original due date but that there were sufficient assets to allow debts to be paid 50 ¼ on the dollar, discharge is limited to $5,000, the amount of loss resulting from the extension.

The first sentence of subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] provides that an accommodation party is not discharged under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] unless the person agreeing to the modification knows of the accommodation or has notice that the instrument was signed for accommodation in the case of an anomalous indorsement or a signature accompanied by words of guaranty. Section 3-419(c) [30-3-415(3)].

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] deals with discharge of indorsers or accommodation parties by impairment of collateral. It generally conforms to present Section 3-606(1)(b) [30-3-606, now repealed]. Subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] states in detail what is meant by impairment. The indorser or accommodation party is discharged to the extent the indorser or accommodation party proves that impairment was caused by a person entitled to enforce the instrument. For example, suppose the payee of a secured note fails to perfect the security interest. The collateral is owned by the principal debtor who subsequently files in bankruptcy. As a result of the failure to perfect, the security interest is not enforceable in bankruptcy. If the payee obtains payment from an accommodation party, the accommodation party is subrogated to the payee's security interest in the collateral. In this case the value of the security interest is impaired completely because the security interest is unenforceable. If the value of the collateral is as much or more than the amount of the note there is a complete discharge. The first sentence of subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] also applies to subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section]. An accommodation party is not discharged unless the person causing the impairment knows of the accommodation or has notice of it. See the last paragraph to Comment 4.

In some states a real property grantee who assumes the obligation of the grantor as maker of a note secured by the real property becomes by operation of law a principal debtor and the grantor becomes a surety. The meager case authority is split on whether present Section 3-606 [30-3-606, now repealed] applies to release the grantor if the holder releases or extends the obligation of the grantee. Proposed Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] takes no position on the effect of the release of the grantor in this case. Proposed Section 3-605 [30-3-607] does not apply because the holder has not discharged the obligation of "a party to the instrument." The assuming grantee is not a party to the instrument.

6. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] is illustrated by the following case. X and Y sign a note for $1,000 as co-makers. Neither is an accommodation party. X grants a security interest in X's property to secure the note. The collateral is worth more than $1,000. Payee fails to perfect the security interest in X's property before X files in bankruptcy. As a result the security interest is not enforceable in bankruptcy. Had Payee perfected the security interest, Y could have paid the note and gained rights to X's collateral by subrogation. If the security interest had been perfected, Y could have realized on the collateral to the extent of $500 to satisfy its right of contribution against X. Payee's failure to perfect deprived Y of the benefit of the collateral. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] discharges Y to the extent of its loss. If there are no assets in the bankruptcy for unsecured claims, the loss is $500, the amount of Y's contribution claim against X which now has a zero value. If some amount is payable on unsecured claims, the loss is reduced by the amount receivable by Y. The same result follows if Y is an accommodation party but Payee has no knowledge of the accommodation or notice under Section 3-419(c) [30-3-415(3)]. In that event Y is not discharged under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section], but subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] applies because X and Y are jointly and severally liable on the note. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section], Y is treated as a co-maker with a right of contribution rather than an accommodation party with a right of reimbursement. Y is discharged to the extent of $500. If Y is the principal debtor and X is the accommodation party subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] doesn't apply. Y, as principal debtor, is not injured by the impairment of collateral because Y would have been obliged to reimburse X for the entire $1,000 even if Payee had obtained payment from sale of the collateral.

7. The second sentence of subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] is a continuation of present law which allows suretyship defenses to be waived.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. AFTER 1991 REVISION

No Impairment of Collateral Used to Secure Loan — No Exoneration of Surety: Plaintiff read and signed a promissory note to secure a small business loan for a friend who subsequently went bankrupt. The promissory note provided that plaintiff would secure the friend's loan with logging equipment that plaintiff had used to secure his loan. After defendant bank foreclosed on the logging equipment, plaintiff claimed that the bank improperly impaired the collateral and improperly subordinated plaintiff's loan to his friend's loan without plaintiff's knowledge, thereby relieving plaintiff, as surety, of the obligation to repay the loan. The bank contended that plaintiff was fully informed of the loan structure and the requirement that plaintiff's loan was junior to the friend's small business loan. The trial court weighed the conflicting evidence and agreed that the bank had explained to plaintiff that proceeds from the sale of the collateral would be applied to the small business loan first and that plaintiff's loan was structured to limit plaintiff's potential exposure while ensuring that plaintiff would not have to provide cash up front to help the friend secure the small business loan. On appeal, the Supreme Court declined to second-guess the trial court's findings regarding the conflicting testimony, and the trial court was affirmed. Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 M 169, 142 P3d 797 (2006).

Promissory Note Not Considered Contract of Adhesion: Plaintiff read and signed a promissory note to secure a loan for a friend who subsequently went bankrupt. The promissory note provided that plaintiff waived the right to rely on the defense of impairment. Nevertheless, after defendant bank foreclosed on the property that plaintiff used to secure the loan, plaintiff claimed impairment, arguing that the waiver constituted a contract of adhesion that was unenforceable. The District Court disagreed, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a contract of adhesion is a contract whose terms are dictated by one party to another who has no voice in the contract's formulation and that the contract is unenforceable if it is not within the expectations of the weaker party or if the contract terms are unduly oppressive, unconscionable, or against public policy. Plaintiff was a sophisticated businessman who did not attempt to negotiate the contract terms and who studied the contract prior to signing and thus could not later claim that he was unaware of the waiver provision and that it was not within his reasonable expectations. Although the bank prepared the contract, the transaction was entered solely at plaintiff's behest, and plaintiff voluntarily waived the defense of collateral impairment under this section. Therefore, the Supreme Court concluded that the promissory note was not a contract of adhesion, nor were the contract's general provisions outside of plaintiff's reasonable expectations. The District Court was affirmed. Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 M 169, 142 P3d 797 (2006), following Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C. PRIOR TO 1991 REVISION

Clear Language of Surety Agreement Binds Surety — Impairment of Collateral: Plaintiff contended that he was entitled to discharge from his surety agreement under Montana statutes on the remedies and rights of a surety. He claimed that the creditor bank's unconsented release of collateral, which exposed plaintiff to increased liability, discharged him from the surety agreement. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff is not entitled to be discharged as an original obligor because the clear language of the surety agreement makes him liable and allows the creditor bank to realize on any collateral it held without obtaining plaintiff's consent. Mont. Bank of Livingston v. Old Saloon, Inc., 235 M 244, 766 P2d 878, 45 St. Rep. 2354 (1988).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW

Impairment of Collateral — Defenses of Accommodation Maker: A Shaklee distributor negotiated with Storms Trust for a $10,000 loan to increase his inventory. Trustee Storms drafted a promissory note but refused to approve the loan until the distributor's wife had signed the note. The agreement granted Storms a security interest in the purchased inventory, yet Storms failed to record the security agreement. The distributor subsequently secured a second loan from a bank, which filed a financing statement on the inventory. The distributor defaulted on both loans. Storms took possession of the inventory but relinquished possession upon the bank's demand. Storms obtained a judgment against both the distributor and his wife. Wife appealed a District Court judgment for the full balance due on the promissory note and contract, contending she was discharged from liability on the note because Storms failed to perfect a security interest in the inventory, causing an impairment of collateral. Storms argued the wife was primarily liable as co-maker without benefit of defenses. The court stated that the law discharges all parties who occupy the position of a surety, including accommodation makers, endorsers, and acceptors. At the note signing, Storms had notice that the wife signed merely to aid her husband in obtaining the loan. Therefore, the wife was an accommodation maker entitled to the benefit of the defense of discharge. Storms' failure to perfect his security interest resulted in its loss to another secured party and entitled the wife to a discharge to the extent of the collateral's value. El-Ce Storms Trust v. Svetahor, 223 M 113, 724 P2d 704, 43 St. Rep. 1575 (1986).

Failure to Act:

Even if former corporate officers who endorsed corporation's note to Small Business Administration to effect that they guaranteed payment were sureties rather than guarantors, they were not exonerated from liability on note by Administration's failure to insist that new officers comply with agreement former officers had made with plaintiff to furnish quarterly financial statements and monthly lists of accounts receivable. U.S. v. Helena Office Supply Co., 256 F. Supp. 53 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

Small Business Administration, which made loan to corporation whose former officers endorsed back of note to effect that they guaranteed repayment and which did not insist that new officers comply with agreement former officers had made with it to furnish quarterly financial statements and monthly lists of accounts receivable, was chargeable with nothing more than non-action, not with action that would exonerate former officers of liability on note. U.S. v. Helena Office Supply Co., 256 F. Supp. 53 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

CHAPTER 4
UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE
BANK DEPOSITS AND COLLECTIONS

Chapter Commission Notes

Official Comment:

This draft of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] makes several changes in the draft reviewed by the Conference at its August 1989 Meeting. These revisions result in part from a statement made in February 1990 by representative of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System that the Board would probably be willing to assume regulatory control over the forward collection of checks if deemed appropriate by the NCCUSL, but that in any event the Federal Reserve is proceeding with a proposal relating to settlement for forward collection of checks and may well consider other changes to forward collection rules in the future. An extension of regulatory control by the Board over the entire check collection process is explicitly authorized by the Expedited Funds Availability Act of 1987.

Until the announcement by the Board's representatives, the Drafting Committee had proposed a number of amendments to conform Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] to new concepts of interbank settlements for checks embodied in Regulation CC. Since any regulations proposed by the Board would preempt these provisions, the Drafting Committee has withdrawn these amendments and has largely returned to the original text of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4]. If the Board issues comprehensive regulations, the functions of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] will be: (1) to afford a residual, safety-net body of law applying to the check collection and return process to the extent not preempted by the Board's new regulations; (2) to continue to be the major source of statutory law for customer-bank relations; and (3) to govern the collection process for noncheck items.

The amendments to the original text of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] found in this draft are proposed both to conform provisions of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] to the new Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] as well as to clarify and up-date Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] in a number of areas in which problems have arisen under the present Act [prior to 1991 revision]. Among the conforming amendments are Sections 4-207 [30-4-207] and 4-208 [30-4-215] which conform the transfer and presentment warranties provisions of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] to those in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Section 4-111 [30-4-112] adds a statute of limitations to Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4] that conforms to Section 3-118(g) [30-3-122(7)]. The reference to restrictive indorsements in present Section 4-205(2) [30-4-205(2) prior to 1991 revision] is deleted in order to leave coverage of restrictive indorsements to Section 3-206 [30-3-205]. Section 4-406

[30-4-406] is amended to include the modified comparative fault approach to loss allocation found in Sections 3-404, 3-405 and 3-406 [30-3-405, 30-3-420, and 30-3-406]. In the present version of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3, prior to 1991 revision], Sections 3-120 and 3-121 [30-3-120 and 30-3-121, both now repealed] deal with instruments "payable through" and "payable at" banks. These provisions have been removed from Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] and are combined in Section 4-106 [30-4-110].

Several amendments are required by the trend toward automation and, ultimately, truncation in the collection process. The process-of-posting test to determine when an item is paid is rejected as inappropriate for an [sic] regime of automated collection or truncation. "Accordingly, present Section 4-109 [30-4-109, now repealed] is deleted and conforming amendments are made in Sections 4-215 and 4-303 [30-4-213 and 30-4-303]. Encoding and retention warranties are added by Section 4-209 [30-4-216]. A provision authorizing truncation agreements is added as Section 4-110 [30-4-111]. The incapacity of an automated check clearing system based on MICR line information to accommodate postdated checks is recognized by adding Section 4-401(3) [30-4-401(3)]. The time for determining the insufficiency of an account is established in Section 4-402 [30-4-402]. Section 4-406 [30-4-406] is revised to accommodate new patterns of payor bank check retention and truncation plans.

Other provisions significantly modified are those on depositary bank as holder of an unindorsed item (Section 4-205 [30-4-205]) and the medium and time of settlement (Section 4-213 [30-4-211]). A number of sections have been clarified or expanded. Among these are the definitions of "account" (Section 4-104(1)(a) [30-4-104(1(a)]), "documentary draft" (Section 4-104(1)(f) [30-4-104(1)(f)]), "item" (Section 4-104(1)(h) [30-4-104(1)(h)]), "bank" (Section 4-105(a) [30-4-105(1)]), and "payor bank" (Section 4-105(c) [30-4-105(3)]), as well as substantive provisions on delays (Section 4-109 [30-4-108]), right of charge-back or refund (Section 4-214 [30-4-212]), final payment of item by payor bank (Section 4-215 [30-4-213]), payor bank's responsibility for late return of item (Section 4-302 [30-4-302]), when bank may charge customer's account (Section 4-401 [30-4-401]), bank's liability to customer for wrongful dishonor (Section 4-402 [30-4-402]), and customer's right to stop payment (Section 4-403 [30-4-403]).

Chapter Case Notes

Death of Partner — Disposition of Property Held Jointly by Partners: Robert and William, brothers, opened a joint checking account in 1947, paid all ranch expenses through the account, put all ranch income in the account, and equally split net profits. All cattle were branded with either of two brands, each of which was registered in the name of "William Palmer or Robert Palmer". The brothers were also joint tenants in a commodity brokerage account. The Supreme Court held that the cattle and both accounts were partnership property not held in joint tenancy and remained so upon Robert's death. Thus, they did not pass to William as the surviving joint tenant; rather, they remained in the partnership for the purpose of winding up the partnership and paying its liabilities, after which William must account to Robert's survivor, his widow, for Robert's share of the partnership. By its very nature, partnership property must be treated differently than property of individuals, including property held by individuals as joint tenants but who are not in partnership. This rule applies regardless of the formal legal manner in which the property is held. This is a rule of equity developed over hundreds of years and codified in the Uniform Partnership Act. Part 1
General Provisions and Definitions

Part Case Notes

Drawer and Payee Identical — Circuitous Accountability: Checks were drawn on the account of Capital Preservation Fund, Inc., maintained with First National Bank of Great Falls, Montana, by John Bennett, an authorized signatory on the account. The checks were endorsed and deposited by Bennett in another account he maintained with the Ashford Bank of Houston, Texas. Ashford Bank sent the checks through normal banking channels and extended cash to Bennett in reliance on the checks. The checks, however, were dishonored by First National Bank. Ashford then charged back the account of Bennett but alleged that it sustained a loss of $500,000. An affidavit from the Federal Reserve Bank established that First National had timely returned the checks in advance of the "midnight deadline". Bennett contended that payment became final prior to dishonor because First National had completed the process of posting. Section 30-4-213 provides that "final" payment by a drawee bank is the point at which all "provisional" settlements as allowed by 30-4-104(1)(j) in the bank collection chain became "final" settlements. Typically, provisional credits given through a clearinghouse or mutual bank account are made final upon payment of the item by completion of the process of posting the drawer's account. The agency relationships established under 30-4-201 are thereby transformed into a series of debtor-creditor relationships ending with the depository bank indebted to its customer for the amount of the item. The right of a collecting bank under 30-4-212(1) to charge back the account of its customer for any credit given for an item terminates when payment on the item becomes final. Section 30-4-213 holds a "payor" bank accountable for an item once "final" payment has been rendered. The "payor" bank must act in a timely manner in either dishonoring or paying the instrument. Timely dishonor was established. Bennett in this instance had the roles of both a "drawer" and the "payee". To allow Bennett to allege that payment by First National, the "payor" bank, was final would result in circuitous accountability. First National would simply charge the account on which the checks were drawn, Capital Preservation Fund, Inc., in order to recoup the amount paid. Capital Preservation Fund, Inc., would in turn have a cause of action against Bennett for recovery of the money. Any litigation emanating from this unique factual situation properly was between Capital Preservation Fund, Inc., and Bennett. The cause of action against First National Bank was found to be illusory, and it was granted summary judgment. Ashford Bank v. Capital Preservation Fund, Inc., 544 F. Supp. 26, 39 St. Rep. 1385 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Deposit of Check Made to Another — When No Customer Warranties Breached — When Settlement of Check Final: A bank initiated an action against a customer to recover the amount of a check she deposited. The check was a paycheck made out to her former husband. She had deposited his paychecks for a time, and the Supreme Court found an agency relationship in the situation. On the occasion leading to this action, the appellant had deposited the check unsigned to her checking account. The bank stamped the check "deposited to the credit of" and filled in the name of the former husband. Meanwhile, the former husband told the check's issuer his ex-wife had forged his name on the check and deposited it. The issuer completed necessary documents and issued a new check. The former husband then disappeared, being suspected of embezzlement. Whether the customer breached her warranties under the U.C.C. depended on whether the settlement on the check became final. The Supreme Court overruled the trial court and held the settlement had become final. The return of the check occurred after the posting. The bank where the check was deposited was not entitled to a refund under 30-4-212. The customer warranties issue was decided by the principle that an agency could not be denied by a principal accepting its benefits. Because the appellant was not in breach of customer warranties, the bank's remedy, if any, was against the maker or the payee, the appellant's former husband. First Nat'l Bank v. Nunn, 192 M 483, 628 P2d 1110, 38 St. Rep. 869 (1981).

Official Comment

Source: Section 4-101, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

The tremendous number of checks handled by banks and the country-wide nature of the bank collection process require uniformity in the law of bank collections. Individual Federal Reserve banks process as many as 1,000,000 items a day; large metropolitan banks average 300,000 a day; banks with less than $5,000,000 on deposit handle from 1,000 to 2,000 daily. There is needed a uniform statement of the principal rules of the bank collection process with ample provision for flexibility to meet the needs of the large volume handled and the changing needs and conditions that are bound to come with the years.

The American Bankers Association Bank Collection Code, enacted in eighteen states, has stated many of the bank collection rules that have developed, and more recently Deferred Posting statutes have developed and varied further rules. With items flowing in great volume not only in and around metropolitan and smaller centers but also continuously across state lines and back and forth across the entire country, a proper situation exists for uniform rules that will state in modern concepts at least some of the rights of the parties and in addition aid this flow and not interfere with its progress.

This Chapter adopts many of the rules of the American Bankers Association Code that are still in current operation, the principles and rules of the Deferred Posting and other statutes, codifies some rules established by court decisions and in addition states certain patterns and procedures that exist even though not heretofore covered by statute.

30-4-102. Applicability.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4-102, U.C.C.

Purposes:

1. The rules governing negotiable instruments, their transfer, and the contracts of the parties thereto apply to the items collected through banking channels wherever no specific provision is found in this Chapter. In the case of conflict, this Chapter governs. See Section 30-3-103(2) [now repealed].

Bonds and like instruments constituting investment securities under Chapter 8 may also be handled by banks for collection purposes. Various sections of Chapter 8 prescribe rules of transfer some of which (see Sections 30-8-304 and 30-8-306, both repealed) may conflict with provisions of this Chapter (Sections 30-4-205 and 30-4-207). In the case of conflict, Chapter 8 governs.

Section 30-4-208 deals specifically with overlapping problems and possible conflicts between this Chapter and Chapter 9A. However, similar reconciling provisions are not necessary in the case of Chapters 5 and 7. Sections 30-4-301 and 30-4-302 are consistent with Section 30-5-112 [now repealed]. In the case of Chapter 7 documents of title frequently accompany items but they are not themselves items. See Section 30-4-104(g).

2. Subsection (2) is designed to state a workable rule for the solution of otherwise vexatious problems of the conflicts of laws:

a. The routine and mechanical nature of bank collections makes it imperative that one law govern the activities of one office of a bank. The requirement found in some cases that to hold an indorser notice must be given in accordance with the law of the place of indorsement, since that method of notice became an implied term of the indorser's contract, is more theoretical than practical.

b. Adoption of what is in essence a tort theory of the conflict of laws is consistent with the general theory of this Chapter that the basic duty of a collecting bank is one of good faith and the exercise of ordinary care. Justification lies in the fact that, in using an ambulatory instrument, the drawer, payee, and indorsers must know that action will be taken with respect to it in other jurisdictions. This is especially pertinent with respect to the law of the place of payment.

c. The phrase "action or nonaction with respect to any item handled by it for purposes of presentment, payment or collection" is intended to make the conflicts rule of subsection (2) apply from the inception of the collection process of an item through all phases of deposit, forwarding, presentment, payment and remittance or credit of proceeds. Specifically the subsection applies to the initial act of a depositary bank in receiving an item and to the incidents of such receipt. The conflicts rule of Weissman v. Banque de Bruxelles, 254 N.Y. 488, 173 N.E. 835 (1930), is rejected. The subsection applies to questions of possible vicarious liability of a bank for action or non-action of sub-agents (see Section 30-4-202(3)) and tests these questions by the law of the state of the location of the bank which uses the sub-agent. The conflicts rule of St. Nicholas Bank of New York v. State Nat. Bank, 128 N.Y. 26, 27 N.E. 849, 13 L.R.A. 241 (1891), is rejected. The subsection applies to action or non-action of a payor bank in connection with handling an item (see Sections 30-4-213(1), 30-4-301, 30-4-302, 30-4-303) as well as action or non-action of a collecting bank (Sections 30-4-201 through 30-4-214); to action or non-action of a bank which suspends payment or is affected by another bank suspending payment (Section 30-4-214); to action or non-action of a bank with respect to an item under the rules of Part 4 of Chapter 4.

d. Where subsection (2) makes this Chapter applicable, Section 30-4-103(1) leaves open the possibility of an agreement with respect to applicable law. Such freedom of agreement follows the general policy of Section 30-1-105 [now repealed].

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

This section is changed to indicate that in case of conflict the provisions of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], as well as those of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], govern those of Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4].

30-4-103. Variation by agreement — measure of damages — action constituting ordinary care.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4-103, U.C.C.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: See Sections 5 and 6 of the American Bankers Association Bank Collection Code.

Purposes:

1. Section 30-1-102 states the general principles and rules for variation of the effect of this Act by agreement and the limitations to this power. Section 30-4-103 states the specific rules for variation of Chapter 4 by agreement and also certain standards of ordinary care. In view of the technical complexity of the field of bank collections, the enormous number of items handled by banks, the certainty that there will be variations from the normal in each day's work in each bank, the certainty of changing conditions and the possibility of developing improved methods of collection to speed the process, it would be unwise to freeze present methods of operation by mandatory statutory rules. This section, therefore, permits within wide limits variation of provisions of the Chapter by agreement.

2. Subsection (1) confers blanket power to vary all provisions of the Chapter by agreements of the ordinary kind. The agreements may not disclaim a bank's responsibility for its own lack of good faith or failure to exercise ordinary care and may not limit the measure of damages for such lack or failure, but this subsection like Section 30-1-102(3) approves the practice of parties determining by agreement the standards by which such responsibility is to be measured. In the absence of a showing that the standards manifestly are unreasonable, the agreement controls. Owners of items and other interested parties are not affected by agreements under this subsection unless they are parties to the agreement or are bound by adoption, ratification, estoppel or the like.

As here used "agreement" has the meaning given to it by Section 30-1-201(3). The agreement may be direct, as between the owner and the depositary bank; or indirect, as where the owner authorizes a particular type of procedure and any bank in the collection chain acts pursuant to such authorization. It may be with respect to a single item; or to all items handled for a particular customer, e.g., a general agreement between the depositary bank and the customer at the time a deposit account is opened. Legends on deposit tickets, collection letters and acknowledgments of items, coupled with action by the affected party constituting acceptance, adoption, ratification, estoppel or the like, are agreements if they meet the tests of the definition of "agreement". See Section 30-1-201(3). First Nat. Bank of Denver v. Federal Reserve Bank, 6 F.2d 339 (8th Cir.1925) (deposit slip); Jefferson County Bldg. Ass'n v. Southern Bank & Trust Co., 225 Ala. 25, 142 So. 66 (1932) (signature card and deposit slip); Semingson v. Stock Yards Nat. Bank, 162

Minn. 424, 203 N.W. 412 (1925) (passbook); Farmers State Bank v. Union Nat. Bank, 42 N.D. 449, 454, 173 N.W. 789, 790 (1919) (acknowledgment of receipt of item).

3. Subsection (1) (subject to its limitations with respect to good faith and ordinary care) goes far to meet the requirements of flexibility. However, it does not by itself confer fully effective flexibility. When it is recognized that banks handle probably 25,000,000 items every business day and that the parties interested in each item include the owner of the item, the drawer (if it is a check), all non-bank indorsers, the payor bank and from one to five or more collecting banks, it is obvious that it is impossible, practically, to obtain direct agreements from all of these parties on all items. En masse, the interested parties constitute virtually every adult person and business organization in the United States. On the other hand they may become bound to agreements on the principle that collecting banks acting as agents have authority to make binding agreements with respect to items being handled. This conclusion was assumed but was not flatly decided in Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond v. Malloy, 264 U.S. 160, at 167, 44 S.Ct. 296, at 298, 68 L.Ed. 617, 31 A.L.R. 1261 (1924).

To meet this problem subsection (2) provides that official or quasi-official rules of collection, that is Federal Reserve regulations and operating letters, clearing house rules, and the like, have the effect of agreements under subsection (1), whether or not specifically assented to by all parties interested in items handled. Consequently, such official or quasi-official rules may, standing by themselves but subject to the good faith and ordinary care limitations, vary the effect of the provisions of Chapter 4.

Federal Reserve regulations. Various sections of the Federal Reserve Act (12 U.S.C.A. §221 et seq.) authorize the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to direct the Federal Reserve banks to exercise bank collection functions. For example, Section 16 (12 U.S.C.A. §248(o)) authorizes the Board to require each Federal Reserve bank to exercise the functions of a clearing house for its members and Section 13 (12 U.S.C.A. §342) authorizes each Federal Reserve bank to receive deposits from non-member banks solely for the purposes of exchange or of collection. Under this statutory authorization the Board has issued Regulation J (Check Clearing and Collection), which has been infrequently amended over the many years during which it has been in force. (Regulation G, issued under comparable statutory authority, covers the handling of "non-cash items"). Where regulations issued by the Board in pursuance of its statutory mandate may be said to have some force of law and constitute an effective means of maintaining flexibility, it is appropriate to provide that such regulations may vary this Chapter even though not specifically assented to by all parties interested in items handled.

Federal Reserve operating letters. The regulations of the Federal Reserve Board authorize the Federal Reserve banks to promulgate rules covering operating details. Regulation J, for example, provides that each bank may promulgate rules "not inconsistent with the terms of the law or of this regulation governing the sorting, listing, packaging and transmission of items and other details of its check clearing and collection operation. Such rules . . . shall be set forth . . . in . . . letters of instructions to . . . member and non-member clearing banks." The term "operating letters" means these "letters of instructions", sometimes called "operating circulars", issued by the Federal Reserve banks under appropriate regulation of the Board. This Chapter recognizes such "operating letters" issued pursuant to the regulations and concerned with operating details as appropriate means, within their proper sphere, to vary the effect of the Chapter.

Clearing House Rules. Local clearing houses have long issued rules governing the details of clearing; hours of clearing, media of remittance, time for return of mis-sent items and the like. The case law has recognized such rules, within their proper sphere, as binding on affected parties and as appropriate sources for the courts to look to in filling out details of bank collection law. Subsection (2) in recognizing clearing house rules as a means of preserving flexibility continues the sensible approach indicated in the cases. Included in the term "clearing houses" are county and regional clearing houses as well as those within a single city or town. There is, of course, no intention of authorizing a local clearing house or a group of clearing houses to rewrite the basic law generally. The term "clearing house rules" should be understood in the light of functions the clearing houses have exercised in the past.

And the like. This phrase is to be construed in the light of the foregoing. "Federal Reserve regulations and operating letters" cover rules and regulations issued by public or quasi-public agencies under statutory authority. "Clearing house rules" cover rules issued by a group of banks which have associated themselves to perform through a clearing house some of their collection, payment and clearing functions. Other such agencies or associations may be established in the future whose rules and regulations could be appropriately looked on as constituting means of avoiding absolute statutory rigidity. The phrase "and the like" leaves open such possibilities of future development. An agreement between a number of banks or even all the banks in an area simply because they are banks, would not of itself, by virtue of the phrase "and the like," meet the purposes and objectives of subsection (2).

4. Under this Chapter banks come under the general obligations of the use of good faith and the exercise of ordinary care. "Good faith" is defined in this Act (Section 30-1-201(19)) as "honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned." The term "ordinary care" is not defined and is here used with its normal tort meaning and not in any special sense relating to bank collections. No attempt is made in the Chapter to define in toto what constitutes ordinary care or lack of it. Section 30-4-202 states respects in which collecting banks must use ordinary care. Subsection (3) of 30-4-103 provides that action or non-action approved by the Chapter or pursuant to Federal Reserve regulations or operating letters constitutes the exercise of ordinary care. Where Federal Reserve regulations and operating letters are issued pursuant to statutory mandate as indicated above, they constitute an affirmative standard of ordinary care equally with the provisions of Chapter 4 itself.

Subsection (3) further provides that, absent special instructions, action or non-action consistent with clearing house rules and the like or with a general banking usage not disapproved by the Chapter, prima facie constitutes the exercise of ordinary care. Clearing house rules and the phrase "and the like" have the significance set forth above in these Comments. The term "general banking usage" is not defined but should be taken to mean a general usage common to banks in the area concerned. See Section 30-1-205(2). Where the adjective "general" is used, the intention is to require a usage broader than a mere practice between two or three banks but it is not intended to require anything as broad as a country-wide usage. A usage followed generally throughout a state, a substantial portion of a state, a metropolitan area or the like would certainly be sufficient. Consistently with the principle of Section 30-1-205(3), action or non-action consistent with clearing house rules or the like or with such banking usages prima facie constitutes the exercise of ordinary care. However, the phrase "in the absence of special instructions" affords owners of items an opportunity to prescribe other standards and where there may be no direct supervision or control of clearing houses or banking usages by official supervisory authorities, the confirmation of ordinary care by compliance with these standards is prima facie only, thus conferring on the courts the ultimate power to determine ordinary care in any case where it should appear desirable to do so. The prima facie rule does, however, impose on the party contesting the standards to establish that they are unreasonable, arbitrary or unfair.

5. Subsection (4), in line with the flexible approach required for the bank collection process is designed to make clear that a novel procedure adopted by a bank is not to be considered unreasonable merely because that procedure is not specifically contemplated by this Chapter or by agreement, or because it has not yet been generally accepted as a bank usage. Changing conditions constantly call for new procedures and someone has to use the new procedure first. If such a procedure when called in question is found to be reasonable under the circumstances, provided, of course, that it is not inconsistent with any provision of the Chapter or other law or agreement, the bank which has followed the new procedure should not be found to have failed in the exercise of ordinary care.

6. Subsection (5) sets forth a rule for determining the measure of damages which, under subsection (1), cannot be limited by agreement. In the absence of bad faith the maximum recovery is the amount of the item concerned. When it is established that some part or all of the item could not have been collected even by the use of ordinary care the recovery is reduced by the amount which would have been in any event uncollectible. This limitation on recovery follows the case law. Finally, when bad faith is established the rule opens to allow the recovery of other damages, whose "proximateness" is to be tested by the ordinary rules applied in comparable cases. Of course, it continues to be as necessary under subsection (5) as it has been under ordinary common law principles that, before the damage rule of the subsection becomes operative, liability of the bank and some loss to the customer or owner must be established.

Official Comment to 1991 Amendment:

Operating "circular" is current usage. The Expedited Funds Availability Act, 12 U.S.C. Section 4007(b) provides that the Act and Regulation CC, 12 CFR 229, supersede "any provision of the law of any State, including the Uniform Commercial Code as in effect in such State, which is inconsistent with this chapter or such regulations." Operating circulars vary the UCC pursuant to Section 4-103(2) [30-4-103(2)]. Regulations and operating circulars of other federal agencies may also have an impact on provisions of the UCC.

In Clearfield Trust Co. v. United States, 318 U.S. 363 (1943), the Court held that if the federal government is a party to an instrument, its rights and duties are governed by federal law. However, in United States v. Kimbell Foods, Inc., 440 U.S. 715 (1979), the court evidenced a willingness to adopt the priorities rules of UCC Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] in the absence of federal law on the subject.

Case Notes

Bank to Exercise Ordinary Care in Settling Checks — Common Law That Bank Exercise Ordinary Care in Processing Checks Preempted by Uniform Commercial Code: Hughes brought common-law claims against a bank for failing to exercise ordinary care in processing checks and for communications that the bank made regarding check processing. A bank that receives a check from a depositor must use ordinary care, as defined in the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.), in settling those checks. However, when a check is processed by automated means, reasonable commercial standards do not require the bank to examine the check, subject to certain exceptions. To the extent that common-law claims relate to processing checks, the specific provisions of the U.C.C. prevail, so Hughes' claims regarding the propriety of the bank's check processing were preempted. However, because the U.C.C. does not address misrepresentation in communications, Hughes' common-law and equitable claims for negligence were not preempted by the U.C.C., and the District Court committed reversible error by failing to consider whether common-law and equitable principles supplement the U.C.C.-defined duty of ordinary care with respect to the bank's representations about the check settlement process. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006).

Forgery — Damages Limited to Face Amount of Check: When substantial credible evidence existed by which the jury could reject plaintiffs' claim that defendant bank's action in cashing a forged check and its checking account practices proximately caused plaintiffs' additional damages, the bank could not be held liable for any amount beyond the face value of the check. Ahmann v. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n, 235 M 184, 766 P2d 853, 45 St. Rep. 2305 (1988).

"Demand Item" and "Presentment" Construed — Waiver of Midnight Deadline Rule: When defendant's, Nuernberger's, check was twice refused and returned for insufficient funds by the payor bank, First Bank of Billings (First Bank), an officer of the joint payee, Montana Livestock Production Credit Association (MLPCA) returned the check to First Bank with a written memo authorizing First Bank to "hold it for longer than the usual 24-hour period" and to pay when funds became available. The District Court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff (the other joint payee) and MLPCA and found First Bank strictly liable for the face amount of the check because of its failure to comply with the midnight deadline rule. The Supreme Court reversed and found that the midnight deadline rule did not apply, holding that the check was not a "demand item" because it was transmitted with the understanding it would be held for sufficient funds and that there had been no "presentment" by the plaintiff, but only by the joint payee, MLPCA. The Supreme Court further held that there had been a waiver of the midnight rule time requirements by MLPCA's memo. Iverson v. First Bank of Billings, 219 M 283, 712 P2d 1285, 42 St. Rep. 2021 (1985).

Agreement Excusing Payor Bank from Noncompliance with "Midnight Rule": There was no agreement between payor bank and payees excepting bank from strict liability for noncompliance with "midnight rule" of 30-4-302 in its failure to give timely notice of dishonor of checks since: (1) bank's holding and paying of one check as to each of two of the payees was not sufficient to form "a sequence of previous conduct" necessary to establish a course of dealing from which an agreement excusing noncompliance with "midnight rule" could be implied under 30-1-201(3) and 30-1-205(1); and (2) alleged understanding with one payee's agent would not be considered an agreement in view of bank's unique position as drawer's creditor. Sun River Cattle Co., Inc. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 237, 521 P2d 679 (1974).

Custom and Practice: Custom and practice are relevant under subsection (3), if at all, only with respect to establishment of what standard constitutes ordinary care; where payor bank was subject to higher standard of care because of its status as creditor of drawer of checks, its failure to comply with "midnight rule" of 30-4-302 in handling checks for collection could not be excused on ground that established custom and practice of Montana banking industry was to hold such checks for an arbitrary length of time in absence of special instructions and writing. Sun River Cattle Co., Inc. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 237, 521 P2d 679 (1974).

Interest on Judgment: Determination by the court that the bank was liable for payment of dishonored checks was based on contract law of negotiable instruments, and the provisions of this statute for damages for negligence or bad faith do not apply. Sun River Cattle Co. v. Miners Bank of Mont., 164 M 479, 525 P2d 19 (1974).

30-4-104. Definitions and index of definitions.

Official Comment

[Corresponding U.C.C. Section: Section 4-104, U.C.C.]

Source: Section 4-104, U.C.C.

Purposes:

1. Subsection (1)(c): "Banking Day". Under this definition that part of a business day when a bank is open only for limited functions, e.g., on Saturday evenings to receive deposits and cash checks, but with loan, bookkeeping and other departments closed, is not part of a banking day.

2. Subsection (1)(d): "Clearing House". Occasionally express companies, governmental agencies and other non-banks deal directly with a clearing house; hence the definition does not limit the term to an association of banks.

3. Subsection (1)(e): "Customer". It is to be noted that this term includes a bank carrying an account with another bank as well as the more typical non-bank customer or depositor.

4. Paragraph (a)(6) [subsection (1)(f)]: "Documentary draft" applies even though the documents do not accompany the draft but are to be received by the drawee or other payor before acceptance or payment of the draft. Documents may be either in electronic or tangible form. See Article 5, Section 5-102 [30-5-102], Comment 2 and Article 1, Section 1-201 [30-1-201] (definition of "document of title").

5. Subsection (1)(h): The word "item" is chosen because it is "banking language" and includes non-negotiable as well as negotiable paper calling for money and also similar paper governed by the Chapter on Investment Securities (Chapter 8) as well as that governed by the Chapter on Commercial Paper (Chapter 3).

6. Subsection (1)(i): "Midnight Deadline". The use of this phrase is an example of the more mechanical approach used in this Chapter. Midnight is selected as a termination point or time limit to obtain greater uniformity and definiteness than would be possible from other possible termination points, such as the close of the banking day or business day.

7. Subsection (1)(j): The term "settle" is a new term in bank collection language that has substantial importance throughout Chapter 4. In the American Bankers Association Bank Collection Code, in deferred posting statutes, in Federal Reserve regulations and operating letters, in clearing house rules, in agreements between banks and customers and in legends on deposit tickets and collection letters, there is repeated reference to "conditional" or "provisional" credits or payments. Tied in with this concept of credits or payments being in some way tentative, has been a related but somewhat different problem as to when an item is "paid" or "finally paid" either to determine the relative priority of the item as against attachments, stop payment orders and the like or in insolvency situations. There has been extensive litigation in the various states on these problems. To a substantial extent the confusion, the litigation and even the resulting court decisions fail to take into account that in the collection process some debits or credits are provisional or tentative and others are final and that very many debits or credits are provisional for awhile but later become final. Similarly, some cases fail to recognize that within a single bank, particularly a payor bank, each item goes through a series of processes and that in a payor bank most of these processes are preliminary to the basic act of payment or "final payment".

The term "settle" is used as a convenient term to characterize a broad variety of conditional, provisional, tentative and also final payments of items. Such a comprehensive term is needed because it is frequently difficult or unnecessary to determine whether a particular action is tentative or final or when a particular credit shifts from the tentative class to the final class. Therefore, its use throughout the Chapter indicates that in that particular context it is unnecessary or unwise to determine whether the debit or the credit or the payment is tentative or final. However, when qualified by the adjective "provisional" its tentative nature is intended, and when qualified by the adjective "final" its permanent nature is intended.

Examples of the various types of settlement contemplated by the term include payments in cash; the efficient but somewhat complicated process of payment through the adjustment and off-setting of balances through clearing houses; debit or credit entries in accounts between banks; the forwarding of various types of remittance instruments, sometimes to cover a particular item but more frequently to cover an entire group of items received on a particular day.

8. Subsection (1)(k): "Suspends payments". This term is designed to afford an objective test to determine when a bank is no longer operating as a part of the banking system.
